Hindus in the Hindu temples and bathing thirthas, prohibiting cow-slaughter during Id festivals and the proposal for establishing schools for primary religious education both for Hindus and Mussulmans separately, under their policy of non-interference in the established customs and usages of the Sanatana Dharma, should find no difficulty in adopting suitable measures in this direction also (the reference is to his suggestion for the certification of conversion and reconversions). (The Mahratta, June 30.)

While the Shankaracharya is confident that the needed improvements are quite possible under the existing policy of the Nizam's Government, the Arya memorial wants the intervention of Crown Representative and the use of the rights of Paramountcy to give the Arya Samajists unrestricted freedom to carry on their propaganda in the State. The interpretation which the memorialists put upon the passage in the Queen's Proclamation regarding religious neutrality, is far-fetched. We are surprised that, with the example of Lucknow and Cawnpore before their eyes, Sir C. Y. Chintamani and the Hon. Mr. P. N. Sapru have put their names to a demand which is especially extravagant on the part of the Arya Samaj which is largely a repudiation of the most cherished beliefs and traditions of Hinduism. We can not imagine the Satyartha Prakash, the Bible so to speak of the Arya Samaj, not being read in religious institutions conducted by the Arya Samaj. It is a book which is full of offensive observations about Hinduism (as also of Christianity and Islam). For the Arya Samajists to claim to be leaders of Hinduism, means one of two things: that they have completely gone back on the teachings of their Founder or that they are carefully keeping them in the background in order to establish an ascendancy among Hindus which they have failed to do by their religious propaganda. Here is a passage taken from the Satyartha Prakash:

> Q: The Vama Margis and Shivites are not good but I suppose the Vaishnavites are so.
> A. Their sect being opposed to the teaching of the Vedas they are worse still. Bharadwaja's (English Edition p. 342.)

As a specimen of Swami Dayanand's reasoning and methods of controversy, the following account given by him of the origin of Vaishanavaism will interest readers:

> Their founder was a man named Shathakopa. He was born of a hore (sic): it is very likely that when he wanted to read with Brahmanas, he was refused this privilege; thereupon (having been exasperated) he founded the Chakrankita sect and introduced the use of marks on the forehead and started the practice of branding the arms; all this was opposed to the teachings of the Shastras and was evolved out of his own imagination. He was succeeded by his disciple, Munivahana, who was the son of an outcaste. His chief disciple was Yavanacharya who was a Mahommedan by birth, Yavanacharya is sometimes corrupted to Yamunacharya. After hima Ramnuja who was a Brahman by birth, was converted to this faith (sic). (pages 345, 346.)

The memorial claims that the number of adherents to the Arya Samaj is daily increasing and that it exerts influence over large bodies of the Hindu community outside its ranks. On the contrary there are grounds for thinking that the Arya Samaj as a religious movement has spent itself, and that it is trying to make up for its failure by putting itself forward as the champion of Hinduism which it has failed to dislodge. In the important subject of marriage, the Arya Samaj has freely allowed polygamy which its Founder denounced, and the Arya Marriage Validation Act passed two years ago has been grossly abused in several recent cases noticed in the Reformer. Another feature of Hinduism against which the Swami was most violent was idol worship. Arya Samajists have put themselves forward as leaders in the temple-entry agitation and figure in this memorial as protectors of Hindu temples. The Hindu gentlemen who have attached their names to the memorial, have no doubt satisfied themselves that the interests of the Arya Samajists and orthodox Hindus are the same in the Nizam's Dominions; but we can not help thinking that what the Aryas want in the name of religious freedom is virtually that the Nizam's Government should help the Arya Samaj to impose its sway over its Hindu subjects. No one who reads the criticisms of the Satyartha Prakash of Hinduism and other religions, can doubt for a moment that to allow the Aryas absolute freedom to preach and propagate it among their adherents, must lead to breaches of the peace. The work of the Arya Samaj in establishing educational institutions and orphanages has been meritorious. We do not underrate the services of the Arya Samaj. Unlike the Brahma Samaj, however, the Arya Samaj has not been distinguished for its tolerance. Certainly, it has been far outstripped as an agency of spiritual uplift by the Sri Ramakrishna Mission.

DR. EINSTEIN ON RELIGION AND SCIENCE.

Dr. Albert Einstein spoke on May 19 at Princeton Theological Seminary before the Northeastern Regional Conference of the American Association of Theological Schools. His brief address, which he entitled "The Goal," was not given publicity at the time but he has kindly furnished it for publication. The text follows:

"During the last century, and part of the one before, it was widely held that there was an unreconcilable conflict between knowledge and belief. The opinion prevailed among advanced minds that it was time that belief should be replaced increasingly by knowledge; belief that did not itself rest on knowledge was superstition, and as such had to be opposed. According to this conception, the sole function of education was to open the way to thinking and knowing, and the school, as the outstanding organ for the people's education, must serve that end exclusively.

"One will probably find but rarely, if at all, the rationalistic standpoint expressed in such crass form; for any sensible man would see at once how one-sided is such a statement of the position. But it is just as well to state a thesis starkly and nakedly, if one wants to clear up one's mind as to its nature.

"It is true that convictions can best be supported with experience and clear thinking. On this point one must agree unreservedly with the extreme rationalist. The weak point of his conception is, however, this, that those convictions which are necessary and determinant for our conduct and judgments, cannot be found solely along this solid scientific way.

"For the scientific method can teach us nothing else beyond how facts are related to, and conditioned by, each other. The aspiration toward such objective knowledge belongs to the highest of which man is capable, and you will certainly not suspect me of wishing to belittle the achievements and the heroic efforts of man in this sphere. Yet it is equally clear that knowledge of what is does not open the door directly to what should be. One can have the clearest and most complete knowledge of what is, and yet not be able to deduct from that what should be the goal of our human aspirations. Objective knowledge provides us with powerful instruments for the achievements of certain ends, but the ultimate goal itself and the longing to reach it must come from another source. And it is hardly necessary to argue for the view that our existence and our activity acquire meaning only by the setting up of such a goal and of corresponding values. The knowledge of truth as such is wonderful, but it is so little capable of acting as a guide that it cannot prove even the justification and the value of the aspiration towards that very knowledge of truth. Here we face, therefore, the limits of the purely rational conception of our existence.

"But it must not be assumed that intelligent thinking can play no part in the formation of the goal and of ethical judgments. When someone realizes that for the achievement of an end certain means would be useful, the means itself becomes thereby an end. Intelligence makes clear to us the interrelation of means and ends. But mere thinking cannot give us a sense of the ultimate and fundamental ends. To make clear these fundamental ends and valuations, and to set them fast in the emotional life of the individual, seems to me precisely the most important function which religion has to perform in the social life of man. And if one asks whence derives the authority of such fundamental ends, since they cannot be stated and justified merely by reason, one can only answer: they exist in a healthy society as powerful traditions, which act upon the conduct and aspirations and judgments of the individuals; they are there, that is, as something living, without its being necessary to find justification for their existence. They come into being not through demonstration but through revelation, through the medium of powerful personalities. One must not attempt to justify them, but rather to sense their nature simply and clearly.

"The highest principles for our aspirations and judgments are given to us in the Jewish-Christian religious tradition. It is a very high goal which, with our weak powers, we can reach only very inadequately, but which gives a sure foundation to our aspirations and valuations. If one were to take that goal out of its religious form and look merely at its purely human side, one might state it perhaps thus: free and responsible development of the individual, so that he may place his powers freely and gladly in the service of all mankind.

"There is no room in this for the divinization of a nation, of a class, let alone of an individual. Are we not all children of one father, as it is said in religious language? Indeed, even the divinization of humanity, as an abstract totality, would not be in the spirit of that ideal. It is only to the individual that a soul is given. And the high destiny of the individual is to serve rather than to rule, or to impose himself in any other way.

"If one looks at the substance rather than at the form, then one can take these words as expressing also the fundamental democratic possition. The true democrat can worship his nation as little as can the man who is religious, in our sense of our term.

"What, then, in all this, is the function of education and of the school? They should help the young person to grow up in such a spirit that these fundamental principles should be to him as the air which he breathes. Teaching alone cannot do that.

"If one holds these high principles clearly before one's eyes, and compares them with the life and spirit of our times, then it appears glaringly that civilized mankind finds itself at present in grave danger. In the totalitarian states it is the rulers themselves who strive actually to destroy that spirit of humanity. In less threatened parts it is nationalism and intolerance, as well as the oppression of the individuals by economic means, which threaten to choke these most precious traditions.

"A realization of how great is the danger is spreading, however, among thinking people, and there is much search for means with which to meet the danger—means in the field of national and international politics, of legislation, of organization in general. Such efforts are, no doubt, greatly needed. Yet the ancients knew something which we seem to have forgotten. All means prove but a blunt instrument, if they have not behind them a living spirit. But if the longing for the achievement of the goal is powerfully alive within us, then shall we not lack the strength to find the means for reaching the goal and for translating it into deeds."

GANDHIJI AND CORRUPTION.

(By J. M. Ganguli, Calcutta.)

In returning to the subject of corruption again this week, I do not feel apologetic in my mind; rather the importance of it and its vital significance on our national welfare impell me to submit further observations relating to it to my readers, and also to draw Gandhiji's attention to facts and issues connected therewith. It is possible that there may be many people and even many thoughtful and educated persons, who are inclined to take rather a lenient view of moral delinquency, disapproving it at the most but not thinking of the part it plays through an individual in his relationship with society and with his workers and associates. Brought up and educated in an environment, where moral lapses are common and standards of honesty and rectitude are conveniently adjustable, and where such lapses and adjustability are taken for granted as not much censorable incidents of civilised life, they even say that in any case immorality need not be a barring disqualification in public leadership.

It is difficult to otherwise convince such people, because they show impatience when asked to take a deeper view of social life and analyse with the causes and conditions on which social health and happiness ultimately rest. With Gandhiji, however, it is quite different. It is his conviction in the essentiality of all round purity of life that has made him so very introspective about his own life and such an inspired moral missionary in his own country and in the world at large. What can, therefore, be there that makes him indulgent with his fellow Congress-workers is a baffling question, which he alone can answer. In the case of the Gandhi Seva Sangha he has laid down strict rules and conditions for ensuring a high degree of morality. In his writings and sayings truth, virtue and morality have formed the principal themes. Politics through untruth and jobbery he has condemned. The spirit of opportunism at the sacrifice of principles he has discountenanced. Satya, ahimsa, fairness and openness in dealings and non-violence in thought, word and deed he has preached and a pure, idealised life he has held before people when introducing the idea of satyagraha in the country's politics. But in actual practice he seems to minimise the significance of them all in the political field, at least so far as his Congress associates are concerned. For a Mahatma to go sympathetically to sinners and to bring them under his personal influence are quite understandable for it is thereby that he can mend them; but for him to overlook their frailties and not to draw their repeated attention to them and to install them in high places of public trust and and leadership, and to back them there by his personal support, can only make people doubt of what he means and look askance at the ideals he glorifies.

Non-violent satyagraha is what he prescribes as the only possible weapon in India's fight for political emancipation, and the necessary conditions for the use of that weapon, he defines, to be truth and ahimsa. But truth and ahimsa are not easy of attainment, and are less so in practice, particularly under circumstances of diverse excitement, provocation, oppression and temptation. For their attainment transparent purity of life and lofty idealism are needed, and for their practice the greatest strength of mind, that comes only through pure and principled life, is a prerequisite.

But it is hardly possible to get people fulfilling the strict conditions of non-violent satyagraha,—one may well argue,—and, therefore, what could Gandhiji do? But, if it be really true that not even a handful (not even fifteen) of such people can be had for leadership and executive functions, with what hope can he sustain his own and other people's faith in the practicability of his doctrine? There have been prophets and religious and moral teachers in the past, in different ages, and, though they did not succeed in raising all people to their own level, they had at least some disciples and followers round them, who had well imbibed the idealism of their preceptor and who could therefore inspire him with hope and confidence in his mission.

There are other aspects of leaders' life also which call for explanation, because of Mahatma Gandhi's not taking serious notice of them. Prohibition and swadeshism, the Congress has been advocating with great insistence, but the callousness of leaders themselves, at least of several of them, in not observing them in their personal lives has not been censored to public knowledge, either by Gandhiji or by the Congress High Command. A Gandhi cap and a khaddar dress in public functions have served as effective cloak for all dirtiness and vices. In fact there are many non-congress men of principles, who observe the above and other tenets of the Congress more scrupulously than those leaders who would drink in private, smoke foreign cigarettes, and use so many foreign articles of luxury. Can all these things have remained unknown to Gandhiji, when they are common knowledge in the street? If not, one cannot imagine on what ground or consideration he has not moved in the matter.

The All-India Congress Committee has just resolved after so many years that people dealing in foreign cloth and foreign goods would be disqualified from leadership; but as to the use of foreign cloth and foreign articles it has said nothing. The banning of their use may cause great inconvenience to may a great leader—some of whom may lose their sleep at the prospect of having to exist without inhaling fumes out of foreign cigarettes,—but would not such use seriously conflict with Congress principles and ideology? One very seriously doubts if even the above half-measure resolution will be strictly enforced. Neither the High Command, nor the Provincial Committees, will have the courage to see to the strict enforcement of the above resolution, for the simple reason that the above executives are much too ridden and strongly influenced by people, who have not their own slates clean, and who are involved in undertakings which would close down under the above resolution.

The truth about the Congress, as appears from a study of its handling by its leading lights, is that under the influence of Gandhiji it has adopted some principles of personal conduct, which its leaders are unable to follow, though they realise the necessity of winning and retaining Gandhian support. Gandhiji may have thought of utilising them for all they were worth in the country's service, while they on their part sought to utilise Gandhiji for coming into political power and influence. It is this duality in aim, that has consciously or sub-consciously held the two sides having widely different outlooks together, which, inspite of all that it has achieved in the growth and development of mass political consciousness, has generated a good deal of demoralising and faith-shaking influence, and has raised impediments in the country's national progress. Let that duality be replaced by an unity in outlook, and for that purpose let Gandhiji seek co-operation from people, who may not have the influence of wealth and position, but who abide by principles of honesty and morality and who would sincerely respond to his ideology. With them he can lay a surer foundation for real though temporarily less glamorous national welfare, and by seeking their association in preference to that of men of weak principles he would strengthen people's faith in virtue and honesty and remove the premium on loose conduct, which his present dispensation of patronage has placed.

It is Gandhiji's apparent slackness in enforcing moral discipline in his co-workers, which has greatly neutralised the good effects of his original moral drive, and, therefore, to regain the valuable lost ground he had to direct his attention and energies again to the matter with uncompromising firmness and irrespective of personalities. That alone will re-create the conditions, which will revive confidence in him in the practicability of wide-scale satyagraha in the country.

THE GOSPELS RE-READ.

(BY C. E. M. JOAD IN THE Spectator.)

Like many another of my generation brought up under the shadow of the Church, on reaching years of discretion I escaped into the sunlight of agnostical doubt; but also, like others of my generation, while discarding the Church and its works, I retained an immense respect for its founder. Jesus might not be the Son of God, but He was a man of the profoundest wisdom, teaching doctrines of the greatest moment. It was, indeed, because of its persistent refusal to attend to these doctrines, that Western civilisation was, I believed, in its present predicament. By "its present predicament" I meant the manifest instability and injustice of capitalist civilisation—I am still summarising a pre-War mood. It was, I suppose, the socialist elements in Jesus' teaching that chiefly evoked my admiration and respect. It was largely because of its failure to take the obviously revolutionary aspects of Jesus's teaching seriously that I condemned the Church. "For God's sake don't touch the Church of England!" said a House of Commons wit at the time of the celebrated debate on the revised Prayer Book, "it is the only thing that stands between us and Christianity." The jibe admirably expressed the attitude of the Left-wing agnostics of whom I am taking myself as a fairly typical representative.

Then came the War. Parsons turned their pulpits into amateur recruiting offices, and in the name of the Prince of Peace preached the doctrines of the God of War. The more inconvenient aspects of Jesus's teachings were suppressed, and those who drew attention to them were persecuted, with the result that, in the words of Bertrand Russell's epigram, "Men were sent to prison.....for expressing disagreement with the Christian religion and agreement with the teaching of Christ." Thus the war confirmed me in my estimate of the value of Jesus's teaching and of the extent of its betrayal by the Church.

With the breath of war again in my nostrils I thought it would be a good thing to refresh my memory of the figure whom I had so long revered, and sat down in a quiet week to read the synoptic gospels. What sort of impression, I wanted to know, did the person and teaching of Jesus make upon a twentieth-century mind which, deliberately eviscerated for the occasion of historical associations and carefully stripped of theological prepossessions, offered itself open and bare to the impact?

The effect was so different from what I had expected that I am still trying to piece together the fragments of my shattered preconceptions. First, as to the story. I had for so long taken for granted the beauty of the gospel narrative that the reality came as something of a shock. I was not prepared for the almost complete absence of form. The three synoptic gospels, composed as they are, of strings of detached sayings and incidents, struck me as naively episodic. Jesus does this, says that, comes here, goes there; but there is no more reason for the sayings and the doings than there is continuity about the comings and the goings. The narrative, in fact, often reads like a holiday diary of the "We went on to the beach; then we bathed; then we had lunch. Mr. X. came to lunch; Mr. X said .. .." type.

The fragmentary character of the narrative bears hardly upon the exposition of doctrine. Important matters are raised, discussed for a few verses, and then dropped, sometimes to be raised again in a later chapter. Jesus is for the most part preaching to simple people; yet His utterances are cryptic to a degree; many I found frankly meaningless. I was also worried by the many inconsistencies: for example, at the Last Supper Jesus bids His disciples buy swords, yet He tells them not to trust to the sword, and when one of them uses it and cuts off a soldier's ear, Jesus rebukes him and heals the ear. He makes supplication for Peter "that thy faith fail not," yet a couple of verses farther on tells him that his faith shall fail to the extent of denying Him thrice. He tells His hearers to "make to yourselves friends by means of the mammon of unrighteousness," yet four verses later tells them that they cannot serve both God and mammon. He frequently dilates upon the eternal torment that awaits sinners, yet says that God will forgive all those who sin.

He makes assertions that have been shown to be untrue; for example, that the end of the world will occur before the contemporary generation has passed away, and that many alive will see Him coming again "in a cloud with Power and great glory." He implies that those who believe in Him will not starve—God feeds the ravens; how much more valuable are men, at any rate believing men, than ravens? The implication is inescapable and Jesus, refusing to escape it, bids His followers take no thought for food and clothing. But millions of Christians have in fact starved.

But it is the character of Jesus Himself that I found most disconcerting. I was astonished at the lack of warrant for the "gentle Jesus meek and mild" conception in which I was nurtured. The figure who appears in the Gospels is a stern and very often an angry man. He is touchily sensitive and liable to break out into torrents of denunciation on what seems to me very inadequate provocation. Thus, when people ask him for a sign which will demonstrate that He is what He claims to be, He calls them a generation of vipers. This is unjust. There is surely no merit in believing without evidence; why, then, these bitter reproaches when evidence is asked for? It may, of course, be said that the evidence was internal; it was there for those who had eyes to see, in the personality of Jesus. But Jesus did not feel this Himself, else why the passionate anxiety to be recognised which He displays throughout the narrative; the frequent promises of rewards to those who accept him at His own valuation, the direful punishments threatened against those who do not? This bribing of men into belief—confess Me before men, and I will confess you before the angels of God—this blackmailing of the recalcitrant by threats——if you deny me, I shall deny you. And then? Apparently, you will burn in hell; the references to eternal torment are quite unequivocal ——I found peculiarly disconcerting. Recognise Me, or it will be the worse for you, is not the sort of thing that one expects from the founder of the religion of love, but though Jesus continually preaches the virtues of loving, I can find little evidence that He practised them. He shows affection for two or three of the Disciples and for small children, and He is kind to erring women, but, broadly speaking, that is all. He is exceedingly harsh to His mother and, much to my astonishment, actually bids His followers hate their fathers, mothers, wives, children and brethren (Luke XV, 26). Finally, He is markedly anti-intellectual; He abuses men of learning, denounces the critical attitude in order to throw into favourable relief that of unquestioning acceptance, and tells people that it is only if they become as little children and, therefore, as innocent and, presumably, as ignorant as little children that they can hope to understand Him and be saved.

Having said so much, I had better hasten to make such shift as I can to shelter myself from coming storms by concluding with certain admissions.

First, I admit that I have left out all the ethical plums. Nobody admires the Beatitudes more than I do, and I agree that it is for lack of the spirit that informs the teaching of the Sermon on the Mount that the world today rushes to destruction. But the plums, I insist, really are plums; they stick out, and the context from which they stick out seems to me to be of very common dough. Also I suspect that the plums will be found to be the common denominator of many of the great religions and to appear in the teachings of Lao Tse and Buddha no less than in that of Jesus. It is indeed when He is most individual that Jesus seems to me most unsatisfactory.

I am also aware of the existence of a branch of enquiry—or should I say, a corpus of knowledge?—entitled Biblical Criticism, which has accumulated a formidable body of conclusions. I am prepared to be told that in the light of these conclusions, the passages to which I have taken most exception either (I) do not mean what they say, but are to be interpreted symbolically; or (ii) are later interpolations, and that the most obnoxious of them are not to be found in Mark or in Q, Q being the presumed source of that which is common to Matthew and Luke, but not to Mark. But all this and much more in the same vein is not to the point, which is the kind of impression that the gospel story makes upon a lay, and therefore uninstructed, reader. This story has been historically presented not as a work of high scholarship to be understood only by men of high learning, but as revealed religious truth to be simply accepted by the multitude. Jesus, Himself, as I have pointed out, chides men of learning and bids us empty as well as open our minds before we come to him. I should not, then, take kindly to the suggestion that it is only those who are instructed the conclusions of the Biblical Criticism who can derive benefit from the gospels.

PROHIBITION AND BOMBAY'S COAST.

An obstacle in the path of rendering prohibition effective within the three mile limit of the shore of the Bombay island has just been removed.

The Government of India, it is reliably understood, has conveyed to the Bombay Government their willingness to co-operate in the matter of enforcement of prohibition within the three-mile limit from the shore. This area according to international law, comes under the jurisdiction of the Government of India. But in view of the communication from the Central Government, police launches of the Bombay Government will be patrolling the sea up to three miles from the shore from the midnight of Jnly 31, in search of boats or ships which carry liquor or toddy. The Bombay Government will have jurisdiction in this area only for purposes of Prohibition.

The Government of Bombay, it is understood, will have a further advantage regarding this limit near the Colaba point. There is an island called the Canary Island belonging to the Bombay Government at a distance of about 4 miles from the Colaba point. The three mile limit according to law, will extend from the shore of this island also so that the area for purposes of prohibition at this point will be about seven miles from the shore of the Bombay island.

Anti-Prohibitionists who, according to reports, have been planning for a "floating island" which can serve as a moving bar that can be stationed at any convenient point beyond the three miles limit, will be solely disappointed to learn about a further handicap in their way. According to law, no ship will be allowed to anchor, so as to cause obstruction in the sea routes for ships between Bombay and the overseas ports. The routes being many in number, anti-prohibitionists will find it difficult to fix up a spot where they could defy law.

INDIA AND THE WORLD.

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

In the leader on 'India and the Democracies' published in the Indian Social Reformer dated June 24, 1939, occurs the following: "Her ways of thought fundamentally differ in important respects from the British and American. She has pondered long and deeply on the problem of unity underlying diversity and she feels that she has the key to it which Europeans and Americans do not have."

Judging from the very name of your paper, and its long and useful cause for nearly two generations, it may be presumed that you have in your mind some ideas which are not exhausted by the words Ascetism and the Immanence of God. Nothing clarifies so well as definition and differentiation and also a brief explanation of the practical consequences of following the given truth or conception. It will greatly help me and other readers of your valuable paper to understand the meaning and implication of the above quotation if you will kindly take the trouble of giving your views on the following matters also.

Kindly state more comprehensively and definitely what the key is which non-Indians do not possess; and how it differs from the keys offered by European and American thinkers? What would be the natural consequences in Economics, in Sociology, and in politics, both in India and in the world if this key or truth is generally accepted and followed. Please differentiate it, if there is a difference, both from Jesus' message of loving your neighbour as yourself and Gandhi's Satyagraha and non-violence.

Some of the practical issues which require elucidation are, how this truth would solve the Hindu Moslem dispute in India so as to weld these two communities into a single nation with that extent of social consolidation which exists in Europe and in China or Japan, and how it would help in improving inter-racial and inter-national relations. The great and vital question as to whether complete pacifism or defence against aggression is the more practical policy has also to be answered in the light of this Indian conception of the truth. It has to be stated here that the apostles of non-violence who are governing eight provinces are not following it. They rely on the Police and the military and some of them are introducing military training in the colleges.

Your vast experience and knowledge will give very great weight to your views on these vital questions and they will make clear the full meaning of the above quotation.

Yours etc.,

Kottayyam. K. CHANDY.

[Mr. Chandy is in too great ahurry. He misses our point which is that, if and when the opportunity comes for India to sit in council with the other nations in her free, individual capacity, she will be able to furnish the key to the problems which confront the world. India has not that opportunity now. She has no free access to the international Round Table. Such access as she has, is purely formal. International harmony can never be secured on the British and American lines, namely, that they should get everything and give nothing for the purpose of peace. Renuciation is the key to Peace. Until the Great Powers, that is, the Powers which have succeeded in cornering the material resources of the world, seek the path of renunciation, it is not possible for them to contribute anything to the great end.

As for Hindu-Muslim unity, scores of instances can be produced to show that the two communities did not in the past regard themselves and do not now regard themselves as antagonists. It is the politicians who are doing their best to propagate such an impression, the Congress no less than the Muslim League. We assure Mr. Chandy that in spite of everything, there never was a time when there were so many men and women in both communities who cherish cordial feelings towards each other and who are absolutely unmoved by the cajoleries and fulminations of the politicians.

We do not want to be dragged into a discussion about Jesus Christ in this connection. Ed. I. S. R.]

PROHIBITION IN THE CENTRAL PROVINCES.*

The total prohibition of liquor was introduced in certain parts of the Central Provinces and Berar on the 1st January 1938, and although quarterly press notes reviewing the progress made have been issued from time to time it is felt that it would be convenient for the public to have the results for the year as a whole summarised in one place together with an indication of the main factors bearing on the position. The following review of the working of total prohibition in the province during the excise year 1938 is therefore published.

The decision to substitute a policy of immediate prohibition for the former policy of gradual and ultimate prohibition was taken in August 1937 with a full realisation of the difficult administrative and financial problems involved. It was realised that the old policy had nearly broken down under the stress of the economic depression and had given rise to widespread illicit distillation on a commercial scale, the control of which was imposing a severe strain on the resources of the Excise Department.

The special measures taken to ensure the success of prohibition included one of primary importance, viz. the transfer of the duty of enforcing the Act to the police. The object was to remove any possible misapprehension that the prohibition law would not be enforced with the same strictness as the ordinary penal laws. This decision, however, was not taken till the middle of the year and owing to administrative difficulties there was some delay in implementing it; in Katni-Murwara the transfer of responsibility having taken place as late as November 1938. The tour of the Hon'ble Minister in charge undertaken with the specific object of inaugurating prohibition in the different areas created considerable local enthusiasm, but propaganda by means of lectures, through magic lanterns, posters, placards, leaflets, etc. has largely been confined to official efforts. There was some inevitable delay in the beginning in the formation of statutory Anti-Drink Committees, and progress in their taking up their duties has been slow. There is a committee for each town and each revenue inspector's circle, and instructions were issued in the latter half of the year for directing the activities of these committees. Considerable assistance in weaning addicts from the liquor has been received, from the Indian Tea Market Expansion Board, who have 13 stalls in the dry areas from which cups of tea are distributed free and which, it is reported, are very largely patronised. Financial stringency has, however, stood in the way of the development of what may be called the constructive side of prohibition. It has not been possible to promote on any appreciable scale rural uplift activity particularly in the direction of organising counter attractions to drink such as sports clubs and recreation centres. The matter is, however, receiving attention. A football club has been organised for sweepers at Hinganghat; and the Anti-Drink Committee has resolved to instal a radio for the recreation of addicts. The Bednera Anti-Drink Committee has decided to hold rural dramas near the free tea stalls on pay days. Owing to its preoccupation with its own present problems the Co-operative Department was also unable to attempt any thing in the way of starting better living or thrift societies.

As prohibition in the province extends only to liquor there was anxiety that there might be a diversion of custom to denatured spirit, opium or hemp drugs. Such diversion of custom as has been noticed has not, however, been serious except in Saugor where the consumption of charas and bhang has risen steadily since the introduction of prohibition. This is perhaps due to the fact that the Saugor district has always been particularly open to the influence of charas on account of easy communication with the northern provinces where the charas habit is prevalent. Though a slight decline in the consumption of these drugs was noticed towards the end of the year, there are reasons to believe that some of the former liquor addicts have taken to the drug habit. The misuse of denatured spirit for purposes of drink was specially noticeable at Katni in the beginning of the period under review. Persistent watch over the sales, and the recent introduction of stringent rules have, however, succeeded in bringing down the sales to their normal level. In order to prevent sale by the licensee to undesirable persons, the licence for the sale of denatured spirit for 1939 has been issued in Katni to a member of the ocal Anti-Drink Committee.

The organization of a satisfactory system of intelligence which is the basis of any real appreciation of the situation and of effective administrative action, has taken some time to complete. The reported facts on which the review is based might possibly have been incomplete but even with this qualification it seems clear that on the whole prohibition has had encouraging results. During the first quarter of the year a few addicts left Akot in search of places in which prohibition had not been extended. From Hinganghat, two fatal case were reported arising out of nervous exhaustion owing to unsatisfied craving for drink. A small proportion of addicts take advantage of any legitimate opportunity of obtaining drink in wet areas within reach but there is sufficient evidence to show that the greater proportion of liquor addicts have definitely given up drinking. Whether this result is due merely to lack of opportunity or also to a mental reformation it is too early to say. It is certain, however, that whatever may be the attitude of the present generation, a new generation is growing up in the dry areas who will not be familiar with liquor and its degradation. There is also evidence to show that family life has improved as a result of prohibition. The families of ex-addicts have benefitted financially to the extent of about Rs. 4½ lakhs. Systematic enquiries have been made by local officials into the financial conditions of such families and the general finding has emerged that several families have repaid debts or purchased ornaments or clothes and are better fed and dressed. Enquiries showed that several addicts used to spend a considerable proportion of their earnings on liquor and that the saving of this ruinous expenditure has made a marked difference to the happiness of the family, particularly from the women's point of view. The gratitude of several addicts has found expression in letters of thanks to Government for the introduction of prohibition. Prohibition, calculated as it is, to bring about an improvement in the efficiency of labour, should have a particularly enthusiastic backing by proprietors of industrial concerns.

THE TRADITIONAL HOME OF THE SANDALWOOD TREE.

It is in perfumery that the greater proportion of Sandalwood Oil is employed at the present day and to discriminating buyers, such as perfumers and soap manufacturers must of necessity be, it is hardly necessary to extol the virtues of the East Indian Oil which is without equal, both as a fine perfume base and a fixative for the increasingly popular bouquets of the Oriental type. In addition it is now being used extensively, and with marked success, in the creation of some of the more delicate perfumes in which the Sandalwood odour is not required as a predominant character.

A few trials will convince the perfumer who has not taken full advantage of the odour-value of this oil, that is of the greatest use to him, not only for predominant Sandalwood odour where required, but also a modifier and a fixative for other odours. This is true for liquid perfumes, soaps, creams, powders and all other cosmetic preparations. It will be found invaluable to those up-to-date perfumers who pride themselves on their own "creations."

Bombay Government and Hyderabad Satyagraha:—A Bombay Government communique dated the 23rd June announces that:

> In view of an assurance given by a deputation of Arya Samaj leaders to co-operate with Government in maintaining peace in Sholapur District and to carry on their work in connection with the Satyagraha in the Hyderabad State without giving offence to any person or community, Government has decided to lift the ban on the entry of jathas of Arya Samaj volunteers or Satyagrahis into Sholapur District, with the exception of the Municipal limits of Sholapur City. The District Magistrate, Sholapur, has been requested to modify his order of 22nd May 1939 accordingly.

The Bombay Government has in this instance acted without an adequate sense of its responsibility to a neighbouring State. "Work in connection with satyagraha," it knows as well as anyone else, is nothing but disobeying constituted authority in Hyderabad. The lifting of the ban on Arya Samaj volunteers bent on satyagraha in Hyderabad, to our mind, is tantamount to aiding their unlawful activities. The assurance which is said to have been given by a deputation to co-operate with Government in maintaining peace in the Sholapur district, implies the admission that Government could not discharge this elementary function in the district without the help of the satyagrahis. We did not know that things had come to such a pass. As for carrying out the work 'in connection with satyagraha' in the Hyderabad State without giving offence to any person or community, Government should know that this work is nothing but shouting slogans and making speeches which have led in the past and must in the future lead to breaches of the peace. The Leader of June 28 reports the proceedings of a Muslim meeting at Allahabad at which it was declared that unless the satyagraha volunteers ceased invading Hyderabad, Muslim volunteers will be sent to carry on a counter-satyagraha propaganda. We do not see how the Bombay Government can refuse to extend to the Muslim jathas the same hospitality as it is extending to the Arya Samajists. Or the jathas may enter Sholapur through Hyderabad and there engage in the same kind of work in connection with satyagraha, as the Aryas in the Nizam's Dominions. Will the Bombay Government sit quiet then or will it requisition the help of Aryas to maintain peace in Sholapur? The decision of Government is deplorably short-sighted. The Madras and Punjab Governments have prohibited agitation in connection with the satyagraha in Hyderabad in their respective provinces under the Princes Protection Act. It is the plain duty of the Bombay Government to do the same. They have, instead, given their sanction to the Arya Samaj satyagraha in a neighbouring State fully aware, as they can not but be, that the satyagrahis' object in entering the State is to break the law. The Aryas' professed object is to get certain alleged religious disabilities of theirs removed. Without entering into the merits of their grievance, it may strike the onlooker that a sect which has, with scarcely five thousand adherents in a population of twelve million, 150 centres in the State, cannot be suffering from any serious restriction on its religious propaganda which obviously does not attract the mass of the Hyderabad people.

The "Dnyanodaya" and Religious Presecution:—Although the Dnyanodaya has not acknowledged directly that the religious persecutions of Christians in the Nizam's Dominions were, as we suggested, not authorised by Government and were the acts of a mob, we learn now that that was really the fact and that Mr. Edwards' reference was in no way meant as a reflection on the administration. The attitude of the Nizam's Government to baptised or unbaptised Christians is in no way a parallel to the Portuguese official and religious treatment of non-Catholics under the Inquisition; or to the treatment of Jews by Nazi Germany today. Mr. Edwards, we are sure, would be the first to admit the difference between the attitude adopted by a community towards those who voluntarily choose to go out of its fold, and the active participation of the State in the work of proselytising. As Mr. Edwards has declined to furnish us with the alleged facts of religious persecution, we are not in a position to comment on them. We distrust stories of persecution generally, because the new converts to a different faith are often provocative in their practice of it and are often encouraged in their aggressive attitude by the missionary. As an example we print below the following news item extracted from another religious journal by the Baptist Missionary Review with evident approval:

> Public bonfires of fetishes, charms, ancestral sticks, and "spirit-worship paraphernalia," together with public profession of faith in Jesus Christ, are becoming numerous in the Alur and Lendu region of the Belgian Congo. In a recent report from Rethi, Mr. E. A. Winsor, of the Africa Inland Mission, writes that over fifty families around one out-school centre have given us their "Jok things." Such burnings were held on two successive Sundays at the nearest village.

If our Christian friends would reverse the process and ask themselves what they would feel if "converted" families in the centre of their community launched a crusade against their cherished beliefs, they might appreciate the position of the "persecutors." Even the most innocent-minded reader cannot expect the unconverted tribes who still worship in the old way, to join in the Baptist Review's pleasure at the religious zeal of their apostates. But this is just what our missionary friends seem to expect. The Indian Witness, as we pointed out two weeks back, rather naively reproached us for "defending" Hinduism. This is a refined variant of the usual complaint. Mr. Edwards' instances of persecution may probably be orthodox zeal provoked by the apostate's enthusiasm for the new faith. They may be, for all we know, persecutions. Since Mr. Edwards has decided not to continue the discussion, there is no chance of the public finding out the facts.

A Scandalous Case:—The facts of the case recently decided by the Sessions Judge of Dehra Dun, the report of which in the Leader of Allhabad we reproduce today, furnish a lurid illustration of the social chaos which is overtaking India as the result of the blind bigotry of orthodoxy on the one hand and of hasty and ill-considered social legislation on the other. The widow of a wealthy Jain of the place, prevented by caste custom from remarrying or the fear of losing her interests in her husband's property if she remarried, resorted to the device of taking a paramour under the guise of driver of her motor car. She had a young daughter who was under the guardianship of her own father. She took the girl from him on the pretext of going on a pilgrimage. At the place in which the three settled down, the chauffeur-paramour, a Punjabi Brahman, plied the mother and daughter with liquor and, when the former became drunk, raped the daughter. The mother when her girl complained to her, forbade her daughter to mention the matter to her grandfather. After an abortion, the driver and the girl were rushed to a neighbouring Indian State, where they were, it was stated, converted to the Arya Samaj and married under the Arya Marriage Act! That the man had a wife and children, did not apparently prevent the marriage under the Arya Marriage Act. The "Satyartha Prakash" emphatically lays down that an Arya marriage is strictly monogamous but present-day Aryas have ignored this injunction and within the last few months we have noticed several cases in which the Arya rites and law have been used to celebrate polygamous marriages. When the grandfather came to know of this scandal, he lodged a complaint and the Judge, fortunately, saw through the nefarious transaction and sentenced the mother and her paramour to two and three years' rigorous imprisonment respectively. The attention of the leaders of the Arya Samaj has been repeatedly called to abuses of the kind illustrated in this case, but they seem to be indifferent to the consequences of such abuse on the character of the Arya Samaj as a religious and moral movement.

Cawnpore's Co-educational Experiment:—Some time back a minor sensation was caused by the news that Christ Church College of Cawnpore had closed its doors to women students. Mr. S. C. Chatterji, the Principal of the College, has issued a statement to the press on the reasons which necessitated this drastic step, in order to meet the rumours and exaggerated statements which have gained currency. We print the statement elsewhere. Mr. Chatterji's defence, however, is in many places illogical and it is fundamentally built up on wrong premises. He says:

> Christ Church College is a college for men students. It has never attempted co-education. Indeed, I do not know of any university or college in India which has. For the last ten or twelve years, however, I have permitted a limited number of women students to attend lectures at my college, and I am happy that during this period about twenty women have graduated from the College and a similar number have passed the intermediate examination.

Mr. Chatterji's ignorance of co-educational institutions in India is strange and inexcusable in one who has himself been experimenting for over twelve years in co-education. Had Mr. Chatterji given up the ambition of figuring as a pioneer and troubled to look into educational records, he would have saved himself from displaying such stupendous ignorance. It is even now not too late—late though it undoubtedly is—for Mr. Chatterji to study conditions in the Bombay Presidency where, though we have a University for women, we have not, and have never had, a separate college for men from which girl students are excluded. As for the position of Christ Church College, we presume the Principal ought to know what it exactly is. But his description of it as never having attempted co-education, seems to conflict with his remark lower down that several girls graduated out of the institution and that he had permitted them to attend the lectures. If, in spite of the presence of women students, Mr. Chartterji persists in calling Christ Church a men's college, we can only infer that, like the women members of Bernard Shaw's "Ibsen Club," they were accepted by Mr. Chatterji as "unwomanly women." Everything in the Principal's statement seems to show that the girls who were admitted, were allowed every facility that the boys received at Christ Church. Mr. Chatterji gives the impression that he used a higher standard in admitting women than he did in taking in men, when he says he "permitted" some girls to join the college.

The Ban on Women Students:—The inference that every boy who matriculated had a right to admission into Christ Church while the admission of any girl depended on the special sanction of Mr. Chatterji, can only be settled when he publishes the figures for the number of women who applied and whom he refused to admit. Until then the question of Mr. Chatterji's authority suddenly to close down the College to a section of its students remains a matter for controversy. The reason for doing so is, however, another issue. Mr. Chatterji urges that, because the boys of Christ Church were getting uncontrollable in their behaviour towards women, whether in college or outside, he had to close the College to women. This is a damaging admission. On the face of it, it appears to be a severe indictment of the men students. In fact, some of the Lucknow newspapers have attacked or supported Mr. Chatterji for penalising one group of students for the faults of another group. But the implications of the statement, along with the action taken, are that Mr. Chatterji, for all the care he had exercised in admitting women, has come to the conclusion that he had not attracted the right type and that the women students were to blame for the disorders of the College. If the behaviour of Christ Church's young men points to lack of discipline, the Principal's belief that the exclusion of women would solve the present troubles of his College, indicates no less a condemnation of the girl students. Mr. Chatterji even seems to imply that the molestation of the women typists of the Employers' Association will now cease. An educational institution is not a shop for peddling knowledge. If the head of it himself admits that, both as regards men and women students, it has not succeeded in bringing out the best in them, the institution stands condemned as a failure. Mr. Chatterji should boldly face the issues involved.

The Madras Premier on Bombay Prohibition:—The Bombay Board of Prohibition Propaganda got up a public meeting at the Cowasjee Jehangir Hall on Sunday to hear the Madras Prime Minister denounce the anti-Prohibitionists in this city who had nominated him for the Bombay Premiership on the strength of some observations which he had made in the course of a speech in Madras explaining why he had not introduced Prohibition in Madras City. Mr. Rajagopalacharya had argued in Madras that it was difficult to prevent smuggling in a seaport. In Bombay he enlarged on the stupendous task in his province of guarding each one of two million toddy trees from being tapped for liquor. The Bombay scheme, he maintained, was a simpler one than the Madras scheme. He incidentally mentioned that in Madras the cost of Prohibition was met by the whole province and not by the area where it was introduced. This is the right principle and the Bombay Government would have saved itself much of the criticism directed against its taxation plan if it had also followed it.

Mr. Ganguli and Congress Corruption:—We publish this week Mr. J. M. Ganguli's feeling article on "The Congress and Corruption." Mr. Ganguli apparently has first-hand knowledge of corruption in the Congress and to him the word evidently means much more than mere political manipulations of election votes. As we have not the information which he has, we have had necessarily to omit a number of sentences. Mr. Ganguli touches on an important aspect of the subject without, we are afraid, quite realising the implications of it. He postulates that all national leaders were self-seeking and bordering on the vicious, if not actually so, before Gandhiji's entry into politics; and he wonders why national leaders today are not models of virtue. There is a pathetic faith in Mr. Ganguli in the power of one man to transform politics. We believe that Mr. Ganguli's suspicions are greatly exaggerated. But if they are not, then what is there surprising in persons who before were ingeniously hoodwinking the masses, now exploiting Gandhiji as well as the masses? In fact, Gandhiji has simplified their problem by persuading the public that the English-speaking, English-tailored Indian is not the real nationalist but the khadi-clad, Hindi orator who can now address larger crowds and win a reputation for simplicity at the same time. The fiery orations and tub-thumping have been a greater factor in the making of national leaders today than they were thirty years ago and it is inevitable that it should be so. The only thing is that fewer people were interested in politics then and a politician could do less harm than he can today when politics is the fashion. It is unfortunate that Gandhiji's repeated emphasis on truth and non-violence has had two evil effects on the masses and on several educated men as well: The first is a conviction that, before the Gandhian epoch, all Indian politicians were crooked when they were not blood-thirsty terrorists; second, that all the men now in the Congress leadership are men of angelic virtue. When a particular leader falls short of this standard, the worst inferences are drawn. Congressmen, after benefitting from the first of these impressions, are now suffering from the second. Mr. Ganguli's suggestion that the public should be invited to place their suspicions before Gandhiji, would convert the Congress from a political organization into a religous order. There would be little time for any work other than that of purification.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER
BOMBAY, July 1, 1939.

SOUTH AFRICAN INDIAN SITUATION.

The papers received last week-end from South Africa, disclose a complex situation which those who wish to uphold the Indian cause in that country, should do their best to understand before advising Indians there as to their course of action. The measure which is the immediate cause of the present agitation is the Asiatic (Transvaal) Land and Trading Bill which was introduced in the Union Parliament by the Minister of the Interior on May 5. It passed its third reading without a division on June 1st. Its objects and reasons are described clearly and fairly in a statement by Mr. M. S. Nana, Secretary, Transvaal Indian Congress, published in Indian Views of June 2. Indian Views is one of the two Anglo-Gujarati weeklies published in Durban, the other being Indian Opinion founded by Gandhiji and edited by Mr. Manilal Gandhi. The Bill, says Mr. Nana, first of all extends the protection of Indians residing in the goldfields to 30th April 1941. Clause 2 briefly provides that no new licences shall be granted to Indians for two years, commencing 1st May, 1939, and clause 3 prohibits Asiatics from occupying any property which was not already occupied by Asiatics on the 30th April, 1939. Clause 4 provides that the Minister can grant exemptions both from the provisions of Clause 2 and Clause 3. In general, Mr. Nana observes, the effect of these provisions would mean that no Asiatics would be able to obtain trading licences, or occupy land at present occupied by Europeans, but could do one or both with the permission of the Minister of the Interior, and that these restrictions would apply for a period of two years, when they would automatically lapse.

The Union Government have announced that they intend to bring in comprehensive legislation to segregate Europeans from non-Europeans, the latter including "coloured", Indians and Africans. They have postponed doing so for the present, pending discussions with the Government of India regarding the position of Indians as it will be affected by the proposed measure. Mr. Nana explains that the present Bill is based on the apprehension on the part of the Union Government that Indians in the Transvaal would create new vested interests in European areas "as was done in 1919" during the interval.

The Transvaal Indian Congress has within it a section known as the "Nationalist group" led by Mr. Yusuf M. Dadoo and this group had independently decided to launch a Passive Resistance movement against the Bill. The main body of the Transvaal Indian Congress (there are besides the Natal Indian Congress, the Cape Indian Congress and the South African Indian Congress) has not endorsed this decision and Mr. Nana's statement explains the reasons for its not doing so. There is no difference of opinion among Indians in South Africa that the measure is unjust and repressive and that for two years it will cause considerable hardship to the Transvaal Indians. The main body of the Transvaal Indian Congress does not reject Passive Resistance as unsuitable and ineffective. It holds that it may have to be undertaken but that that time will come when a measure is introduced to impose permanent disabilities. The Minister of the Interior has given an assurance that the Indian position will not be prejudiced by the present measure and that Government will not necessarily be bound by its principles in framing the permanent measure. The Minister of the Interior has also declared that it will be the endeavour of Government to secure for their future legislation the consent and co-operation of the non-European communities. On this assurance which was given in response to his appeal, Mr. Hofmeyr voted with Government. Mr. Nana would accept this assurance and endeavour by all constitutional ways to protect the rights of Indians. His principal reason for disfavouring Passive Resistance at this stage is that it will estrange friendly Europeans and leave Government wholly under the thumb of extremist opinion. Mr. Nana concludes:

> It is very doubtful, in the prevailing atmosphere in this country, and the reflex of conditions existent in continental Europe, where concentration camps have become the rule rather than the exception, whether passive resistance would prove an efficacious weapon. Failure of the movement will result in still further deterioration of the Indian situation, and consequently it should not be resorted to on this interim legislation. The Indian community should accept the invitation of the Union Government to explore the possibility of arriving at a solution which may be acceptable to both sides.

This statesmanlike view has been endorsed by the Cape Indian Congress and the South African Indian Congress to which the three provincial Congresses are affiliated. The National Indian Congress empatically denies that there has been Indian penetration into European residential areas, repudiates any intention to depart from this practice, and resents the stigma implied in passing a law to enforce "segregation" upon Indians. It may, therefore, be taken to represent the predominant Indian opinion in South Africa.

The redeeming feature in a depressing situation is the weight and volume of European opinion in South Africa against compulsory segregation of coloured people. Here it should be noted that the present movement differs essentially from the previous anti-Indian measures, in that it comprehends all non-Europeans. It is indeed particularly directed against the "coloured" or mixed population, which is by far the largest single non-European group in South Africa. There is already legislation segregating the Africans. It is the present policy of the Union Government to put Coloured and Indians on the same footing. This is the assurance the Union Prime Minister,

General Hertzog, is said to have given to a deputation of the A. P. O. which waited on him to discuss the Segregation policy. It was given specifically for the Cape Province where the coloured have the parliamentary franchise. To return to the European opposition to compulsory segregation. The resignation of Messrs. Hofmeyer and Blackwell, important members of the Government party, is significant. Others outside Parliament have expressed their opposition to the policy. Important organs of European opinion, like the Cape Times and the Rand Daily Mail, leaders of the Christian Churches, and the principal women's organizations in the country, have all objected to the proposal in greater or less measure. When Mr. Nana speaks of antagonising European opinion it is to these influential circles that he refers. Given these they are bound to widen and exert greater influence than at present on the Government. The adoption of Passive Resistance will prevent this desirable development. Mr. Nana in his concluding remarks which we have quoted, gravely doubts whether Passive Resistance will be successful in the present conditions in South Africa and on the European continent. The Rand Daily Mail is more explicit:

> We are still convinced that passive resistance would be a tactical mistake of the first order. It has, of course, been employed with success, in the Union, by Indians. But that was thirty years ago, and then Liberalism was "in the air." Liberalism is no longer in the air, and the background of opinion which helped Mahatma Gandhi to success does not exist to-day. This, we think, is to be regretted, but it is none the less a fact, and the sooner the Indians realise it the more likely will they be to avoid a type of action which will only recoil on themselves.

Indian Opinion which is impatient at the delay in starting Passive Resistance, admits that circumstances thirty years ago were all favourable to Gandhiji and that they are less favourable now. But it thinks that Gandhiji will not admit that the circumstances weighed much with Gandhiji and insists that they should not weigh with the present leaders. Notwithstanding the greater opportunities of the Editor of Indian Opinion to know Gandhiji's mind, we doubt if he is right here. In this country at least Passive Resistance, Civil Disobedience, Satyagraha or whatever it is called, has always been carefully regulated with reference to circumstances. Gandhiji has said that Civil Disobedience cannot be started now in India. We doubt whether the conditions in South Africa are more favourable to Civil Disobedience.

CONGRESS AND INDIANS OVERSEAS.

The All-India Congress Committee which met in Bombay this week passed a conciliatory resolution on the present trouble of Indians in South Africa. It praised the steadfastness and courage of Indians, exhorted them to be united in their action, pointed out to the Union Government that their anti-Indian policy "just initiated" was in conflict with the assurances given by their predecessors and ended with an appeal to them to retrace their steps and carry out the policy of their predecessors. An amendment adding that Indians in South Africa should co-operate with "coloured" and native Africans in opposing the Segregation policy was supported by Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru, accepted by the mover, Mr. Bhulabhai Desai, and adopted by the All India Congress Committee. But shortly after, the Pandit brought a message from Gandhiji that the amendment was unacceptable and should be dropped; and it was dropped! Gandhiji in opposing the amendment does not seem to have been aware of recent developments in South Africa. The Government have declared that they propose to treat Indians on the same footing as the "coloured" in Cape Colony and it may be assumed the same principle will be followed elsewhere in the Dominion. Thus it would appear that Indians are in a sense being forced to act with the other non-Europeans. More than that some meetings have been held, notably one of women, in which all the three communities have taken part. The Indian Opinion, while postulating that Indians should preserve their identity, foreshadows that the non-Europeans will have to act together against the Segregation policy. The present policy, as pointed out in the current issue of Round Table, is primarily one for "racial purity" and is directed principally against the coloured who form the largest non-European minority in South Africa. They are described as "a blend of various racial stocks, imported negroid and Oriental slaves, Hottentot and Bushmen, aborigines and Europeans." Their total number in South Africa is 768,000 of which nearly 90 per cent live in the Cape province. They are also the most thoroughly westernised and enjoyed till some years back the same political rights as Europeans. A movement composed of the Coloured, the Indians and the Africans, will necessarily be an African and not an Indian movement, but this seems inevitable, if the Government pursue the policy of segregating Europeans and non-Europeans in two groups. As a matter of fact, this has already happened in Kenya. Africans and Indians have joined together in the Highlands League which has been formed to oppose the segregation policy of the Europeans, after the recent Order-in-Council by which the Government accepted the principle.

The resolution of the All India Congress Committee on the agitation in Ceylon is in the same spirit as our leading article on the subject in the Reformer of June 10. The resolution runs:

> The All-India Congress Committee views with grave concern the measures proposed by the Ceylon Government with reference to their Indian employees and hopes that it may be possible to find a way to avoid the most undesirable and grave conflict that, as a result of these measures, is threatened between such near and ancient neighbours as India and Ceylon. The Committee cannot contemplate without much concern a quarrel between the two countries which are separated only by a strip of water, which have a common culture and which have been intimately connected from time immemorial. The Committee desires to explore every means of avoiding a conflict and therefore appoints Pandit Jawaharial Nehru to go to Ceylon and confer with authorities, representative associations and individuals on behalf of the Working Committee and do all that may be possible to effect a just and honourable settlement.

The action of the Ceylon Government which is the immediate cause of the present agitation, is the contemplated dismissal of some 10,000 Indians employed on daily wages. This is evidently a part of a scheme of retrenchment with a view to find employment for unemployed Ceylonese, Sinhalese and Tamil. The sudden throwing out of such a large number, would cause considerable hardship and destitution. If, as has been stated, many of these men are domiciled in Ceylon, and in several cases have married Sinhalese women, they must be regarded as Ceylonese and should not be deprived of their work on the ground that they are Indians. Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru will no doubt press this point. But as regards Indians who are not domiciled in Ceylon, he can do little, unless he is in a position to offer some compensating advantage to Ceylon, either in the way of trade or other facilities. This he can not do unless he has the support of the Government of India and can speak for the Government and not merely for the Congress. It is possible that the Congress Working Committee has been in touch with the Government and has reason to believe that the terms which the Pandit might propose will be approved and given effect to by the Government of India. In the absence of some such understanding, the danger of Government and the Congress emissary working at cross purposes can not be left out of account. It has to be borne in mind that Ceylon is under the Colonial Office in London which of late has not been over friendly to this country. The simultaneous emergence of anti-Indian movements in several colonies has led to a suspicion that there may be some underground forces at work to the prejudice of India. Pandit Jawaharlal will be able to judge if there is any ground for this suspicion.

ARCHBISHOP ROBERTS ON THE ETHICS OF PROHIBITION.

In his speech at the Rotary luncheon and in his letter to Gandhiji, Archbishop Roberts expounded the politics and the economics of his opposition to Prohibition. In a statement published in the Examiner of June 24 he deals with the Ethics of Prohibition—that is to say, he exposes what, according to his view, is the unethical character of Prohibition. As the Archbishop believes in total abstinence and has himself in this statement pledged himself and the European priests in his jurisdiction to total abstinence, and as Prohibition is only a way of bringing about the same result in the whole population of the Bombay province, the difference between the Archbishop and the Prohibitionists is a difference not of principle but of method. One may travel to Bombay from Bandra by train, or bus or motor car. For many years the train was the only means available to most residents of the suburbs. Now we have three. Soon we may have a fourth, by aeroplane. The Yogi in all ages has claimed to be able to traverse vast distances by merely willing it. He had found a secret which did away with space and time which hamper ordinary mortals. All these, however, are only means to the same end. The Archbishop and his European priests have achieved by their pledge what Government hopes to achieve by Prohibition among his Indian priests and laymen along with the rest of the population. We fail to see where the ethical issue comes in.

His Grace, however, has chosen to argue the question on the ethical ground and we shall try to meet him on it. The Archbishop starts by repudiating the analogy made out by Gandhiji between the trade in drink and the trade in women. We showed in last week's Reformer that the two are organically related to each other. During the years that Prohibition was in force in the United States prostitution showed a marked decrease and we have no doubt, whatever, that a similiar result may be expected in Bombay. We can say much more to establish the organic relation between commercialised vice and the commerce in liquor but we should not keep the Archbishop waiting. His Grace rests his Ethics on eight propositions which he calls, principles. They are :

1. God made man.
2. God's gifts to men include drink.
3. God gave men an appetite for drink.
4. God gave men reason by which to decide whether to drink, what and when to drink.

5. Reason requires a man to decide in the light of his Creator's purpose; this purpose includes the practice of temperance and of respect for all the rights of others.

6. This respect for other's rights cannot in practice be left to individuals alone, but requires the support of the State. Therefore the State has the right and duty to adjust rights and obligations, every true right involving the obligation of others to respect it.

7. The authority of the State extends to the control of human rights but never to their denial or suppression. Its function may be likened to that of a referee who may control a game as far as excluding a player from it, but only in order that others may the better exercise their right to play.

Thus a "licence" to use a Bus does not imply the authority of the State to take away the right to ply for hire or the right to travel. But if these rights are best secured to the public by a system of "licences," then the State may lay down conditions for licences and refuse applicants who fail conform.

8. To all restrictions of natual rights the same principles apply as to laws. Their justice must be beyond all reasonable doubts, the general assent must be wide and strong enough to carry through successfully the sacrifice involved, proportion must be observed between the good attempted and the price to be paid for it, easier means available must be clearly ineffective.

These principles, says His Grace, are as relevant to an ethical decision as rails are to a train. But a man walking on his God-given legs needs no rails and principles are not the rails but the solid earth which sustains the weight of rails, train and passengers. If the earth gives way, the rails and everything on it will come to grief. The Archbishop's first principle that "God made man" opens up a terrific vista of theological disputation but for the present it may be accepted for argument's sake. But it is relevant to point out that God made not only man but the ape and the tiger, the snake and the frog, the luscious mango and the bitter neem. What God had in mind in creating all these things with various and contra-

...ictory qualities, has been the problem of theologians ...since the beginning, if not of time, of theology.

The Archbishop's second principle is that God's gifts to men include drink, which in the context can only mean alcoholic drink. Here we are not exposed to the perplexities of the purpose of the Creator in creating multitudinous beings. We can positively deny that God's gifts to man include alcoholic drinks. We have never heard or read of a lake of whisky or a river of beer or a sea of champagne, from which men could fill their flasks and quench their thirst. On the contrary, God would seem deliberately to have abstained from creating alcohol. Alcoholic drink is the creation of man. He produces it by perverting God's gifts, by torturing God's trees and by crushing God's grains and flowers. Here the Archbishop's argument falls to the ground and it is really unnecessary to pursue it further. The second link in the eight-linked chain snaps, the fundamental, first, principle is left dangling in the air. But let us not give up at this interesting stage.

The Archbishop's third principle is that God gave men an appetite for drink. Here also the context fixes the reference as being to alcoholic drinks, and not to plain water. This, again, if we may say so without disrespect, is an imputation on God without any justification. The craving for alcohol is not a natural craving. Touch the tongue of a new born child with a finger dipped in alcohol and note the wry face which it makes. Try it on dogs or cats. The late Professor J. C. Bose showed that even plants fade and die under the influence of alcohol. There are millions of men and women in India and Asia who do not touch alcohol under any circumstances. Did God withhold this gift appetite from them or are they sinners doomed to hell fire? The Archbishop himself will henceforth belong to this category. Is he acting against the will of God? The utmost that can be said under the second and third heads, is that God has permitted man to make and drink alcohol just as he has permitted man to make and use submarines, air-bombs and poison gas. But as Dean Farrar has finely observed, we perish by things permitted. We are permitted to do these and other iniquitous things but woe unto us if we use the permission. That leads us to the Archbishop's fourth principle, namely, God gave men reason by which to decide whether to drink, what and when to drink. The Founder of Christianity has not, it is true and it is unfortunate, laid an explicit injunction against intoxicating liquor. But he has said nothing against other evils which prevailed in his time, for example, animal sacrifice, and slavery. But it is clear as day to every one who studies the life and teachings of Jesus that his silence on these evils was not due to his approval of them. His function, in his own words, was that of the sower, and his method, that of the leaven. Gautama Buddha five hundred years earlier had denounced both animal sacrifice and intoxicating drinks and India renounced them and incorporated her renunciation of them in the revived religion—a nationalised Buddhism—which goes by the name of Hindhism.

The fifth, sixth, seventh and eighth principles of His Grace are not principles but deductions from the first four. Except the first which we have accepted for argument's sake, the rest are obviously His Grace's own ideas.

Prohibition is, therefore, ethical and the opposition to it is not.

The Archbishop's argument, on the other hand, applies to prostitution. God's gifts to man unquestionably include women and the appetite for them. God-given reason has led men to different conclusions at different times as to the use of this gift, whether it should be used, if it is to be used when and which. The great religious celibate orders have renounced its use the better to serve the Giver. Is their conduct unethical? Martin Luther thought so. Here we are treading on delicate ground and we had better conclude.

India has an ethical conscience which in some matters is more penetrating than that of Christianity. At any rate, she might be left to follow her own inspiration in matters like Prohibition. In order to avoid controversies with Europeans, the Bombay Government has decided to give them licenses. Why should the Archbishop claim to be more ethical than Gautama Buddha who was an Indian, lived and died in India and knew the strength and weakness of his own people, and ordained abstinence from drink as one of the five vows to be taken by every Buddhist.

We may add that we have a high regard for the British Catholic. He is bound to be a man of intense personality. Papacy is still a word of offence in Britain. A man who stands forward as its representative, must ordinarily be a man of grit and conviction. The best beloved of British Indian Viceroys was the Roman Catholic Lord Ripon and the persecution he suffered at the hands of his countrymen in this country was at least partly due to his religious profession. Dr. Goodier was another English Catholic who impressed every one who knew him by his earnestness and sincerity no less than by his culture and godliness. This writer had the good fortune to work with him on a Committee on this very subject of Prostitution in Bombay and he recalls the breadth and clarity of his judgment on the points that emerged in the enquiry. We are sure that as Archbishop Roberts comes to know more of India and her outlook, His Grace will find increasing opportunities to co-operate in the age-long aspiration of Indian seers, to see life steadily and to see it whole.

REASON, RELIGION AND PREJUDICE.

Mr. George Ives has devoted a book* to considering why "where men seek to learn, we find advancement, achievement and spontaneous agreement; but where people dispute on matters of controversy, their brains appear to be poisoned by passions and prejudices, and the reason descends from the position of impartial and guiding judge, to take up that of unscrupulous advocate." Seeing that Mr Ives expressly excludes hypocrites—"masks not men"—from his study, there should be no difficulty in explaining controversy without even ascribing unscrupulousness to reason. Obviously where one is the teacher and all the rest the taught, there is no room for dispute. Where two masters appear, both wish to teach and neither to learn. Mr Ives who regards public opinion with great suspicion, supports even the least of his remarks with quotations from high authority. Therefore one hesitates to suggest that what aids controversy is not lack of knowledge on the part of two disputants, but too much conviction and a fear of the spread of "false" doctrine. Even the least argumentative human beings feel they have got hold of the truth at some particular point and they make a stand for it. And when we "approach the eternal mysteries" which cannot be fathomed by "calculations, or with telescopes and test tubes", the questions become more perplexing, the answers innumerable and bewildering in their variety.

There are two solutions: The argumentative which Mr. Ives rightly disapproves of; and the sympathetic one to which also Mr. Ives seems to have taken a dislike. "The same causes which make a man a churchman in London," he quotes Mill with appreciation, "would make him a Confucian in Pekin, or a Muhammedan in Constantinople." Yet he does not think that it can be maintained with Matthew Arnold that > the unseen Power whose eye

> For ever doth accompany mankind
> Hath looked on no religion scornfully
> That ever men did find.

After all the Oracle in declaring the best religion to be that which prevailed in a man's own city, provided a working hypothesis. With all the progress that science has brought to us, it still does not work to turn the Confucian into a a churchman and leave him in Pekin; or the Muslim into a Christian at Constantionople. To take more telling examples since religious distinctions have faded or merged into one another, a Nazi in Britain or a democrat in Berlin would assuredly be out of place. Mr. Ives argues that the uniting of religions would mean the end of all inherited creeds. "A man," he writes, "cannot well obey two different governments at the same time, any more than he can conveniently wear two hats on his head; the simultaneous acceptance of a number of creeds would end in an appeal to rational judgment, which might possibly disolve them all." This is a prejudiced way of looking at things which we are surprised to see in a book devoted to reason. In politics it has brought down the League of Nations. In religion it has been the cause of endless strife. In religious unity what is needed is not conformity to a synthetic creed built out of all the known faiths; but the habit of looking on diversity with sympathy and tolerance and understanding. It is certainly not insistence that every man wear the same kind of hat that one wears.

It is when Mr. Ives discards reason and looks beyond it that he rises to his greatest heights. After meeting every creed with a negative, Mr. Ives sets down the "Way of Life." Mr. Ives has overcome the "obstacles." The tyranny of too much quotations which ties down the author, leaves him here and words cease to be a tiresome medium hindering the reader from the thought within them. It is no small hope he holds out for a better humanity:

> There are many, many men and women, whose lives put ordinary selfishness to shame, and make us humble when we contemplate their heroism. Such people are not rare though infinitely precious. They are the true redeemers of the world though unknown to fame and often sacrificed. (Can God's theme be: Love's martyrdom—and triumph?) Have we not seen them in the struggle of life, loyal and devoted to those around them, diffusing peace and comfort where they pass, carrying other loads beside their own?

As always happens when we descend from abstract theories to the real, Mr. Ives has struck a chord here which finds an answering echo in every one of us. There is something after all, as he says, that death cannot extinguish.

THE CONGRESS AND CORRUPTION.

(By J. M. Ganguli, Calcutta.)

Since Mahatma Gandhi's calling attention to corruption in the Congress after the last Presidential election one has heard much talk about it, and even of the Congress Executive taking action in ridding the organisation of such corruption. The Congress Working Committee is actually deliberating over it in Bombay at present, and its conclusions and resolutions are likely to be out before this article goes into print. From the fact, however, that the Congress leaders are considering corruption in a very restricted sense, namely, that which affects voting at elections, one wonders if such leaders are really serious about purifying the great national institution of vice and corruption. One frank and bold Congressman has indeed openly expressed such wonder in a letter, which he has addressed to the Congress President, and which he has also circularised because he apprehends, perhaps not without reason, that the letter is not to be taken notice of, and the matters referred to in it may be hushed. But nothing could be more blundering for the President to do than to supress such communications to him, for the more he would try to supress them the more the public would become suspicious and the more they would lose confidence in the bonafides of him and of his colleagues in the matter of removing corruption from the Congress. Mahatma Gandhi has probably also received a copy of the above letter, and those who highly appreciate his keenness for truth and virtue expect that he at least would take serious notice of it.

The writer of the letter has pertinently questioned the Congress President if he believes that the eradication of corruption from the Congress is possible while the Congress High Command and other Congress bodies are more or less manned and influenced as they are today. Thereafter he proceeds to mention specific facts about various leaders, and though he mentions only a few of them, what he writes is horrible reading. There is clearly no malice in him, firstly because he is no rival in any respect to the men he has named, and secondly because he offers to substantiate his statements fully, should the Congress President so desire. When he draws attention to the private life of some of the leaders, he pointedly asks if that is not known to the leaders who are now holding conference on the removal of corruption, when it is widely known to the outside public. When such people are chosen for high places in the Congress organisation and for places of public responsibility, what can possibly be the reaction on the public mind? When, moreover, Gandhiji is directly or indirectly instrumental in such choice, what indeed can be the impression on people outside?

If such feelings were to spread, it would soon discount all the good work that Gandhian influence in the country has done in the matter of raising the standard of public morality. It is in fact his influence in this respect that has been his best contribution to the cause of his motherland. Virtues of honesty and pure morality have always been extolled in this country. In the country's religious books, in its literature, in its epics and poems, moral character has always been given the highest respect. A jitendriya purusha (one who has mastered his senses and his impulses) is more than a god, while a chaste woman is respected and dreaded by God Himself—such have been the teachings in this country from time immemorial. A person having high moral character, penniless though he may have been, has been respected by all, by kings themselves. As these teachings and ideals were disrespected, Indian national degeneration started leading not only to individual and national weakness and political subjection, but also to various vices and devitalising factors, which have reduced the country to its present shameful condition. Matters become worse for the country when it came under the cultural influence of the West: Money replaced virtue and goodness from the altar, where people offered homage. A clever educated, English-educated person with outward smartness would catch the public eye no matter what his character was like and his moral principles were or what methods, honest or dishonest, he used in coming into prominence and leadership. Under such leadership the country could make little substantial progress; rather under it were encouraged, by example, more vice and corruption. There was much talk, fiery orations, and emphatic table beating, but little work; for, while talk, orations and table thumping brought cheap popularity, more luminosity and consequent advantages to the leaders, work meant self-deprivation of luxuries and habitual indulgences and also dull monotony.

When such were the general conditions, Mahatma Gandhi's advent was like a God-send: A strong believer in pure morals he prescribed strict rules and conditions for leadership, going even to the extent of recommending a celibate life to national workers and leaders. His great personality effected a marvellous change in the life and outlook of several great leaders, who, discarding their former life of ease, luxury and indulgence, took to simple, useful and idealised living. Gandhiji's re-enunciation of moral doctrines turned people's mind again to the necessity of moral arming for national regeneration. There have been sincere and unprejudiced critics of Gandhian politics; his non-violence theory has at times been criticised for over-stretching and even introducing a cowardly ever-yielding mentality in people, who under several centuries of political dependence are already much possessed of it. But the moral tone he gave to politics and the moral purification he emphasized in political leadership reassured them and even those, who felt inclined to think that perhaps Gandhiji was retarding the acceleration of political emancipation and damping the on-rushing national enthusiasm of the people.

The gloomy state of mystification, in which honest critics of Gandhiji's politics and ardent admirers of his moral idealism find themselves, on noticing the apparently uncensoring and unprotesting manner in which he is recommending people who far from being repentant of their past, are still just the same, can therefore well be imagined. Does Gandhiji lack deep conviction in what he says and practices? Does he think that a person's private life has not much significance in the dishonest of his public responsibilities? Or does he think that an organisation left in the hands of indifferent and undependable people can be kept free from corruption and malpractices by framing some rules of voting, membership-enrolment and the like?

Such questions automatically come to mind though one would not like to answer them even in one's own mind, for the answer would involve appalling contradictions in a great man's great teachings. It is for Gandhiji himself to answer and explain, to reassure those, who have been appreciatingly following his lead and inspiration in many respects, as well as to safeguard against the washing out of all the good work that he has been doing to raise the moral standard in this country and in the world outside. The Congress sub-committee, trying to devise rules for fighting corruption with, can do little. What is needed is for Gandhiji himself to invite the public freely and fearlessly to state and substantiate charges of dishonesty and immorality against the leaders and thereafter to make a clean purge of those who are found guilty. If, on account of the power and influence of those leaders, he is unable to do the purging he should openly declare it and dissociate himself from the Congress. That alone will re-establish public faith in truth and pure morals and in the bona-fides of the Congress in abolishing corruption.

To all thoughtful newspaper editors I would say that they would be doing great disservice to the country if, instead of exerting their influence in the right direction, they would adopt the policy of hush-hush.

ANOTHER CONVERSION AND MARRIAGE CASE.*

Judgment has been pronounced by Mr. Brij Behari Lal, assistant sessions judge, in the Ratanmala rape case, in which a wealthy Jaini family of Dehra Dun was involved and which has created considerable sensation in the district. Dwarka Das, accused, motor driver of the family, has been sentenced to three years' rigorous imprisonment under Sec. 376 I. P. C., and Mst. Kailashvati, widow of a wealthy Jain merchant, the late Lala Atma Ram, and mother of Ratanmala (14) who was the second accused in the case, has been sentenced to two years' rigorous imprisonment under Sections 376/109, I. P. C.

The prosecution story was that Lala Atma Ram, a wealthy businessman of a very respectable Jain family of Dehra Dum, died about six and a half years ago, leaving a widow, Mst. Kailashvati and a daughter, Ratanmala. After his death the child Ratanmala was brought up by her maternal grandfather, Lala Chaitan Das in Saharanpur. Occasionally Mst. Ratanmala's mother used to visit Saharanpur and live with her father, Lala Chaitan Das, where her daughter was living. About three years ago Mst. Kailashvati with her servant Dwarka Das, a young Punjabi Brahman, whom she had engaged as her motor driver on the death of her husband, went to Saharanpur and told Lala Chaitan Das that they intended to go on a Jain pilgrimage and requested him to allow Ratanmala to accompany them. Lala Chaitan Das consented and the girl was removed from his house. But they did not go to any pilgrimage at all and Mst. Kailashvati who had immoral connection with Dwarka Das and had become notorious, thought it proper to have the girl married to Dwarka Das, who had illicit connection with Ratanmala also. The girl was brought to Dehra Dun and then taken to Mussoorie, Delhi, Sahadra, Multan and different places.

Mst. Kailashvati was so much overcome by Dwarka Das that she managed to give away her property by way of a gift to him and a deed of gift was drafted and was registered in the name of Dwarka Das. On behalf of Lala Chaitan Das a declaratory suit was filed for the cancellation of the deed of gift. An application for the guardianship of the minor girl was also filed in the court of the district judge and, as a result of this application, Lala Chaitan Das was declared to be the propar guardian. When this application for guardianship was pending, the court was informed on May 1, 1937, that her mother Kailashvati intended to remove the girl from the jurisdiction of the court and an order was passed prohibiting her. Again an application was put in that Kailashvati had an idea of removing the girl and performing her marriage with Dwarka Das. The district judge ordered that the girl should be produced before him on May 4, 1937. The girl, however, was not produced. On May 5, 1937, Kailashvati's lawyer applied that Kailashvati had gone to Allahabad for legal advice and said that there was no danger of the girl being married. The district judge being satisfied, ordered that the girl be produced on May 17, already fixed. On that day when the case was taken, Kailashvati applied that the girl was not with her, she had been married in the Kapurthala State to Dwarka Das and that the couple were living in Jagadhari. She informed the court that they were converted to Arya Samaj and the marriage was performed according to their rules.

The allegation against Dwarka Das was that he raped Ratanmala, a minor girl below 14 years of age, and that the marriage was not a valid one, because a minor girl could not be converted to Arya Samaj and that Dwarka Das being a Brahman, no proper marriage could be performed between a Brahman and a Jain. The accused stated that he had had connection as husband and wife after May 18, 1937, that they were duly married and that no offence had been committed.

The accused Dwarka Das was engaged by Mst. Kailashvati as a motor-driver after the death of her husband. Dwarkadas had influenced Kailashvati so much that in a few years he got the upper hand and on account of his connection with Kailashvati, immovable property worth several thousands was donated to him. Kailashvati was the cause of bringing about his connection with Ratanmala.

The facts as given by Ratanmala in the court of sessions were different from those which she stated in the lower court. She deposed that she was under the influence of her mother and Dwarka Das and she admitted the fact of the marriage and denied any bad relations with him before the alleged marriage. She stated that while she was staying at her maternal grandfather's house at Saharanpur, her mother and Dwarka Das went there and they expressed their intention to go on a pilgrimage and her grandfather allowed her to accompany them. But she was not taken to any sacred place. On the other hand, the party came to Dehra Dun, where they stayed for some time and then went to Mussoorie where they stayed for a fortnight or so. One night when they were putting up in a hotel, Dwarka Das brought wine. He gave it to her mother and to her. The mother being intoxicated, Dwarka Das raped Ratanmala and the following morning she told this fact to her mother, who said that she should not tell such things to anybody. Dwarka Das had been doing the same thing with her also and she had also not told any one about it. From Mussoorie they came to Dehra Dun and later the girl was taken to different places.

The girl became pregnant and Dwarka Das gave her some medicine and caused abortion. Then after some time Dwarka Das used to have relations with her and she again became pregnant and a child was born to her. After the childbirth the girl Ratanmala went to the custody of her maternal grandfather.

Dwarka Das stood charged under section 376, I. P. C., with having had relations in April and May, 1937, with Ratanmala, a minor girl of less than 14 years, with or without her consent, which was obtained by falsely telling her that he was her husband. Kailashvati and Raja Ram were charged under sections 376/109, I. P. C., with having abetted the commission of the said offence by Dwarka Das, accused.

In the course of his lengthy judgment the assistant sessions judge remarked: 'There is one strong circumstance bearing upon the point. Kailashvati was ordered by the district judge to produce her daughter Ratanmala in the court on May 17, 1937. Kailashvat took her to the Kapurthala state and on May 8, 1937 performed a marriage ceremony of the girl with Dwarka Das, accused. It is significant that the girl and her mother are Jain Vaish, while Dwarka Das is a Punjabi Brahman. Would a mother give her only daughter in marriage to a person of a different caste and particularly to a person having another wife and children and in such hot haste and in an Indian State in the Punjab, away from the home of the parents of Kailashvati's husband and the parents of the girl? Kailashvati's husband was a rich businssman of Dehra Dun. It is significant that not a single relation be present at the marriage or be invited to it. It was not a civil marriage. It was a marriage under the Arya Samaj Marriage Act No. 19 of 1937, which validates marriage between two Arya Samajists.

'The circumstances show that the alleged marriage was only a sham done in an attempt to legalise the previous sexual intercourse and to thwart the guardianship proceedings. The contracting parties had made a show of professing Arya Samaj just for the purpose. Law could not be cheated in this manner.

'All the ingredients of the offence were proved. The consent of the girl, even if obtained, was immaterial as she was below 14 years of age in April, 1937, when the offence was committed on her.'

Agreeing with all the assessors, the assistant sessions judge found Dwarka Das, accused, guilty under section 376, I. P. C., for committing rape on Ratanmala, a minor girl of 14 years of age in April, 1937, at Dehra Dun. He added that the inference from the facts proved was irresistible that Kailashvati instigated the accused Dwarka Das to commit rape on Ratanmala, her daughter, and agreeing with the assessors found Kailasvati also guilty under sec. 376/109, I. P. C. Raja Ram was acquitted.

As regards the sentence, the assistant sessions judge said: "The circumstances are such that both the accused found guilty are to be treated with leniency, though the degree would differ in each case." The accused were sentenced as stated above.

INDIANS IN BELGIAN CONGO.*

Not much publicity is given in the Indian press of Kenya to the recent arrests of several Indians in the Belgian Congo. The arrests are said to affect over 50 persons on charges of illicit dealings in gold. Several of the arrested Indians are said to have been released, and that about 40 others are still detained awaiting trial.

As far as we are able to ascertain the real state of affairs, it seems that dealings in gold mined in the Belgian Congo have been going on for at least a decade. It appears that Indian merchants carried on business in gold as an everyday concern, and it is said that they made no secret of it since their transactions in this line figure in their books. The gold was evidently bought from the natives either working on the mines or not. From all accounts, there seems to be little doubt that these dealings were far from licit.

What is not understood is the apparent carelessness of the Belgian authorities in this sort of business for several years. We are told that the authorities were only roused to action when a somewhat large Government consignment of gold disappeared from one of the steamers in which it had been boarded for export.

The arrest of so many Indians had their repercussions in the neighbouring territory of Uganda. A local advocate was entrusted with the defence, but it seems that he has not been able to do much. It is reported that a sort of a deputation had reached India where representations are being made. In the Congo itself, the Indians are said to have applied to the British Consul for assistance, but that such assistance was not forthcoming. It is also said that the Italian Consul in the territory intervened on behalf of some Italians who were in the same plight. The information about these happenings is meagre, and we give it as we have received it in the conviction that substantially such information is correct.

If it is true that the matter has been represented to the Government of India or to the political leaders in that country, the subject must necessarily assume an importance which it does not, in our view, deserve. Granted that the arrests are made on some justifiable evidence before the authorities, it would be in the interest of the small Indian community settled in the Congo to await the trial and do as much as one can to defend the arrested persons. The treatment accorded to Indians in the Belgian Congo is not known to have been anything less than cordial and fair, and this is in accordance with the friendly relations of Belgium with Britain. We have not heard of any hardships inflicted on Indians, and generally the reports from Indians themselves have been satisfactory.

Under these circumstances there arises the need for extreme caution on the part of Indians in the Congo so that unnecessary acrimony is not engendered as a result of an agitation which might be construed to be tainted by political bias. We do not believe that the ordinary course of law in the Congo will be diverted to the detriment of the Indian, nor do we believe that the Belgians have any prejudice against Indians as such. Were it so, they might well remember the early days of the great war when so much Indian blood was shed on Belgian soil in the defence of that country. We have no reason to suppose that the Belgians have forgotten so great a service.

What is wanted is a fair and true presentation of the case of the Indians already in trouble, and, if necessary, diplomatic assistance through the local British Consul and the British Foreign Office. The law must take its own course, as it seems to have done in the case of the several Indians already released after arrests had been made. We hope our countrymen in the Belgian Congo will carefully avoid any steps which may jeopardise their peaceful stay in what, after all, is a foreign country.

THE LATE DR. SIR R. VENKATARATNAM.

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

May I be allowed some little space in your columns to approach the wide circle of friends, admirers and old pupils of the late Sir Dr. Brahmarshi R. Venkataratnam, Kt., M. A., L. T., D. LITT., LL. D., with an important intimation and an earnest request? The first is to state that six volumes of his collected writings and utterances, so far brought out by me under the title of "Message and Ministrations" (each with a separate Introduction) are available with the Librarian, Brahmopasana Mandir, at Cocanada, Re. 1 (net) each, while two more volumes are being rapidly seen through the press at present. The second is to the effect that those in possession of interesting and edifying letters from him in any capacity or context may be pleased, by a generous loan of them, to help forward the intended plan of bringing out a further set of two volumes as "Life and Letters" of the departed Leader. Wherever required, the letters will be gratefully returned as soon as done with; and all portions specifically marked off for exclusion will be strictly withheld from utilisation. Particulars of likely value about the life-career or the personal character will also be quite welcome.

Yours etc.,

Masulipatam,

LIBERTY, RIGHTS AND BEVERAGE ALCOHOL.

(BY ERNEST H. CHERRINGTON, IN THE American Issue.)

Personal Liberty, as it is appealed to by those who are engaged in the manufacture, sale and use of intoxicating liquors, or in activities which are closely related to the beverage alcohol traffic, involves the presumed right of an individual to drink whatever, whenever, and wherever he pleases, or to use his own property for the manufacture, transportation, or sale of intoxicants. Personal liberty advocates are accustomed to point with pride and assurance to those portions of the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution which speak of the right to "Liberty and the pursuit of happiness," and the desirable objective: "the blessings of liberty."

Personal liberty, as that term is most commonly used, is a peculiar combination of natural liberty and personal license in spite of government, law, and society. Blackstone defines natural liberty as "a power of acting as one thinks fit without any restraint unless by laws of nature." That is certainly a type of liberty which cannot properly exist except in such a place and in such a way as Daniel Defoe pictured it in the character of Robinson Crusoe, before Friday appeared upon the scene. Certain it is that that type of liberty is not possible in a social order comprising many millions of men, women and children.

The type of liberty intended to be safeguarded by the constitution of the United States, is civil liberty, which in the American conception exists only where the individual citizen has the right to live his own life and to pursue his own happiness without restraint or interference except by impartial and just laws of the government. The Constitution, however, makes no distinction between citizens as to their theirs. Every citizen has equal constitutional rights. The civil rights of any individual must not interfere with the same rights of others. The rights of each individual are safeguarded by the constitution against usurpation, by majorities, by different branches of the government, or by other citizens.

According to the Supreme Court of the United States, the assumption that the injury caused by liquor taken in excess is voluntarily self-inflicted and confined to the party offending, is not true in fact. The use of liquor by an individual may and does affect the rights of other members of his household. It also affects the rights of other citizens to be secure from increased taxes to support jails, asylums, and other institutions which must care for the results of the use of liquor by the drinking portion of the population. It also involves the rights of others to be secure in their homes from injuries which liquor creates, and to be protected from injury to their property, and inconvenience, by acts which result from the use of intoxicants by the drinkers.

Whatever interferes with the public safety, the public health, the public morals, and the public welfare, by any individual drinker or any number of such drinkers, infringes on the rights of others and in some degrees weakness the protection of the Constitution for all citizens.

CO-EDUCATION IN CAWNPORE.

As certain incorrect and exaggerated reports have appeared in the Press it has become necessary for me to issue this statement to the Press.

The Christ Church College is a college for men students. It has never attempted co-education. Indeed, I do not know of any university or college in India which has. For the last ten or twelve years, however I have permitted a limited number of women students to attend lectures at my college and I am happy that during this period about 20 women students have graduated from the college and a simi lar number have passed the intermediate examination. My wife and my colleagues on the staff have made every possible effort to make this modest experiment a success.

During the last two years, however, our task difficult in itself, has been made more difficult on account of the seriously disturbed conditions in Cawnpore. In September, 1937, a women students' concert was seriously disturbed. The college had to be closed for a month and great anxiety prevailed among the women students and their parents. The college, however, did not send the women students away.

Throughout 1938 mischievous people in Cawnpore have been busy making the continuance of their study at the college by a few women students more and more difficult. I have intercepted a large number of anonymous letters addressed to the girls in the college in the most indecent and filthiest of terms. I have also a letter from the Superintendent of Police saying that he had repeatedly received complaints from the Employers' Association that students of two of the Cawnpore Colleges had insulted and caused annoyance to lady typists on their way to their offices.

It is on account of these, among other reasons, that I have reluctantly been compelled to advise the guardians of the few women students in the colleges not to send their wards to the college for the present.

Not one of the persons, who, according to the press, constitute the deputation of guardians to wait on the Education Minister has to my knowledge any legitimate connection with any one of the women students concerned.

I have explained the position both to the D. P. I. and the Minister, and neither of them has questioned my judgment. I have yet to meet any proper guardian of any women student who after examining the evidence on which my decision is based, will want to send his ward to attend lectures at the college.

As regards the women students who have to complete their course for the B. A. Examination, of whom there are only four, your solicitude cannot be greater than mine. I have already assured such of the parents as have approached me that I shall endeavour to give all possible and necessary assistance for the purpose.

PROHIBITION POLICY OF THE U. P. GOVERNMENT.

A combinition of intensive propaganda by the Government and the public, the reduction of shops, the improvement of the auction system by fixing retail prices and the state-managed agency are the basic principles of the excise policy, which is directed towards the goal of total prohibition in the United Provinces.

Prohibition was introduced, for the first time as an experimental measure, on March 31, 1938, in the districts of Etawah and Mainpuri and, encouraged by the results obtained, it was extended to the districts of Budaum, Farrukhabad, Bijnor and Jaunpur on April 1, 1939.

The Government first sought to mobilise public opinion by propaganda and education.

This was followed by a method of Governmental action which briefly falls into four divisions:—

(1) Reduction of shops by about 20 to 35 per cent, varying from district to district.

(2) Fixing of retail prices appreciably above those which ruled in different localities.

(3) The state managed agency, and

(4) The system of auctioning shops with fixed retail prices.

The state-managed system resulted in many advantages, the chief being that the motive of profit, which weighed heavily with private agents, was removed, thereby decreasing the consumption. Indirectly, it led to the enhancement of revenue on that consumption inasmuch as the profits which otherwise would have gone to the licencees would be taken by the state.

Under the state-managed system consumption was not permitted on the premises and this led to further reduction of consumption and reduction in many of the sordid practices which arose from this.

After mature consideration, the fixed price auction system was introduced, the advantages of this system over the sur-charge system, in practice for long, being many. The retail price of the intoxicants was raised substantially under the new system. This had a salutary effect in lessening illicit distillation as the illicit distiller felt that there was no point in his indulging in the practice so long as he could not get more profit by selling more illicit liquor. Instructions were also issued to the officials that auctions would in future be conducted in a strictly fair and impartial manner.

Over and above these fundamental changes which in fact constitute the excise policy of the Government, the executive staff, who are men on the spot and as such have to deal with extraordinary situations as they arise, was increased. Vigilance staff was recruited and the number of excise inspectors increased.

That this policy is fructifying is amply proved by the reports received by the Government from the various districts. Enquiries made reveal that most of the addicts of have paid off their old debts and effected savings.

Ceylon Repatriation Scheme:—The Governn ent of India is understood to have been informed by the Ceylon Government that it is unable to postpone the measure passed by the State Council for repatriation of non-Ceylonese daily paid workers in Government service. This decision was reached by the board of ministers, it is learned, after they had considered the communication from the Government of India, inquiring whether the Ceylon Government would consider the postponement of the repatriation scheme for the present.

WEST OF SUEZ.

Prof. L. Rushbrook Williams writes in The Asiatic Review

"He adds to a lively, and occasionally malicious, pen a keen sense of humour and a certain confidence in his own judgment, which is the habitual prerogative of youth. The result is an engaging book, which tells us almost as much about Mr. Natarajan as about the places he visited and the persons he encountered."

"May well prove invaluable to other young Indians addicted with Western Wanderlust. For here they will read of the hotels he patronised, the tips he gave the porters he employed, where and what food he found, and the conclusions he sedately drew." The Times of India, Bombay.

"A pleasant souvenir of a six-months holiday which Mr. S. Natarajan spent in Europe last year. Mr. Natarajan left the shores of India on February 12, 1937 and when he set foot in Europe he found the whole Continent in a State of frenzy. The Civil war was in full swing in Spain, nervousness had gripped Naziland, Paris was getting the Exposition ready and England was all agog with excitement in view of the (then impending) Coronation of King George VI. Mr. Natarajan had plenty to see and hear during his sojourn. And he did well in taking his typewriter with him." The Hindu, Madras.

NOTES.

Satyagraha :—A new political party has been formed in Mysore. It holds that satyagraha methods are appropriate in British India but not in Indian States, because the Government in British India is foreign while in the States it is native. As a matter of fact, the main grievance of the peoples of the States is that their governments do not come up to the standards of the so-called foreign one. Indeed, there are several States whose subjects want nothing more than to be incorporated in British India. At a States Peoples' Conference in Delhi at which this writer presided not many years ago, speakers openly declared that, if a plebiscite were taken, quite 90 per cent of their people would vote to join British India. Misgovernment reaches a point at which the people are glad to exchange a native government for a foreign one if the latter promises to relieve them of their most pressing grievances. This point has apparently been reached and passed in some States. But even there satyagraha can do no good. It has done no good in British India either. It has not improved matters in South Africa. The position there today is worse than what it was in Gandhiji's time. Pandit Jawaharalal Nehru stated the other day that satyagraha has become a nuisance in his province. The United Provinces Government is a Congress Government of which Pandit Nehru's relative is a member. We are sure that that is not the chief reason why he denounced it as a nuisance in that province. Elsewhere, it has been said that satyagraha should not be waged against a Congress Government but it is quite in place against Muslim League Governments and against the Government of India. Satyagraha when undertaken by a man or men possessed by the power and passion of Truth, is the greatest force in Nature, but as used generally nowadays it is a cheap, and rather cowardly, way of gaining notoriety. It has the same value as and no more than any other form of popular demonstration. There is nothing sacrosanct about it.

Prohibition in Madras :—Speaking at a mass meeting in Madras on the 18th June, the Prime Minister rather went out of his way to enumerate reasons for not introducing Prohibition in Madras city. These were at once telegraphed to the newspapers and, in Bombay at least, a prominent anti-Prohibition organ took it to be a dig at the Bombay Government's choice of Bombay city as one of the first places for its introduction. Mr. Rajagopalachari said: "Being a coastal district there will be facilities for smuggling in liquor. Again the introduction of Prohibition will entail unemployment to the labourers employed in the trade. In the districts, they can be engaged in agricultural operations but it would be difficult to find employment for them in the city." Both these reasons are untenable. Smuggling can be more effectively prevented at a sea-port town than in a place which has no natural boundaries. As for finding work for persons thrown out of employment, it is notorious that unemployment is chronic among cultivators for eight months in the year and that, owing to the slump in prices, even this limited employment brings no adequate return. Madras, moreover, is not an industrial city like Bombay and what is possible in the districts is possible in Madras also. The real reason why Mr. Rajagopalacharya did not include Madras is financial. A property tax such as that levied in Bombay would not bring as much revenue as here and would have met with greater opposition than in Bombay. The opposition too would not be from big landlords as in Bombay, but from middle class houseowners who are politically more vital to the Congress party than the denizens of Malabar Hill. Mr. Rajagopalacharya has since declared that his remarks were not aimed at the Bombay scheme, the conditions in the two cities being very different.

Gandhiji on Prohibition :—Replying to the Archbishop of Bombay's address at the Rotary luncheon against Prohibition, Gandhiji writes in the current Harijan:

> The word 'Prohibition' is a misnomer for what the Bombay Government and the other Provincial Governments where the Congress controls the Ministries, are doing regarding the liquor trade. What the Governments are in reality doing is not prohibiting drink but they are closing liquor shops which are absolutely under Government control.

Prohibition is now embodied in a statute and the only authority which can interpret it, is a court of law. But many people believe that what Gandhiji writes is the law of the land and these, if they acted on Gandhiji's interpretation of Prohibition, are sure to come to grief. Prohibition is not merely closing liquor shops. If it were, it would be open to any one to maintain a private distillery for domestic consumption. The Bombay Excise Minister certainly did not understand the Prohibition law which he was enacting, to have this limited significance. Speaking on the Budget in the Legislative Assembly on February 22, Dr. Gilder said :

> From the midnight of the day on which we go in for total prohibition, it will be illegal for any person not having the appropriate license or permit to have country liquor, foreign liquor, opium, ganja, bhang, or charas in his possession.
> Mr. D. J. Ferriera : Even a peg ?
> Dr. Gilder : Yes, Sir, even a peg.

The Minister added that permits for personal consumption of foreign liquor will be given to people of non-Asiatic domicile temporarily resident in India. Government consider, he added, that those Europeans who have made India their permanent home, should be willing to comply with the Indian sentiment in the matter.

Exemption of Europeans :—We agree with those who object to this exemption. No such exemption was allowed in the United States when Prohibition was in force. The only exemption allowed was the Embassies which, according to international law, are the territory of the States which they represent. The New Leader, the Madras Catholic journal, wrote some time back that the Governor of Bombay had assured his Ministers that the Prohibition law will be strictly observed at Government House. This may not be literally accurate but Ministers have no misgivings about the attitude of Government House. The same may be presumed of Europeans, whether domiciled permanently or temporarily in this country, who set the interests of India and the Empire above their personal comfort. "Moderate Drinker" said in the course of his sober and earnest presentation, in last week's Reformer, of the case against Prohibition: "Should Prohibition become the law of the land, I would give up drink, with a feeling of resentment at being deprived of what I regard as an inherent personal right." That may be taken to be typical of the attitude of the great majority of responsible Europeans who feel that they are in India not wholly for what they can make out of her. The sentiments of the minority who recognise no law but that of their appetites East of Suez, do not deserve to be respected.

The Servants of India Society :—The Servants of India Society celebrated its thirty-fourth anniversary on June 12th at Poona. A week later a notable change in the tradition of the Society took place when Miss Godavari Gokhale was admitted to full membership of the Society. The Women's Fellowship of Service which was started three years ago under the auspices of the Society, to meet the existing rules excluding women, has been dissolved and the only other member of it, Miss Bholerao, has been admitted as a probationer of the Servants of India Society. The Society is to be congratulated on its decision. Both Miss Gokhale and Miss Bholerao have a record of service of which members of the Society can be proud and the admission of more women will strengthen the varied activities of the Society, in education, labour and social welfare. Miss Gokhale is at present a leading worker in the literacy campaign.

Child Welfare :—The League of Nations' third annual report on Child Welfare, furnishes useful information regarding measures adopted in thirty countries of the world to promote Child Welfare. The single page devoted to India contains a very perfunctory account of what is being done in this country. China occupies more space than almost any other country and the section on China is specially noted in the Introduction as one drawn up from original sources. How much of this programme has survived the present struggle in China, we may be told in the next year's report. The absence of information regarding the important work which is being done in Italy and Germany, is an inevitable drawback due perhaps to the withdrawal of these countries from the League though Japan at least declared she would continue to co-operate in the League's social work. But why leave out Soviet Russia which is still a member of the League and where, too, important developments are in progress on social problems including Child Welfare ?

Japan's Position :—An article in the current Round Table reviewing Japan's position concludes that she can not be conquered by armed force but is vulnerable on the economic side. Japan, says the writer, has a maritime strategic position that makes invasion by armies impossible. An overseas expedition of the necessary size would require an absolute command of the sea, as well as points of support near the Japanese Empire, neither of which conditions can be fulfilled. Only economic exhaustion of the Island Empire could lead to her defeat. "That this method would certainly be effective in the long run," he adds, "is the conclusion to be drawn from Japan's dependence on her import and export trade for her enormous requirements of raw materials and for the sale abroad for the products of her industries." That the economic exhaustion of Japan is not immediately in sight and that "the long run" may be as trying to her rivals as for herself, is the conclusion reached in the Report of the Foreign Policy Association of America issued in September last. Mr. T. A. Bisson, the author, holds like the writer in the Round Table that the economic factor is undoubtedly the most serious threat to Japan's programme of military conquest. "Even so," he writes, "there is no prospect that Japanese economic disabilities will prove decisive in the near future. Japan has tightened its belt. It possesses sufficient reserves of gold and war materials to continue the war for a protracted period, and will undoubtedly seek to force a conclusion during the coming months. Only one measure can alter the outlook for an indefinite prolongation of hostilities.....This is the refusal of Western powers, particularly the United States, to continue furnishing war supplies to Japan." This is one of the measures which Dr. Wellington Koo suggested at the last session of the League of Nations. The strengthening of the Berlin Rome Tokyo axis with Spain in the background, is an important consideration which, of course, was outside the immediate scope of Mr. Bisson's enquiry.

Rajendra Prasad on South African Policy :— Babu Rajendra Prasad wobbled somewhat in dealing with the question of Bengalis in Bihar, which was referred to him by the Congress for settlement. His award whittled down considerably, the clear mandate of the Government of India Act that no discrimination whatsoever should be made by one province against persons from another province of British India. He has not allowed the Bihar precedent to qualify his protest against the discriminatory proposals against Indians in South Africa. He has threatened to make them an all-India issue unless the Government of India put pressure on the British Government to prevent the South African Union Government from enacting the proposals. Failing that, Mr. Prasad seems to suggest that all the Congress Governments should resign. This has become rather a stunt. The Congress Governments are regarded as pawns and not as agencies for bettering the condition of the people. The threat today is not so effective as when it was first used in connection with the appointment of a Bihar Civilian as acting Governor of Orissa. However that may be, the Emigration Committee of the Indian Legislature and Swami Bhawani Dayal, President of the Natal Indian Congress, who is now in India, are satisfied that the Government are doing all they can to support the cause of Indians. There is one point which we should like to be considered in connection with the segregation proposals. The real objection seems to be that segregation necessarily means relegation of Indians to locations without the amenities of the residential areas of Europeans. That it has been the case in practice can not be denied. But we do not see any necessary connection between the two. If the same, identical amenities are secured and if in the allotment of sites no discrimination is made, segregation will lose much of its sting. We wonder if a compromise on some such lines would be acceptable to the parties concerned.

Jewish Refugees:— The problem of Jewish refugees from European countries presents special difficulties in India. The Government of India explained some days ago in the Legislative Assembly the conditions under which such refugees were admitted. There should be an undertaking from local Jews or a responsible organisation to maintain them, and those who did not secure a job in five years were to be deported to Great Britain. There is an Indian Jewish community dating from ancient times and unless this community can assimilate the refugees, the position of the latter is likely to add another to the many communal complexities of Indian politics. The latest account which we publish today, seems to indicate a departure from the policy described in the first communique. Five or six hundred Jews have been admitted, many of them young girls who are being educated at Khandala and other places at a cost which is beyond the means of millions of Indian parents. Some men have been taken as apprentices in a local mill, the name of which is not mentioned. These five hundred and any more that may be admitted, are now to be regarded as permanently settled in this country. What is their civil status? Is it that of Europeans? When Australia or Canada admits refugees, they become part of the general population but here they will be a more or less privileged group. A writer in the Cochin Argus states that Bikaner has offered to arrange for the settlement of 12,000 families of Jewish refugees and Cochin is ready to admit more. We trust that these States will be careful to define the terms on which the refugees are admitted to their citizenship.

Submarine Sabotage :— The sinking in mysterious circumstances and within short intervals of an American, a British and a French submarine, may be pure coincidence. But it is also a suspicious coincidence. The question is to be investigated. A Reuter's message says :

> A resolution for the appointment of a Congressional Committee to investigate the possibility that the loss of the sub-marines Squalus, Thetis and Phoenix was due to sabotage, was introduced in the Senate today by Senator Harbour. The resolution suggests that a committee be directed to investigate the whole question of activities of foreign spies in the United States.

Canada and the Privy Council:— The King's visit to Canada is said to have brought the Dominion closer to the mother country. It is a curious proof of this result that almost before Their Majesties had left Canadian shores, a Bill is being pushed through the Canadian Parliament to do away with appeals from the Dominion to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in London. Such appeals are extremely rare nowadays. The reform is not called for by any urgent necessity. It can be regarded as merely intended to assert the absolute independence of the Dominion. Eire was the first to take the step by no means as one towards closer union.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

BOMBAY, June 24, 1939.

INDIA AND THE DEMOCRACIES.

Mr. Streit in his book, "Union Now," dismisses India in a summary way. Just as the American States did not wait until slavery was abolished to constitute themselves into a Union, so the White "Democracies" should not, he thinks, wait until India gains Independence, to organise themselves in a Union to check the growth of Dictatorships. Mr. Streit naively argues that the formation of the United States led to the creation of the spirit which later inspired the North to conquer and coerce the South. It does not occur to him that an arrangement which found no better way of effecting a great social and moral reform than a bitter Civil War, was not an ideal arrangement. Nor does it occur to him that India may not like to become in effect the retainer of fifteen "democratic" States instead of one as at present. In noticing Mr. Streit's book we put forward these nonsiderations as militating seriously against his glib proposal. The Round Table for June in the course of a review of Mr. Streit's book, expresses the opinion that India can not be left out of the proposed Democratic Union although she is a dependency of Great Britain and not a sovereign democratic state. Mr. Lionel Curtis proposed to make a start with the English-speaking countries. Mr. Streit rightly objects that it is a grave defect of this scheme of a linguistic group, as it gives the nucleus an offensive air of exclusivity. The Round Table reviewer argues that this is none the less true of a single colour or race than of a single language. He observes :

> Although British India is not yet a sovereign nation, nor has she democratic control over foreign policy, defence and certain other matters, yet she ought to be considered as a possible founder-member of Union in which, indeed, no member would control its own separate foreign policy or defence. Alternatively, India, with any other British country approaching self government, might retain the same relations with the Union as she now possesses with the British Empire. If it started with any taint of racial or colour exclusiveness, the Union—as the greatest Imperialism ever known—might be bitterly suspect among the rising peoples of Asia and Africa.

It is not clear what the reviewer means by his alternative. Mr. Streit does not propose to disturb in any way the relation of India and Burma with the British Empire. And even if India joins as a full founder-member of the Union, her position will be the same as it is at present as a founder-member of the League of Nations. She will have to make a contribution on the highest scale to the revenues of the Union and act as a camp-follower and vote with the British delegation without regard to the justice or injustice of British policy. Eight months ago it was "appeasement." Today it is a Peace Front against the same Powers. Never have thoughtful Indians felt the spiritual burden of the British yoke sogalling as in recent months when India had to stand a silent and impotent witness to the exasperating ineptitudes of Mr. Neville Chamberlain.

The Round Table reviewer goes on to try and reconcile Mr. Streit to the admission of India by the following quaint reasoning :

> In facing the problem of India, Mr. Streit is frankly baffled by the difficulty of including a nation of 400 million people on the basis of equal votes for all citizens in the federal elections. But the problem would be solved in practice by the backwardness of the Indian masses, since a simple test of literacy (such as any civilised union might be expected to impose) would exclude the great majority of the 400 millions. Nor is there any reason to suppose that if India formed part of a federal union her votes would all go one way.

The writer is clearly banking on the illiteracy of the Indian population—the blackest mark on the British administration of a century and three quarters—and the differences between Hindus and Muslims and British India and Indian States, to counteract the weight of numbers. If he was in touch with current developments he would not be so confident about the operation of these factors. Energetic literacy campaigns undertaken by provincial Governments with enthusiatic voluntary co-operation are in progress; and before the Union materialises, a large proportion of the population will satisfy the tests of literacy laid down for Census enumeration purposes. The hope of excluding a large proportion of the population by a literacy test is doomed to disappointment. As for differences among Indian communities and between British and Indian India, these differences will disappear when coloured races are face to face with White races, unless there is a thorough, radical change of relations between the two, enabling individuals of the two groups to think and judge of each other and to deal with each other as individuals on their moral and cultural merits. India will not care to join the Union unless she can do so on absolutely equal terms. She knows and feels in her soul that she has a valuable contribution to make to world order. But this she cannot do unless she sits in her own right at the Conference Table. Her ways of thought fundamentally differ in important respects from the British and American. She has pondered long and deeply on the problem of unity underlying diversity and she feels that she has the key to it which Europeans and Americans do not have. If Mr. Streit's Union does not admit her, so much the worse for the Union. She will find other means of discharging her duty to world well-being and progress. The days of miracles are not past. The stone which the builders had set at nought has become even before our eyes head of the corner. Japan in fifty years has equalled and surpassed her western masters in the organisation of industry and war. Germany has risen from the depths of depression to the height of a great Power in six years. History is not going to stop with that.

TRAFFIC IN WOMEN AND LIQUOR.

Gandhiji writes in the Harijan :—

In this country we are not used to legislation for the regulation of vice. But in countries like Germany(?) the houses of women who sell their virtue are licensed. I do not know what will be more resented in those countries, the stopping of the licenses for the houses of ill fame or the houses of drink. When woman realises her dignity she will refuse to sell her virtue and those members of the sex who are jealous of its honour will move heaven and earth to have legalised prostitution abolished. Will it be then contended that such abolition will go hard with the prostitutes and their dependants whose only means of livelihood depended upon this calling ?

Gandhiji has used the brothel system as an analogy to the liquor trade. But it is more. The liquor trade is the lynch-pin which keeps the brothels going. The literature on the subject is replete with evidence of the close, the organic, relation between the two. The girls in the brothels are expected to make more by getting their customers to drink than by their regular trade. The girls themselves can not keep the pace—they have to be at the call of every customer and the more favoured ones may have several a night—without the drink which makes them insensible to fatigue for the time being, though it wrecks them physically in less than five years, the maximum effective life of women in this trade. Evidence of this is incidentally provided in the League of Nations Report on the international traffic in women and children (1933). Here is a report from a Sourabaya (Java) official :

> There were about fifteen girls from France and also some Saigon : they were European girls. They did not come for prostitution, they were cabaret girls. After the cabaret they had to stay in the dancing place until three in the morning. When they were in the dancing establishment they were real entertainment girls, whose business it was to push men to drink champaigne and buy them chocolates.

The girls went to the lodging of the man and not to their own, and, therefore, argued the official, this cannot be called real prostitution. (p. 251). Then there is a report from Tientsin where the age-long Euro-Asiatic struggle is being rehearsed :

> The cabarets get tremendous profits off drinking. The ordinary wage of a cabaret girl is anything from 30 to 50 dollars a month and her commission on drinks which she sells may come to as much. It depends on the girls' business instincts as to how much she makes. It is a cheap form of drink sold at a tremendous profit. The champaigne is just a sparkling drink with some syrup in it, and they charge very heavily for it. (P. 147.)

This passage occurs under the head "Russian Prostitution." The International traffic In women is closely allied to the International traffic in liquor.

BHAWANI DAYAL SANYASI.*

The problems of Indian Overseas are generally viewed in the mass. We seldom have the opportunity of studying it on the human side. But in the last analysis this, like all social questions, hinges on the type and character of the individual Indian overseas. Indian leaders who have had the opportunity of visiting him on the spot, generally see only so much of him as is necessary for the enquiry or investigation which called them there. It is generally some civil or political disability which, having reached an acute state, has aroused public resentment in this country, and the purpose of the enquiry is to find some formula which will smooth over the difficulty for the time being. One or two of them happen to get a glimpse of the inner side of Indian life in the lands beyond the seas. They have as a rule realised the need of some agency by which the Indians abroad might be helped to attain a cultural and social outlook which, both according to the standards of the East and the West, would secure for them the qualifications for a high type of citizenship, whether in practice they receive it or not from their fellow citizens. A sociological investigation of the conditions and character of Indian life overseas is an urgent need.

This need is to some extent met by the sketch of the life and career of Bhawani Dayal Sanyasi by Prem Narayan Agrawal, M. A., published by the Indian Colonial Association at Ajitmal, in the Etawah district in the United Provinces. The Indian public, in the course of the agitation to stop the drain from this country of indentured emigrants, had come to regard the system as so utterly bad that it could not imagine any one born and brought up in it, developing qualities of leadership not merely in the political but in the social and religious life of the community. The few men and women whose names became known in India had come into prominence as followers and fellow-workers of Gandhiji during his South African career. Bhawani Dayal Sanyasi's career brings into relief the inherent capacity of the Indian community in South Africa to produce original types independently of influences from the mother country. Bhawani Dayal's parents had migrated from Bihar to Natal as indentured labourers. Mr. Agrawal does not attach importance to dates—a common failing with our writers. He says that Babu Jairam Singh was honest and hardworking and that these qualities enabled him to earn enough money to purchase two villages in his native province when he returned home in 1904. On the expiry of his indenture, he made a short stay in Johannesburg where Bhawani Dayal was born on September, 1892. As Jairam Singh did not leave South Africa till 1904, he seems to have spent about 12 years in Johannesburg which is not 'a short stay' as described in the passage quoted from Gandhiji's "My Experiments with Truth." Jairam Singh is said to have been a refugee in Natal for three years on the outbreak of the Boer War, when Bhawani Dayal is said to have been a child of six. According to the date given of his birth, he would have been nearer nine than six years old at the outbreak of the War. Jairam Singh died in 1911 in one of the two villages which he had purchased, Bahuara in the Arrah district, Bihar. Bhawani Dayal's first schools, St. Cyprian's and Wesleyan Methodist, were apparently in South Africa (Mr. Agrawal leaves this also to be guessed). In Bihar he seems to have been taught mostly by tutors engaged by his father. The Partition of Bengal was the first event which fanned the fire of patriotism in young Dayal's bosom. After his father's death disputes about property with his step-mother (Jairam Singh had married a second time after Bhawani Dayal's mother's death), led him in disgust to hand over the whole estate to her and her children and to leave for South Africa. We are left to gather incidentally that there was some property in South Africa which had come to Bhawani Dayal, so that he was not altogether destitute in that land. Bhawani Dayal joined Gandhiji's civil resistance movement and went to jail with his wife. He visited India several times later and on one of these visits he was drawn to the Arya Samaj. He was admitted to the order of Sanyasi in the village of Bahuara where he established a library and reading room for the study of questions relating to Indians overseas. The Swami is also a practical social reformer and he has brought about more than one intermarriage among his relatives. His wife, Shrimati Jagrani Devi, was a valuable help-mate. Though unable to read and write at the time of marriage she was deeply imbued with Hindu culture, and her whole-hearted devotion and solicitude enabled the Swami to face the hard problems of the alien world overseas with calmness and confidence. He has two sons who, Mr. Agrawal says, relieve him of financial worries.

The Swami impresses all whom he meets by his gentleness, sobriety and moderation. He has little of the combative qualities of the typical Arya preacher. He is slow to judge harshly of others with whom he may not agree and he does not suppress honest difference of opinion out of deference to friends. Mr. Agrawal makes special mention of this quality in his subject. He differed from Mr. Srinivasa Sastry (who, by the way, cherishes a kind regard for him which he expressed recently in a private letter). Mr. Agrawal, we believe, is mistaken in thinking that Gandhiji was ever in favour of repatriation on which the Swami differed from Mr. C. F. Andrews, as did this writer from the first. He has come into disfavour with a section of our politicians by publicly avowing that, after meeting the Government of India officers, he is convinced that they are doing their best for Indians in South Africa. This section has throughout been ignorantly or wilfully denouncing Government for their apathy, and the Swami's honest avowal does not suit its book. Mr. Agrawal observes, no doubt reflecting the opinion of his subject, that after Gandhiji left South Africa a great lethargy settled upon the Indians there. In fact, it is not generally known that they were beginning to find his activities too strenuous for them even before he left the country. There are few now who can take over the leadership in the same spirit as Gandhiji. This is a fact which should be given adequate weight when we hear talk of starting passive resistance in South Africa.

INDIVIDUAL LIBERTY AND LIQUOR.

(By Tee Tee.)

One of the many amazing features of the controversy which has arisen over the Prohibition policy of the Government of Bombay, is the assumption, not only by anti-Prohibitionists, that the drinker is one who believes in the principle of "live and let live," while the Prohibitionist is an interfering busybody who will not leave his neighbour in peace. This is, to say the least, an exaggeration. I was surprised to read in the otherwise well-reasoned article of "Moderate Drinker" the assertion that Prohibition of liquor was an interference with individual liberty. And I felt impelled to set down my experiences which, I am sure, can be matched by some of your readers.

I shall confine myself in this article to the class to which "Moderate Drinker" himself obviously belongs; the middle class, Western or westernised, which indulges occasionally in cocktail parties but spends the greater part of its life in pursuing more or less earnestly the sobering task of earning a living. The ethics of Prohibition, the economics of liquor and the tonic qualities of drink to the worker do not come within the scope of this article. I at any rate do not propose to enter into abstract discussions in which neither "Moderate Drinker" nor myself is sure of our ground. But a word of caution. I do not belong to the society which I describe. In so far as I have roots, it is in the puritanical middle class rather than with the "men of the world." I am attempting to explain the latter to this class as much as discussing the question of civil liberty.

To consider the matter dispassionately, I was, unlike "Moderate Drinker," brought up in a family which looked askance not only on drink but on smoking as well. The few instances of drinking which came to our notice, were extreme cases of obvious over-indulgence, and they confirmed the traditional aversion to alcohol. It was a social reform, not an orthodox, home, but it had reacted from the kind of "reform" which bathed Bengal in a baptism of brandy. Shortly after I passed out of college, circumstances took me out to Northern India, and the society in which I found myself, was very different to what I had known in my earlier days. A prohibitionist was to many of my new friends a joke; a teetotaller an object of ridicule. I was not a Prohibitionist and I made it clear to those whom I had to meet in my work at the office, that I was content to follow my own inclinations and leave others to their own particular pleasures. In the sobriety of office hours, my rational attitude was heartily approved.

But there were parties as well. The first of these was an exclusive dinner thrown by a senior member of the staff. I was asked as soon as I went in, what I would have to drink. I was asked again if I was sure that I would not like anything stronger than lemonade or a glass of water. My host kindly informed me that what the rest were drinking, was "nothing more than crushed ice." As the evening wore out, my neighbour demanded of me rather aggressively whether I had not a feeling that the rest of the company would get drunk before the party ended. I said that I had an open mind on the subject. In spite of my insistence that my objections were more personal than moral, it was obvious that the rest of the company resented my position as a non-drinker. The party, however, ended with no worse results than two casualties and many absentees from work the next day. I had to pay for my abstemiousness by doing their work as well!

The second function was more or less official. It was a farewell dinner to the head of the office. The drinkers' feelings of embarrassment increased as the drinks went in. When all other inhibitions had been overcome, it was surprising to see that my presence was still felt. A normally sedate gentleman who had executed an amazingly agile Travancore dance in front of the guest of the evening, asked feebly as he collapsed in a chair, "Where is Tee Tee?" When he caught sight of me, he smiled and assured me that, though I might think he was drunk, he was fully conscious of all that had happened. A friend of mine came up to me with a glass of whiskay in his hand. We hulloed each other and he seated himself by my side. There was an incoherent argument about alcohol and by the time we had got round to the same point the sixth time, two others had joined us. Suddenly my companion asked me if I would have a drink to oblige him. I refused. He insisted that I have one, and there was a chorus of approval. With obliging hospitality he moved off to get me a drink, while the others told me down in my seat. When he returned, he assured me that he had only put in a spoonful of whiskey and that "it was the principle of the thing." Across the room I heard my host of the earlier party remark to the only other teetotaller in the room with subdued enjoyment, "They have got him." To me he shouted encouragingly that if I only took one sip, it would be over. By this time I was flat on the sofa, with two of my companions holding me down by my feet and head. As the drink came nearer, I realised that my hands had been left free through an oversight; the glass of whiskey and soda spilt over a beautiful shirt-front. There were a few maudlin tears at the "waste of so much good stuff." I did not regard the incident as any more than a pleasant (or unpleasant) frolic. The next day at the office some of the party were slightly ashamed of the incident. The chief figure, however, assured me that the next time I would not "escape" him. I retorted that there would be no next time.

This is not a propaganda article. Any non-drinker who attends small parties where drinkers, moderate or otherwise, predominate, will bear me out when I say that there is always a tremendous force against his remaining teetotal. The social influence is usually more subtle. I once asked a friend of mine what was the reason for this. "A non-drinker," he replied, "has only two courses: Either he too must drink and reach the same freedom from inhibitions that the others have arrived at; or he must get out and stay out. There are many things which we do after the drinks have set us up, which we would not do if we were—well, not drinking." "Moderate Drinker" says the same thing when he confesses that, after a glass, he is more cheery than is his wont. I might add this is not always true. Some grow distinctly morose.

There is a sequel. I had resisted all efforts to persuade or coerce me to drink not because I detested liquor or considered it morally bad, but, curiously enough, because I did not like to be forced to do something which I had declared I would not do. Individual liberty! But my curiosity was aroused. I wanted to know what the much-vaunted stuff tasted like. I knew, however, that once I "took a sip" at a party, my reputation as a teetotaller would be lost and each friend would expect me to do in his company what I had done with another man or at another party. Fortunately or unfortunately,—but fortunately since Prohibition is coming soon—I was able on long railway journeys to satisfy a curiosity without acquiring a habit.

It is absurd, therefore, to ignore the social pressure which the group that drinks exercises on those who do not, and to depict life under a free liquor regime as one which allows full individual liberty. It might conceivably be argued that there is no need for those who do not drink, to attend cocktail parties and dinners, particularly when the hosts are non-teetotal. But the two sections of society are not so sharply divided as people think. Of the persons who attended the farewell dinner I have mentioned in this article four were Indians, about seven were Europeans. They are today scattered all over the country, holding responsible positions and exercising a certain influence in the forming of public opinion. At another function, a dinner given by an Indian gentleman, the position was not very different. All my experience is of middle class entertaining. Some of them have "graduated in the school of commonsense and experience;" others after "matriculating" under the tutelage of those who graduated, are now still being educated. None of them were working class men whose need was "education, education and more education." They did at times take to drink because they had nothing else to do that they could think of; but they had only themselves to blame for this. The tangawallas of the town had many interesting episodes to relate of the vagaries of the younger members of the office.

Personally I might add that I derive no pleasure from the Government's acceptance of Prohibition; rather the reverse. It is no cause for rejoicing to be introduced at every feast as a death's head. Invariably a suspicious and positively unfriendly glint comes into the eyes of other guests, when I am introduced, as I always am now at cocktail parties, etc., as a "red-hot prohibitionist," After August 1st the position will be doubtless worse since, they fear, as one man elegantly put it to his wife, that I shall be "snooping round" to report delinquents. Some of these friends, I must admit, are at their best with one drink inside them and another before them. They will be ferocious under Prohibition.

DRINK AND THE BACKWARD CLASSES.

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

I am for many reasons a Prohibitionist; I would like to be able to support the Bombay Government's policy. With all its uncertainties, however it will be an immense good if honestly worked, and that it will be. Infringements will not be so common as the anti-prohibitionists think, partly because we are not built as a nation on the American scale, and partly because the population is an unarmed one and forced to settle its disputes, whether it likes it or not, non-violently.

In his article, "The Case against Prohibition," published last week, "Moderate Drinker" seems to hold as axiomatic that the working classes do not stand to gain under Prohibition. You have referred to the condition of mill-workers.

As for the value of Prohibition to the Depressed classes and the backward communities, in spite of "Moderate Drinker's" assertion that no social worker can honestly say that drink is a crying problem, the fact remains that the Bombay Committee on Depressed Classes and Aboriginal Tribes did say this very thing. I quote the passage:

> Almost all the castes comprising the three groups or the Backward Classes, and forming more than one-fifth of the total population, form a great part of what are called the drinking classes.....A large part of their hard-earned money goes to the drink shop.....Large masses of these people, when asked in a body why they do not voluntarily abstain from drink, reply, "But why do you not get the Government to close the drink-shops?" They mean thereby that the temptation to drink is too great to be resisted by them every minute of their life.....A very large proportion of witnesses have expressed in writing and orally their great desire for total prohibition. Almost all the Depressed Class and Aboriginal Tribes witnesses have told us their view that Prohibition is the only solution to the many economic ills of their classes.

Dr. Ambedkar and Mr. P. G. Solanki were prominent members of this Committee over which Mr. O. H. B. State presided (1928).

HINDU LAW REFORM.*

(By Sir Sitaram S. Patkar.)

The Hindu joint family has now lost its cohesion, and by the process of partition or otherwise the individual is asserting his rights. The unit of society is now the individual and not the joint family. The Hindu joint family represented the socialistic principle that if the family wealth was augmented by the efforts of a single member of the joint family, all the members had equal shares. A person born in a joint family had an interest in the joint family by birth even if he subsequently did not contribute his labour or augment its wealth. Even the self-acquisitions earned by a member of a joint family who acquired special education at the expense of the joint family belonged to the joint family. This iniquitous doctrine resulted in a premium on indolence and discounted individual enterprise. The iniquity of this doctrine is now remedied by Act XXX of 1930, (The Hindu Gains of Learning Act 1930.) Though the joint family may be said to have rendered useful service in the past by providing benefit to the old and infirm members of the family, similar to the old age pensions, or by providing insurance against illness, making provision for marriage of boys and girls and for maintenance of widows in the family, the institution is found to have survived its usefulness and is fast disappearing.

In the present complex state of society many difficulties are experienced on account of the technical rules of Hindu Law relating to the system of joint Hindu family. The institution of joint Hindu family is responsible in some measure for the reluctance of banks to advance money for trade purposes to Hindus, lest the security of the joint family property on which the advances are made is found illusory by the application of technical rules of Hindu Law—e. g., (a) the inherent right in the joint family property by birth of a new member or members, (b) the binding nature of an alienation only for antecedent debts, (c) validity of an alienation on the ground of necessity or benefit of the joint family. If the joint family system is in process of disintegration, it would perhaps be more advantageous to Hindu Society to place its members on the same legal footing as members of other societies in the matter of competency to pledge the credit of the property standing in the name of the individual members for purposes of trade. This can only be effected by suitable legislation.

The other fundamental basis on which Hindu Law is based is the doctrine of "spiritual benefit." This is the result of the blending of law and religion in the Smritis which lay down Dharma, i. e., both spiritual and civil law. The belief in the efficacy of offering Pindas and performance of Shradha ceremonies is fast disappearing. Enlightened public opinion is not necessarily in favour of performance of Shradha ceremonies for the purpose of saving the souls of dead relatives. The general trend of enlightened thought gradually runs in the direction of relieving the distress of living human beings by means of education and medical relief.

Another basic principle enunciated by some of the smritis is the incapacity of women to hold and manage property. The level of general education among women has increased by leaps and bounds. Women have taken considerable part in political agitation in recent times. The women's organisations have taken a prominent part in shaping social legislation. Desai's Bill of Adoption had to be abandoned in the local legislature on account of the opposition led by women. Women have now got the franchise, by legislation. There are elected women members in the local and central legislatures. There is a parliamentary secretary in the Bombay cabinet. A lady is a member of the cabinet in the United Provinces. If women are now occupying positions of trust and responsibility, the texts of Manu and other smriti texts based on the assumption of women's incapacity of managing and holding property have lost all force and are inapplicable to the present environments of society.

It would, therefore, appear that the fundamental assumptions and ideologies have undergone complete change in the evolution of Hindu Society, and therefore the Smriti texts which are based on those theories and ideologies are of doubtful application to the present condition of society. The decisions of Courts of law which are based on those texts also require modification. This can only be achieved by legislation. I have dealt with a few of the fundamental theories and ideologies which have undergone change. So far as enlightened public opinion is concerned, there is a marked tendency to rely less on the authority of texts and to appeal to reason, and apply the principles of justice, truth and equality.

There is, however, a curious change in the ideologies of Hindu society at different times. Widow marriage was recognized by Hindu scriptures, and a son born of a marriage with a widow was considered a legitimate son. But it fell into desuetude and widow remarriage was banned from Hindu society. There was again resurgence of strong opinion in favour of widow remarriage which led to the enactment of the Widow Remarriage Act of 1856. Widow maariage was legalised and the issue of such a marriage was legitimized. Though public opinion again hardened at the end of the last century, there is now an absence of strong opposition to widow remarriage, at least there is acquiescence and tolerance, if not active support to the movement.

Another instance of a change in the ideologies of Hindu society is furnished by the ebb and tide of public opinion on the question of caste. In very early times the system of caste was not in existence. The Aryans who came to India according to Dr. Bhandarkar more than four thousand years before Christ, were divided into three grades, but formed one community, and the aborigines who succumbed to the Aryans belonged to the fourth grade, Dasas. In course of time the four main castes or Varnas were sub-divided and the castes in India now number about four thousand in the whole of India. In the Bhagvadgita the fourfold division of castes was created according to apportionment of "qualities and duties" or "energies and actions." Yajnyavalkya in his Smriti refers to inter-caste marriages and the ceremonies to be observed in marrying girls of the same or different classes or castes. So also Yajnyavalkya makes provision for the shares in the inheritance of sons born of inter-caste marriage. Yajnyavalkya has expressed an opinion in favour of the validity of Anuloma marriage, i. e., marriage of a higher caste with a woman of a lower caste, and also in favour of legitimacy of the issue of such a marriage and has laid down the shares of the sons from women of the four different castes or varnas in the ratio of 4, 3, 3 & 1. Yajnyavalkya has expressed an opinion against inter-marriage with a sudra woman and has no objection to inter-marriages between three regenerate castes.

refers to the text of Brahaspiti that the son of a sudra woman by a man of a twice-born class is not entitled to a share of land, as implying that he might get a share of moveables. Land obtained by donation is excepted. It was held by the Bombay High Court in Bai Gulab vs. Jivanlal I. L. R., 46 Bom. 871 that a marriage between a male of a higher varna with a woman of a lower varna being an Anuloma marriage is valid. The validity of Anuloma marriage being established, it would necessarily follow thai the issue of such marriages would be legitimate, and it was held in Natha vs. Mehta Chhotalal, I. L. R., 55 Bom. 1 that a son born of a marriage between a Brahmin male and a sudra woman is legitimate and is entitled to inherit one-tenth of the share of the inheritance of his father and uncle. These decisions have not yet stood the scrutiny of the Privy Douncil. The Privy Council recently in its decision in L. R. 63 I. A. 295 has held that marriage between persons belonging to sub-divisions of the same varna is valid and has settled the conflict of judicial opinion on the narrow point, and has not yet expressed any opinion on the validity of an Anuloma intercaste marriage.

Owing to the impact of Western civilisation on Hindu society and the consequent sway of the notions of equity, justice and good conscience on enlightened public opinion, there was a change in the ideologies of the Hindu society which resulted in the enactment of Special Marriage Act of 1872 rendering legal inter-racial and inter-caste marriages. The objectionable feature of abjuration of all religions in the Act of 1872 was removed in 1923 by the amendment of the Act known as Gour's Act which permitted persons belonging to Hindu, Buddhist, Sikh and Jain religions to make a declaration that the parties belonged to any one of the four religions. The opinion is now gaining ground that caste distinctions must be abolished if the higher ideal of Indian Nationhood is to be realised. The fissiparous tendencies to emphasise communal, parochial or provincial differences will gradually disappear owing to the strong and genuine surge of nationality. M. Senart in his essay on caste stated that the growth of strong political and national feelings succeeded in the west in removing artificial barriers, and the absence of such feelings in India was responsible for the continuity of social and artificial disabilities.

The existence of the untouchable classes in India is a great blot on Indian civilisation. Temple entry alone is not likely to solve the question. There must be a complete revolution in the ideologies which keep Hindu society within the limits of traditional and customary action. There must be elevation of the depressed classes by education, removal of social barriers, enforcement of elementary rights of citizenship involving access to all places of public resort and social amenities and, above all, by a complete change of mental outlook which recognises no social inequality. This can be secured by beneficient executive action and wise legislation by Government, in addition to strong public opinion.

The legal disabilities of women and depressed classes can be removed by legislation which is a potent instrument for the speedy disappearance of such disabilities. Some of the social evils can be removed by spread of education and rousing of public opinion. Change in legal status and removal of legal disabilities can be secured by Legislation or executive action of Government. Legislation however, can never be in advance of public opinion. The existence and operation of human institutions depend upon the opinion of the society in which such institutions flourish. Effort must be made to conserve what is beneficial in the present social system, to oppose innovations destructive of the social fabric and culture of Hindu society as reactionary tendencies, and to uphold the sovereignty of the moral law in private as well as public life. As observed by Justice Ranade, the change we should all seek is a change from constraint to freedom, from credulity to faith, from status to contract, from authority to reason, from unorganised to organised life, from bigotry to toleration, from blind fatalism to a sense of human dignity.

TEMPLE-ENTRY, UNTOUCHABILITY AND PROHIBITION.

(by R. V. V. TATACHARIAR, MADRAS)

These three words have gained potent significance in India of today. Prohibition has received a setback in America after an abortive attempt with one stroke of the legislative part of the State; but in India it bids fair to become a successful experiment. The vedic indulgence of the Soma juice and several kinds of flesh in Aryan sacrifices received a deadly shock at the hands of the Post-Buddhist Dravidian elements among the sages and their followers. Drinks of intoxicating nature were tabooed and constituted one of the fine major sins or Pancha-maha-pathakas. The killing of a Brahmin, the adultery with a Brahmin teacher's wife, and the theft of a Brahmin's gold were all slowly interpreted to cover the murder of a human being including one in the womb, the adultery with the wife of any man in general and the theft of any property of any person and the same have gone into the Statute Book of the Indian Penal Code in this enlarged or extended sense of three of the five major sins of old. The sin of drink was always dealt with less severely; in course of time became obsolete. It was now given to the Congress ministers and leaders to deal with this ancient sin in a modern spirit and make an offence of it in a variety of ways, no less heinous than the three penal offences aforesaid.

What became of the fifth among the five major sins of old? That is, intimate association and social intercourse for over a whole year with a person guilty of any of the four major sins referred to above, formed a major sin by itself and, was, upon the authorities, never condoned or tolerated. Such "associates" went on swelling the numbers of the out-castes in India who made friends with the aborigines of the soil, thus lowering their social status as well in the eye of the Aryans and Dravidians at once. No distinction came to be drawn between the aborigines and the outcastes and both were excluded from the temple and public places of religious sacrifices, whether in South or North India. One group of sages led by Apastamba, Bodhayava and others were inclined to save the children from their parents' apostacy after their nursing period was over, while another and more successful group declined to make any such exception in the infants' favour. Congress under the mighty lead of the Mahatmaji has made a formidable crusade against the latter popular group of ancient sages and restored the former obsolete group to power and influence in India of the 20th century. Mahatma Gandhiji's reasons and considerations may be few or many; but they are all-comprehensive and indivisible in result or composition. They might be simply political as enemies of Hindu solidarity allege, or purely religious and charitable as their opponents defend, or consistent with his ardent desire to weed out all causes of reproach and abuse of his native land at the hand-of foreign calumnators of the Miss Mayo school and raise the dignity and self-respect and status and name of India as a whole among the world-comity of nations abroad. But India, has chosen to go the path of social progress of peace, order and non-violence in its own way and quite according to its own inherited genius.

NATIONAL DRESS.

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir.

When, glancing over the index of your issue of the 17th instant, I discovered that Mr. Ganguli had contributed an article on 'National Dress', I thought there would be something worth reading, something thought provoking. I must confess, however, that I was very much disappointed on reading his contribution. I had hoped that Mr. Ganguli would discuss various types of dress found in our country and try to suggest a 'national dress', a 'sartorial symbol of nationality' as you put it in your note. Instead, almost the whole article has been a tirade on what he believes to be a slavish imitation of European life, manners, and thought. Instead of a reasoned argument in favour of a particular type of clothing as eminently suited to be our dress as a nation, he presents us with a garland of sentimentality, some of whose flowers have ugly thorns. Of dress as such he speaks only at the end of his emotional outburst against Europeanism. And then that has he to say in the matter of a national dress? India is a country of varied climate and the different component parts of our country, the provinces, have devised dresses suitable to them. It is, therefore, unnecessary to have any uniformity. These various types are to be our national dress: Provincialism is to be perpetuated with a vengence and we are to continue to be Punjabis, Bengalis, Sindhis and so on, at least so far as dress is concerned. Surely you cannot call this khichdi of dresses 'national'! If there is to be a national costume, it has to be Indian, not Punjabi or Bengali or Sindhi or Gujarati or Marathi. It has to be, like the national language, a thing common to all. The variety of the Indian climate is no difficulty, for clothing can be made of cool stuff as well as from warm stuff. What matters is the style, the type. In asking us to consider the various provincial modes of dress as national Mr. Ganguli has asked us to believe that circles are squares! No, sir, we need a dress that will single us out, in a congregation of varied nationalities, as Indians. I submit that, if we are prepared to think nationally instead of provincially, it is possible to evolve out of the variety we are familiar with a national costume at once suitable, serviceable and above all dignified. In a way trousers and what is popularly called the 'half-coat' have been becoming so common as to be almost national. The sun-hat too is to an ever-increasing degree being adopted as head-gear. The European costume is so decent and convenient in many ways that it is fast becoming even international, The Japanese, the Turks, the Chinese, the Burmans, the Africans have been using it: if its use is an indication of slavish mentality, as Mr. Ganguli would have us believe, it is an outlook on dress which is almost universal.

What I advocated, or rather suggested, in my letter which you were pleased to publish in your issue of 25th March 1939, was a costume which is a combination of articles of wear already in use, viz: Chudidar payjamas, stand-up collar coat (preferably short) and sun hat. A few nationally minded doctors in Bombay have made a beginning and it seems to me that if the Congress shows the good sense of giving up its obstinate insistence on half-nude simplicity and Khaddar it will be possible to evolve a common costume.

ANTI-SEMITISM.

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

I feel sure you would not wish to cling to a belief that Christian children are brought up in a hatred of the Jews, in the face of a unanimous repudiation of such a hatred on the part of Christians. Therefore, I am emboldened to address you, to say that in my childhood in the North of England the story of the crucifixion produced not one atom of hatred for "the Jews". It would never have occurred to us to "hate" a man for what some of his extremely remote ancestors did! Nor did the Bible narrative make us even "hate" the contemporaries of Jesus. We were taught to "love all men" and that, according to Christ, "Salvation is of the Jews." He Himself was a Jew—and how could we "hate" His people? Hatred is not a Christian trait. Anti-Semitism in Eastern Europe is a product of usury.

Tokio,
2nd May, 1939.

Yours etc.,
T. BATY.

On a subject like this, obviously the Jews are the best fitted to express an opinion. Mr. Louis Golding writes in "The Jewish Problem:"

Anti-Semitism did not come into being because some Jews, or even because all Jews, were dislikeable. Its original grounds were religious—not personal, not social, not economic, not political. It was postulated that the people who denied Christ must not be admitted to the free life of their neighbours. From time to time bloody attempts were made to avenge the Passion on helpless groups whose ancestors in a remote age and land were said to have been responsible for it. At present, that line of attack has been completely abandoned—officially, at least; and so little is the "Jewish Problem" conceived on a religious basis that now in Germany even persons whose parents or grandparents or great-grandparents were converted to Christianity, and who are themselves devoted sons of the Church, are submitted to a persecution as ferocious as that directed against their remote kinsmen who profess Judaism.

But throughout the history of anti-Semitism the line of attack has changed perpetually. When religion came to count for less in the life of the Western world, it was brought up against the Jews that they confined themselves to trade and commerce and shewed no aptitude for the professions from which they had been rigorously excluded for centuries. This was one of the principal criticisms brought forward rather more than a century ago, when it was first proposed to confer the rights of citizenship upon Jews. A deliberate, and successful, attempt was made by leaders of the Jewish communities to divert their young people from commerce to the professions, with a result which is well known. It later became one of the main charges against the Jews in certain countries that they occupied a place in the professions utterly disproportionate to their number.....In the early years of this century, when Russia was massacring the Jews in the name of Holy Church, German anti-Semites were virulently protesting against the position they had attained in the professions; Drumont, the father of French anti-Semitism, was inveighing against their importance in the world of finance; and in England (where the world of finance was properly respected) certain labour leaders were accusing them of sweated labour and overcrowding in the East End.

The history of the growth of anti-Semitism will be treated below. But a word must be said here regarding the history of its growth in the individual. The Jews are the only group (and the only group, above all, with which the ordinary person is likely to come into contact) who are singled out adversely, for censure and for obloquy, in the education and training of the ordinary child. Careful teachers may qualify it, but all too often it is taught in school, it is repeated in conversation, it is proclaimed from the pulpit, it is reiterated in readings from the Gospel, it is echoed in literature, that Jesus Christ was killed by "the Jews," that is "the Jews" were responsible for the greatest crime in history.

No palliation or explanation is admitted. It is not pointed out that, at the time of the Passion of Jesus, the Jews were under Roman rule and could not pronounce a death sentence. It is not pointed out that the main incident on which this collective accusation rests—the mob surging round Pilate and crying "His blood be on us and on our children!" is regarded as legendary by Christian scholars; nor that at the time of the Passion of Jesus the Jewish party in authority was a Romanized group of aristocrats, false to every Jewish tradition and playing only for their own safety. It is not pointed out that the historical gospels exclude from all participation in the arrest, trial and crucifixion, the the religious leaders of the people, the creators of modern Judaism—the Pharisees; it is not pointed out that, in any event, only a minute portion of Jewish people, a long time ago, can have been involved.

No. Elementary education admits of no half-colours and the child is brought up to believe that "The Jews killed our Lord." Later on, he may have to read Chaucer's "Prioress's Tale," and Shakespeare's "Merchant of Venice," not to mention countless incidental allusions scattered throughout English literature, and rarely counteracted by any work of popular appeal which presents a more favourable picture.

Thus the child grows up with a prejudice early implanted in his mind. The Jewish school children with whom he mixes can bear witness to its strength and virulence, and to the fact that the query; "Who killed Christ?" is not intended academically. Later on, his attitude may alter. He may no longer believe all that he was told at school. He may not even adhere to the fundamental tenets of Christianity. But the prejudice is too deeply implanted to fade away. Instead, it is metamorphosed into something else. Crimes more pertinent to the contemporary scene are attributed to the Jews of modern world, according to individual taste—that they are too nationalist or that they are international, that they are communists or that they are capitalists, that they suffer from an incurable incivism or that they are represented in excessive numbers in public life.

There alas, the prejudice is, first in the mind of the child, then in the mind of the man, sometimes a rationalized prejudice, sometimes a prejudice that repudiates all rationalization.

From the beginning the relations between the daughter religion and its venerable parent were far from friendly, and both sides displayed a lamentable bitterness. The Jews considered the Christians to be nothing less than apostates.

The Christians envied and resented the privileges which the Jews had received from the State ..... To the ancient world there was not much to choose between Christianity and Judaism.

The confusion did not matter greatly at the beginning. But later on, when proselytizing Christianity began to make headway, it became more and more anxious for doctrinal as well as for tactical reasons to emphasize the difference.

In fact to ensure that the Christian triumph should be really complete, it was necessary to make the line of demarcation from Judaism as deep, as clear, as unsurmountable as possible, and as a natural corollary it was desirable to emphasise the moral contemptibility of those who remained on the Jewish side of it.

This was not difficult in view of the complex events by which Christianity became a Gentile religion within a century. Gentiles easily believed that Jesus Christ had been crucified by "the Jews", They did not know Jewish tradition or realize how completely Jewish all Christ's teaching was. They forgot that all his early followers were Jews, and associated with "the Jews" only responsibility for crime of the Crucifixion. It was an easy step to transfer responsibility from eye-witnesses and contemporaries to all Jews throughout the world; at all times, in all places, in all generations.

As Christianity grew more powerful this attitude became more deeply embedded and more widely spread. In the end, it became the official policy of most of Europe. It was not racial prejudice in the old sense—the dislike of the stranger which is overcome after a period of neighbourly intercourse. It was not religious zeal of the ordinary sort, in which Jews, tolerant though their tradition generally is, have doubtless sinned as their neighbours have. It was a religious hatred, heightened by jealousy and justified by the reiterated allegation that "the Jews" killed Jesus Christ. It was a basis of Christian teaching, it was read into the Gospels. It was reaffirmed in the Pulpit. It formed the subject of primitive dramatic representations. It roused the population to a pitch of fanaticism each Easter-tide, on the anniversary of the Great Crime. And, whenever familiarity had bred affection, whenever secular rulers found useful administrators among their Jewish subjects, whenever, some enthusiast expressed the view that Judaism was superior to the faith in which he had been born, or the common fold displayed too great familarity with Jews—on all such occasions every pulpit resounded once again, more vehemently than ever, to the old fulminations, and every hearer was stirred to such a pitch of excitement that he, too, longed to avenge the crucifixion.

For fifteen centuries this propaganda went on at full force, without a break. With the growth of liberal ideas in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, there was some intermission. Nevertheless, its basis was unaffected. Every child, almost as soon as he could lisp, was taught that Jesus Christ, his Saviour, was killed by "the Jews". Men who had never seen a Jew were filled from babyhood with resentment which only sought the opportunity for expression. The Jewish Problem existed for them before they rightly knew what a Jew was. Here, in the nursery, was the nursery of anti-Semitism.

JEWISH REFUGEES IN INDIA.

India has extended her hospitality to nearly 600 Jewish refugees, who were compelled to leave their homes in Germany after the advent of Nazi rule. The influx began about two years ago; but the majority of the exiles have arrived and settled in India in recent months.

Many refugees have found employment as technicians in textile and oil mills in Bombay and Ahmedabad. A well-known Bombay textile mill has taken up six young men as apprentices for training as spining and weaving masters. An industrialist in Ludhiana has started small home industries like carpentry and weaving to provide work for a limited number of Jews. Some men are employed in the vegetable ghee industry.

A scheme to settle a large number of Jews as farmers in an Indian State was under consideration for some time, but it has as yet taken no tangible shape.

Women refugees have taken up careers as children's nurses and governesses to girls, and a few accomplished in music have obtained radio programmes to sing over the air from the Bombay station of All India Radio.

The refugees include many girls, about a dozen of whom are being given free education in girls' schools in Khandala and Panchgani.

Many of the refugees find the weather conditions in their country of exile rather trying, but sickness among them is not common. They are confident of adapting themselves to conditions in this country and are willing to work hard. In their new surroundings and in the circumstances in which they are placed, they have necessarily to adopt a new standard of life. They have had to give up a good many comforts to which they were accustomed in their home country, but they are facing their new life with a cheerful spirit.

In the refugee home started at Byculla, Bombay, by the Jewish Relief Committee there are 45 inmates awaiting employment. The cost of maintaining the home, including the rent of the building, is only about Rs. 30 per head per month, which is regarded as a reasonably cheap standard of living. A similar refugee home has been started in Calcutta.

Refugees are not allowed to land in India indiscriminately. No foreign Jew is granted a visa to land, unless he has sufficient means to maintain himself, or has obtained an appointment in India, or is able to find a guarantor offering to maintain him in India for life. The restrictions are rigidly observed. Recently, the Government of India recognised the Jewish Relief Committee of Bombay as the authorised body to arrange for guarantees for the refugees. Relief committees have also been established in other ports in India. These bodies have to satisfy the authorities that the refugees desiring to land in India will not be a burden on the State.

A good many of the refugees have had friends or relations in India to offer guarantees. But in a large number of cases, the relief Committee has to offer the guarantee, maintain them in its Home, and generally help them to obtain employment by negotiating with likely employers.

An official of the Relief Committee discussing the employment problem of the refugees said that the Committee had been fairly successful in handing suitable jobs for them. The terms were not as good as one would wish for, but considering the present state of the employment market they had no reason to be dissatisfied. As long as the refugees were offered a living wage, they were encouraged to accept it.

The Jewish Relief Committee of Bombay has a membership of 80 and is maintained on voluntary subscriptions.

The Times of India.

I am told — writes "Onlooker" in the Cochin Argus—that the prospects held out for Jewish settlement in India are by no means discouraging. His Highness the Maharaja of Bikaner has been generous enough to draw up a scheme for the settlement of 12,000 Jewish families in his State and Cochin too has extended an invitation to Jewish refugees to colonise in the State. Cochin, it will be remembered, is one of the earliest Jewish settlements in India. The Maharajas of Cochin have from time immemorial established their reputation for their tolerance and hospitality and the very fact that the white Jews' synagogue in Mattancheri is situated contiguous to the residential Palace of the Rajas of old, is proof positive of the extremely cordial relationship that had subsisted even in those early days between the Ruling House and the early Jewish settlers. There are still Jewish families in Cochin who enjoy tax-free lands in recognition of the services rendered by their forefathers to the king and country against foreign aggression. Speaking lately in Bombay, Mr. Edmund De Rothschild, evidently remembering his visit to Cochin and his interview with your Dewan and the Minister, complimented Cochin Jews on their being the best organised in India, in spite of their being perhaps the smallest in number.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

From now until next October, the Preparatory Commission for the Conference on Rural Life will be issuing a series of documents designed to form a basis of discussion. A very useful one has just been issued: "The General Survey of Medico-Social Policy in Rural Areas." This document, which has been prepared under the auspices of the Health Committee of the League, describes the part which medico-social policy should play in a rational plan for the improvement of health and well-being in country districts. The problem of organising curative medicine and the task of encouraging preventive measures, both with regard to individuals and to the services forming the responsibility of the public authorities, are dealt with at some length. The chapter on preventive medicine describes a model organisation of central and district administration; it deals with the important problem of maternity and child welfare (agricultural countries, it is stated, generally have a higher infant mortality) and with the prevention of diseases which offer special problems to the country doctor.

The basis of modern public health work—not merely the prevention of disease, but also the improvement of the standard of physical and mental fitness—is dealt with in the chapters on nutrition, physical training and planning of rural dwellings and sanitation. The essays on the education of rural populations in health matters and the training of doctors and auxiliary personnel in preventive and social action show how health and well-being rest finally upon public education.

WEST OF SUEZ.

Prof. L. Rushbrook Williams writes in The Asiatic Review

"He adds to a lively, and occasionally malicious, pen a keen sense of humour and a certain confidence in his own judgment, which is the habitual prerogative of youth. The result is an engaging book, which tells us almost as much about Mr. Natarajan as about the places he visited and the persons he encountered."

"May well prove invaluable to other young Indians addicted with Western Wanderlust. For here they will read of the hotels he patronised, the tips he gave the porters he employed, where and what food he found, and the conclusions he sedately drew." The Times of India, Bombay.

"A pleasant souvenir of a six-months holiday which Mr. S. Natarajan spent in Europe last year. Mr. Natarajan left the shores of India on February 12, 1937 and when he set foot in Europe he found the whole Continent in a State of frenzy. The Civil war was in full swing in Spain, nervousness had gripped Naziland, Paris was getting the Exposition ready and England was all agog with excitement in view of the (then impending) Coronation of King George VI. Mr. Natarajan had plenty to see and hear during his sojourn. And he did well in taking his typewriter with him." The Hindu, Madras.

THE TRADITIONAL HOME OF THE SANDALWOOD TREE.

It is in perfumery that the greater proportion of Sandalwood Oil is employed at the present day and to discriminating buyers, such as perfumers and soap manufacturers must of necessity be, it is hardly necessary to extol the virtues of the East Indian Oil which is without equal, both as a fine perfume base and a fixative for the increasingly popular bouquets of the Oriental type. In addition it is now being used extensively, and with marked success, in the creation of some of the more delicate perfumes in which the Sandalwood odour is not required as a predominant character.

A few trials will convince the perfumer who has not taken full advantage of the odour-value of this oil, that is of the greatest use to him, not only for predominant Sandalwood odour where required, but also a modifier and a fixative for other odours. This is true for liquid perfumes, soaps, creams, powders and all other cosmetic preparations. It will be found invaluable to those up-to-date perfumers who pride themselves on their own "creations."

NOTES.

Dictators and the Vatican:—The intervention of the Pope with an invitation to the Democracies and Dictatorships of Europe to confer together and come to an arrangement about their differences, has a deeper significance than is apparent on the surface. The present Pope, unlike his predecessor, is a keen politician and his election was noted as a departure from the longstanding usage of not electing to the headship of the Roman Church one who has held the office of principal Secretary of State in the Vatican. The significance of the Papal invitation or exhortation, becomes apparent in the light of the signs of increasing rapprochement between the Dictatorships and the Vatican. Here are some of these. At the new Pope's inaugural festivities, it was noted that important Italian Army officers attended in full uniform and received the Papal benediction. The latest issue of "News from Germany" issued from Starnberg in Bavaria, is a special number devoted to the elucidation of the attitude of the State to the Church in Germany in the Nazi regime. It consists of numerous quotations from Herr Hitler downwards protesting that there is no antagonism between the two and that, on the contrary, the Church is receiving more material support from the State in Germany than in democratic countries. But the most significant of all is the solemn medieval ceremony which was enacted in the principal Spanish Cathedral, the head of the Catholic Church in Spain officiating, to celebrate the triumph of General Franco. We reprint elsewhere an account reproduced in the Universe, a leading Catholic organ. Herr Hitler said in his address to the Reichstag last January that his attempt to unite the "hopelessly disrupted Protestant regional Churches in Germany into one large and powerful Evangelical Reich Church" failed owing to the opposition of the regional bishops. He had, therefore, not made further efforts in that direction. "After all" the Fuehrer went on to say, "it is not our task to defend the Protestant Church or even to strengthen it by forcible means in face of the opposition of its own supporters." In other words, the Protestant Churches have shown themselves less accommodating than the Vatican. An alliance between the Vatican and the Dictator Powers will be greatly to their mutual advantage.

Japan and Britain:—China is the only country which still believes in the League of Nations and this is because she has the good fortune to have in Dr. Wellington Koo a very popular and enthusiastic permanent representative at Geneva. From the outbreak of the present Sino-Japanese hostilities, Dr. Koo has never ceased pleading for intervention to protect China, undeterred by the fact that the League members as persistently turned a deaf ear to his pleadings. At the meeting of the League Council last month Dr. Koo recalled his earlier appeals and proposed a set of "practical measures" to be adopted to help China in her struggle. The last of these was the setting up of a committee of Powers interested in the Far East to co-ordinate the measures. The Powers in the League most interested in the Far East are Russia, Britain and France. Lord Halifax, speaking for Britain, expressed the greatest sympathy with China but bluntly refused to participate in any of the measures suggested by Dr. Koo. In view of the responsibilities of the United Kingdom in other parts of the world, the British Foreign Minister said, his Government could not accept supplementary obligations. He thought that other States members would be in a similar position. M. Bonnet, the French Foreign Minister, followed in the same strain. Circumstances, he said, were not favourable to the adoption of new measures, especially the formation of co-ordinating committees. The Russian representative, M. Maisky, who presided, strongly supported Dr. Koo's proposals and pointed out that the British Prime Minister had accepted the principle of assistance to the victims of aggression who resisted attacks on their independence. The significance of this talk at Geneva was not lost upon Japan. She has declared a blockade of Tientsin this week and has refused the British offer to refer the dispute about four Chinese terrorists to a joint tribunal.

"Moderate Drinking":—We publish this week an article by "Moderate Drinker" on "The Case against Prohibition." In brief the writer objects to Prohibition on five grounds: that it is an unwarranted interference with the individual's right to eat or drink what he likes; that the attitude of the mass of Indians is not different towards liquor from that of other peoples who have tried and given up Prohibition; that liquor is a great restorative to tired workers; that smuggling isal ready prevalent and illicit distillation not unknown and under Prohibition a premium will be placed on lawlessness; and that the loss of revenue consequent on the introduction of Prohibition will hold back important social and educational reforms. In urging the individual's right, the writer has to fall back on medical opinion to show that, while the consumption of opium and other drugs is injurious to men and should be banned, the drinking of alcoholic stimulants is a good thing. The Labour Commission Report in discussing the industrial worker, commented strongly on the havoc wrought on all industrial workers by the wide prevalence of the drink habit. It suggested indirect methods of tackling the evil. We cannot blame the Bombay Government for its more courageous and direct handling of the question. We are not unfamiliar with the old brewers' argument in the U. S. A. that a glass of beer had more food value than a glass of milk, but no one suggested that the doctors supported that view. The argument that liquor is good because it exists, is even more true of drugs. Even as medicine the efficacy of liquor is in the main dependent on the infrequency of its use. As for the attitude of Indians towards liquor, the absence of excessive drinking in communities in India, contrasted with the extent of the evil in communities settled overseas, is a fact that is not sufficiently appreciated. The absence of social restraints in the colonies has brought about problems that are a real danger to the well-being of whole communities. We published recently an article from Malaya which showed how the overseas Indian looked on the Prohibition policies of Indian governments.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Economics of Prohibition:—The problem of the reformer is not how to bring about wholesale acceptance of new habits, not change for the sake of change; it is his task to conserve beneficent traditions and to guard his people from harmful innovations, no less than to evolve his society to a higher stage of progress. The instinct against drink which is ingrained in Muslims and Hindus, is unquestionably a sound one. The masses might have been left to the influence of time but for the example of Europeans whose social habits run counter to this tradition. Even at its worst, smuggling and lawlessness under Prohibition can lead only to "clandestine drinking." And "clandestine drinking" can never exist, by the very nature of it, on the scale on which drinking is prevalent under a non-Prohibition regime. The stigma of outlawry will be placed on drink and for the vast majority this will in itself put drinking out of court. We do not for a moment suggest that the introduction of Prohibition means the abolition of the liquor evil. The legislating of Prohibition is an important step in this direction in two obvious ways: It places more money at the individual worker's command for beneficial recreations; and it removes from the employer the great temptation of dulling the finer feelings of his men and distracting their minds from the conditions in which they work. After all, the economic argument is no more than this, that the prosperity of the State depends to a large degree on the impoverishment of its people. This is a proposition which even the most cynical politician cannot accept. "Moderate Drinker," we are afraid, has allowed his prejudice against Prohibition to colour his reading of the situation in Salem and in Ahmedabad. An anti-Prohibitionist, naturally enough, tends to treasure up every piece of club gossip he hears and to nurse it to colossal dimensions as a sign of things to come. By the time the story passes round to the third man, Prohibition experiments have completely collapsed and only a sinister Government persists in them. On the personal history of "Moderate Drinker," we can only offer him our sincere congratulations on his great good fortune in escaping lightly from his temptations. It might, as it has in many cases, have so easily turned out otherwise.

Women and Politics:—The Report of the thirteenth session of the All India Women's Conference held at Delhi in the closing days of last year, has come out punctually. It is well got up and conveys a good idea of the varied activities in which members of the Conference are engaged. The President, Rani Rajwade, in her opening address recommended the extension of the scope of the Conference to the political field. She did not want the Conference to identify itself with any political party, only to interest itself in 'constructive politics'. "I would personally define constructive political activity," said Rani Rajwade, "as consisting of the following: For instance, a clear declaration of our unity with many of the political parties in India regarding the accepted goal of independence for India should be made forthwith." What does Rani Rajwade expect to be the advantage to the women's movement of declaring that independence is their goal? At present, the Women's Conference consists of women of all communities, ranks and classes, Maharanis, Ranis, wives of high officials, women themselves holding official positions, social workers, European and Indian. The adoption of a political goal would introduce a factor of disintegration. Politically-minded women,—the great majority of women as well as men are not politically minded—can join the Congress, the Muslim League or the Communist or the Socialist or the Royist or the Forward Groups and work alongside of men for the ends they have in view. As women, so far as we can see, there is nothing special which women and they alone can achieve in the political field. The Women's Conference would best serve the community by concentrating on matters specifically relating to women and children, of which men have only a superficial knowledge. By spreading themselves out in all directions, the promoters of the Women's Conference would dissipate their energies—such energies as they can spare from their household or professional work,—without any tangible result. What we in India, men and Women alike lack, is concentration. We want to do this, that and everything.

Hyderabad Agent at Nagpur :—The choice of Sir T. Venkatasubba Rao as representative of H. E. H. the Nizam's Government at Nagpur to watch over the interests of Berar in the Central Provinces Administration, is an admirable one in more than one respect. Sir Venkatasubba Rao was very highly respected for his independence and impartiality as well as his legal acumen at the Madras High Court in which he acted as Chief Justice before his retirement. He and Lady Venkatasubba Rao are keenly interested in social work especially for women. They have been conducting the Madras Seva Sadan for several years past. In Nagpur and Hyderabad they will find a wide field for the extension of their activities. A point which would not need mentioning but for the communal atmosphere with which the Hyderabad atmosphere is charged, is that the choice of a Hindu to be his first representative in this important function, is pleasing testimony to the broad-mindedness of His Exalted Highness and his Government.

Mr. Gangulee on Dress :—Mr. J. M. Gangulee in his article on National Dress presses for the discarding of Western clothes rather than for the adoption of Indian dress. This seems to us to be rather late in the day. In the provinces there are few ministers who wear European clothes, only one minister in Bombay itself What is more, most of them have by now got over the early self-consciousness which possessed them when at the call of urgent patriotism they first left off wearing their accustomed Western clothes. Even Dr. Gilder has "indianised" his Western suit by crowning it with a Gandhi cap. We think, however, that politics of the dress is out of place where there is more serious work at hand. The Japanese whom no one can accuse of deficiency in national spirit, do not hesitate to adopt Western dress. Too much insistence on clothes might not inconceivably lead to the politicians evolving a national dress as they have a national language. And we are sure Mr. Gangulee will be repelled by anything that political ingenuity can devise as a sartorial symbol of national unity.

The "Dnyanodaya" Retreats :—In a recent issue of the Dnyanodaya, reference was made to the persecution of Christians in the twentieth century similar to the religious persecution of Indians by the Portuguese through the Inquisition at Bassein. In replying to our friendly protest againt this exaggeration, the Dnyanodaya two weeks back (we reprinted the note last week) watered down its remark to mean not similar methods but similarly shocking acts of persecution. It referred specifically to Hyderabad and, after saying that it had evidence in its possession of amazing persecution, advised the Reformer to send a representative down to the State to see things for himself. Naturally we asked Mr. Edwards to publish his facts exactly as he had received them. Even before we start investigating we must surely know where to investigate. The Dnyanodaya in its current issue gives this peculiar reply :

> Not all the arguments and "invitations" of our friend the Reformer will induce us to offer one iota of proof for a statement which we have not only never made, but which we should regard as incorrect if anyone else made it. As far as we are concerned the subject is closed.

What is the statement the Dnynanodaya never made ? What, more important, is the subject which the Dnyanodaya regards as closed ? So far as Hyderabad is concerned, Mr. Edwards must either substantiate his statement or unconditionally withdraw it. Mr. Edwards himself has not verified the statements of his Hyderabad friends as he says that they came to him as he was reading The Reformer comment. It is not improbable that they are coloured by the recent unfortunate communal happenings in that State. Now, however, that Mr. Edwards has started the game, he should see it through, in fairness to Hyderabad State and Hyderabad Christians.

Social Reforms and Hinduism:—"We are frank enough to say," writes the Indian Witness of Lucknow, "that at times we have felt that the Reformer has been more concerned with the defence of Hinduism than with social reforms." We do not see why the Witness makes so much of its frankness which we should have thought required no special courage on its part. The Witness misses the whole basis of religious and social reform if it seriously thinks that it is aimed at destroying the religion it seeks to purify. If we have not followed the Witness's lead in our advocacy of Indian social reform, it is because we are confident that reform and not disruption is needed. The Communist might as well reproach the Christian for "defending Christianity" instead of "improving" it. Apparently the Witness expects Indian reformers to work as inside men on its behalf. This is the outcome of a naive optimism and it is not surprising that the Witness feels cheated every time its hopes fail.

The "Examiner's" Lapse :—The Examiner's criticism of our comments on Archbishop Roberts' attack on Prohibition, is, as might be expected, wide of the mark. But our Catholic contemporary's lapse in assuming that we referred to Jesus Christ when we wrote of "a Galilean fisherman," is inexcusable. Jesus, as everybody knows, was the son of a carpenter. By Galilean fisherman we referred, of course, to St. Peter who became the first Bishop of Rome.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

BOMBAY, June 17, 1939.

THE STUDY OF INDIAN HISTORY.

Somewhere about the middle of the last century the influence of the theory of evolution made itself felt in the study of History. The condition of the people, it was realised, was more important as the subject matter of history than the names of kings and the dates of battles. The charge against Indians that they were lacking in the historical sense, was framed by the upholders of the "drum and trumpet" school. From the evolutionary point of view, no country can show a more continuous record, and one extending over a longer stretch of time, than India. J. R. Green with his "History of the English People" pioneered the new movement in England. His method made a strong appeal to Indian scholars. Ranade in his addresses to the National Social Conference and in his fragmentary History of the Marathas, K. T. Telang and Sir Ramakrishna Bhandarkar, were the most distinguished exponents of the new method on the Bombay side. Sir Akbar Hydari in his occasional addresses and writings has avowed his appreciation of the Ranade school and applied its principles to some educational and social questions. As Prime Minister of the largest Indian State, he has now the opportunity, vouchsafed to none of his fore-runners, to give practical effect to the doctrines of this school.

A recent Hyderabad Press Communique, which is printed elsewhere, outlines a plan for providing text-books on Indian history for use in schools written from the evolutionary point of view. This point of view is embodied in a "triple principle" to guide the work of the Committee appointed to carry out the project. This is "the elimination of communal bias so as to conduce to the development of a spirit of tolerance among students; greater emphasis on the cultural and social aspects of historical events; and simplification of language." We do not know what text-books are at present in use in schools in Hyderabad. In British India they are prescribed or recommended by the Educational Department and are generally based on the works of Anglo-Indian authorities. Many of the authors were British officials who had either themselves taken part in the events they described or were engaged in carrying out policies issuing from those events. With all their desire to present a true picture of things as they saw them, they could not altogether surmount the difficulty caused by their seeing them only from the point of view of a foreign Power obliged not only to derive but to justify its authority by looking at the indigenous powers which it superseded, from the least favourable angle in which they could be seen. There were honourable exceptions.

The most distinguished of the builders of the British Indian Empire recognised the excellence of the institutions which they found prevailing in this country and, in the words of Elphinstone, set themselves not to change the laws but to administer them better than the native governments. But there were inherent difficulties in the way of their regarding Indian history as a continuous process. To outsiders, occasional breaches in the sky-line were more prominent to their vision than the essential inner continuity of the vast range of India's history. Typical of this is the division of Indian history by Anglo-Indian historians into the Hindu, the Mahomedan and the British periods. English History is not likewise divided into the Druidical, the Pagan, the Catholic and the Protestant periods. European History is generally studied in time periods, ancient, medieval, modern. There is in fact less excuse for dividing up Indian history on a religious basis, as the social and economic life of the people remained practically unaffected by political movements. This is due to the fact that the Indian view of sovereignty, Hindu, Buddhist and Mahomedan, did not include the power of social legislation. The people were left largely to regulate their own lives by the caste and village autonomies which had been prevalent from time immemorial. The religion professed by the ruler may be Hinduism, Buddhism, Jainism or Mahomedanism (Sunni or Shia), but he almost invariably recognised it as his duty to protect every religion professed by any group of his subjects, even if it was only Animism. The underlying idea was that men are best left to evolve their own social and religious beliefs according to their needs and aptitudes, and the State's function is to protect the community in the free exercise of its social and economic autonomy. The study of the evolutionary process in Indian history is of entrancing interest just because it is almost entirely inspired by the natural reaction of men to changes in their environment.

The task of writing text-books of history on evolutionary lines so as to make them interesting to school children, is a difficult one. The great majority of school children find their main interest in history in stories like that of Clive and Omichand, the Black Hole, Nandkumar's hanging, and the shooting of the Mughal Princes by Hodson at the Dewan-i Am, and such other incidents. Text books without the human interest will repel young students. And there is no reason why the human interest should not be retained while observing the evolutionary character of teaching. Clive's dealing with Omichand may be explained, like the Hussain-MacMahon correspondence and the Balfour Declaration, as being prompted by the pressure of great political exigencies. The Black Hole may be retained in school-books with the annotation that it is the invention of one of the incarcerated men without any historical basis. Holwell's gossip is a historical fact though the Black Hole was not, and must be recorded. The right method is not to gloss over the misdeeds of the past but to instil in the young mind, that in judging of the conduct of historical figures, the rule to bear in mind is that they should be judged by the standards of their own times. The primary function of history is to report the truth and it is one which cannot be subordinated to any other. What Acton said of Modern History holds for the whole of Indian History, the outstanding characteristic of which is its wonderful continuity. He wrote:

> Modern history touches us so nearly, it is so deeply a question of life and death, that we are bound to find our own way through it, and to owe our insight to ourselves. The historians of former ages, unapproachable for us in knowledge and in talent, can not be our limit. We have the power to be more rigidly impersonal, disinterested and just than they; and to learn from undisguised and genuine records to look with remorse upon the past, and to the future with assured hope of better things; bearing in mind, that, if we lower our standard in history, we cannot uphold it in Church and State.

PRINCES AND FEDERATION.

It was anncunced on Tuesday that the Princes who met in Bombay last week-end to consider the draft Instrument of Accession, have rejected its terms as unacceptable. As British Indian opinion also has declared itself in the same sense, the only thing to do now is to scrap the scheme and proceed to deal with the question of devising a strong central Government for British India on a popular basis. The decision of the Princes is, probably, due less to the reasons by which it is supported than to the alarm created by the incursions of the Congress High Command into States' affairs during the last two years. Gandhiji's avowal that the policy of direct intervention was a mistake and that the States people should plough their own furrow, has somewhat eased the mind of the rulers. But the possibility of Gandhiji changing his mind or his followers defying his instructions, continues to disturb the minds of the rulers. They do not want again to be exposed to the anxieties of the past two years. They want more safeguards to assure them against this contingency. They will join the Federation if they are assured that they will retain all their existing rights and immunities and are allowed in addition to influence directly and indirectly the political future of British India. The objection of British India, or one of its objections, to the Federation scheme is that it puts the States in a position of unfair advantage at the centre having regard to their interests and the different stages of political development which are to be found among them. A powerful reinforcement to the British Indian objection is furnished in the paper read not long ago by Mr. Lionel Curtis before the Institute of International Affairs in London. Speaking from his experience in South Africa and from his study of other Federal constitutions, Mr. Curtis concluded: "The Federal Government must derive its authority, not from the States, but direct from the people themselves who compose the States, and must also be able to enforce obedience to that authority on persons who disobeyed it." This was the conclusionreached by the American statesmen who drew up the present constitution after the breakdown of the Confederation of thirteen sovereign States which constituted the original Union, due to the difficulty of getting the constituent States to carry out their obligations. "A confederacy," to use the words of Mr. Curtis, "could in fact operate only by virtue of continuous civil wars."

The Indian Federal Constitution is a Federation as regards the Provinces and a Confederacy as regards the States. The Provinces can be got to carry out their obligations to the Federal Government. There is machinery provided for that purpose. But there is no machinery to compel the State to do the same except the uncertain and inscrutable authority of the Paramount Power. Mr. M. K. Varadarajan writes in his "Indian States and Federation":

> If a ruler disregards his constitutional duties, the Federation stands helpless within the limits of the constitution, there are really no sanctions at all for enforcing such obligations. The Governor-General will have to appeal to the Crown Representative (the same person in another office) in case of such recalcitrancy to use his good offices and 'advise' the ruler to fulfil his obligations. Paramountcy is thus made the federal sanction and on its exercise depends the smooth working of the Federation.

The Crown Representative, it may be urged, is preferable to a civil war. In Rajkot the Crown Representative came to the rescue of Gandhiji and he will, no doubt, do the same in future disputes between the Federation and any of the States. But all such interventions carry with them certain moral and intangible, if not legal and overt, obligations. Gandhiji perceived this and drew back though he cloaked his withdrawal as a waiver of the benefits of the Gwyer Award. The Crown Representative will accede to the request of the Governor-General only if the Federal Government acceded to the wishes of the Crown Representative conveyed through the Governor-General. Thus the pivot of this hybrid scheme is the Governor-General—Crown Representative. The responsibility of Federal Ministers to the people is purely nominal. The whole scheme can be brought to a deadlock if a single ruler takes it into his head that the Crown Representative would view an exhibition of recalcitrancy on his part towards his federal obligations without much disapproval. The Viceroy has declared that the present draft Instrument is final and no important alterations can be made in it. If he sticks to that decision and if the Princes stick to theirs not to accept the Instrument, the country will be saved from having to go through an experiment which is destined to prove a disastrous failure.

Royal Visit to the United States:—We are at a loss to understand what induced the British Government to send the King and Queen on a State visit to the United States. From several points of view the decision was ill-advised. "The King business," as Americans call it, is not at a premium in the States. Organisations like "The Daughters of the Revolution" keep alive the memory of the bitter struggle which preceded the American Declaration of Independence. The Americans are suspicious of Great Britain. The Washington correspondent of the Spectator wrote:

> An entirely typical reaction to the visit is contained in a leading article published by the New York Daily News (May 9) the paper of largest circulation in the United States, headed: "Let's be courteous to Their Majesties—but calm." The article goes on to say—what will be said a thousand times in the coming weeks—that, "We should not forget, however, that the King and Queen are not coming to see us simply because they love us. They are coming here to sell us a bill of goods; to convince us that our interests are identical with theirs;" and the article ends on an isolationist note.

The ceremonies connected with Their Majesties' reception were carefully arranged so as to give no room for the least suspicion that there was any derogation from the sovereignty of the United States in the courtesies shown to the royal visitors. On alighting at the Railway Station at Washington, the American State Secretary solemnly introduced their Britannic Majesties to Mr. President. The President's wife, who had constituted herself her own publicity agent for the occasion, has stated in her syndicated articles that she left the entertaining of the King and Queen to the household staff at White House; and she even narrates with evident enjoyment one or two minor mishaps which attended the service at dinner and tea at her mother-in-law's house. The Hyde Park staff was not so well trained as the White House Staff! The King and Queen were haled with energetic American hospitality to a picnic at which the President absent-mindedly sat down on a tray of glasses. "On each occasion," adds Mrs. Roosevelt, "Their Majesties remained completely calm and undisturbed." What else could they have done, we wonder. The Maharaja of Bikaner, according to his biographer, was scandalised when President Wilson greeted the waiting King and Queen at a London Railway Station when he arrived for the Peace Conference, with a friendly "How do you do?" without any bowing and scraping. What would the Princes think of the free and easy intercourse during the royal visit to the States? There is the larger question, Why should their Majesties who are hail-fellow-well-met to all and sundry in the United States, be not the same in every part of their Empire? One result of the Royal visit, if it may be called such because it closely follows on the visit, is that President Roosevelt, discarding his denunciatory manner to the Dictators, has invited them to come to a Conference to arrange trade matters.

CHINESE INDUSTRIAL COOPERATIVES.

The Chinese Industrial Co-operatives were established in August 1938 by Dr. H. H. Kung as an organization functioning under the Executive Yuan of which he is chairman. Mme. Chiang Kai-shek has from the beginning encouraged the work in every possible way. A staff of organizers and engineers was recruited. Within six months, more than 300 industrial co-operatives, with an average of 30 workers in each, had been established and were producing textiles, agricultural implements, clothing and shoes, flour and sugar for the use of the population, woollen blankets and uniforms for the army, alcohol and sulphuric acid for industrial use, and surgical instruments and medicinal cotton for the Red Cross. One town was lighted by co-operative electricity, a co-operative printing works published a newspaper and a fortnightly magazine, co-operative foundries and machine-shops smelted and worked iron and steel, and mining co-operatives cut coal and washed for alluvial gold.

The lack of large foreign exchange reserves and the Japanese blockade make it necessary to build up an industrial base independent of all but the most essential imported machinery. The danger of aerial bombing, the possibility of forced evacuation of plant, and the disorganization of commercial transport inevitable in wartime, dictate that it should consist of small autonomous but interdependent industrial units, each serving its particular section of the country. The growth of democracy in China in the course of the popular war of resistance has established both the political and psychological conditions under which the co-operative becomes the obvious form of industrial organization.

Five headquarters have been set up, a Central Headquarters at Chungking; the Northwestern Headquarters in West Shensi; the Southwestern Headquarters in West Hunan; the Southeastern Headquarters in South Kiangsi; and another in Anhwei, in the guerrilla areas behind the Japanese lines.

The co-operatives are financed through three funds: the Capital Fund, the Promotion Fund, and the Special Fund. From the Capital Fund, which at the present time consists chiefly of an appropriation of $5,000,000 made by the Central Government, loans are made at 6-8 per cent annual interest to co-operative societies for the acquisition of plant and the provision of working capital. The Promotion Fund is also officially provided for the payment of staff and other organization expenses. The purpose of the Special Fund is to finance the migration of skilled workers from the Japanese-occupied territories and to cover other expenses not chargable to the two other funds. This fund is provided by donations from friends in China and overseas. Mr. Rewi Alley whose article we published last week, gives an account of the extension of activities:

"Plans are also afoot to set up labour co-operatives for road work and other projects. New mining ventures are being pushed, small industries are being established which have been hitherto unknown in the Northwest. For instance, excellent glass sand was found in one crowded locality. 'Why not set up a unit for making thermos bottles, for flashlight bulbs, for ampules for hospitals?' thought the co-operative engineers. The great demand for housing suggested a brick kiln, which was an immediate success and now finds itself unable to fill all the orders. More kilns are being planned. There were no buttons for the soldier's uniforms. Refugee button-makers were brought in to manufacture them.

There was plenty of iron ore. Why should old-fashioned blast furnace workers not be brought in from Shensi? Much better that they make iron for themselves than for the Japanese. How would the workers be transported? Friends of the C. I. C. had already helped. Others would do likewise. Most people in this seemingly mad world are decent and want to help when they can.

"From all over the Northwest, requests come to the Chinese Industrial Co-operatives to establish one or another kind of new industry. One army suffers from a shortage of leather products. Another lacks medical supplies. Cotton spinners and weavers are urgently needed in a number of districts. Districts threatened by the Yellow River floods which are certainly coming this summer ask that the C. I. C. help take care of the refugees. Everywhere, one hears the same thing. 'It is no use to us to know that things are being produced in other provinces. We must have them here, and transport is too difficult in time of war. If our refugees don't know how to work, why don't you teach them? We will be responsible for moving your machinery, if it is necessary. We will help you save your workers if you have to. All we want is production in our own area. We must have the goods!'

"To satisfy this demand, the C. I. C. staff laboured incessantly. Many of the organizers have had previous experience of co-operative enterprises. But they find that the industrial co-operatives present many a problem unknown in credit or consumer co-operatives. Industry is a complicated thing, how complicated few people understand until they set about organizing it. Expert technical knowledge must be available. The workers must give full and earnest co-operation, which means that they must have complete confidence that the organizer is playing straight. The organizer must know what everything is about. If he is a bureaucrat—a mere office-holder—he will fail. The technician must be able to stand hardship—he must not disdain old methods while constantly trying to improve them. It is no use having a nice office and an empty factory. Far better to have a thriving co-operative and no office at all.

"The movement is growing so fast that it is hard to keep up with it. New depots spring up. Transport becomes more difficult. The headquarters accounts department struggles to collect data as quickly as possible, becomes angry when it cannot do so and sets about devising ways to make sure that information will be coming in. Everyone works at top speed to put the organization on as solid a basis as possible—and all learn in the process.

"Although the Japanese air force has been extremely active over the Northwest, not one of the co-operatives has so far suffered severely from bombing. The nearest call was in Sian, where a house near a leather-working co-operative was destroyed in the course of a particularly vicious attack on the city. The front of the co-operative premises was damaged a little, but no lives were lost and no stock spoiled. The whole unit was moved to a safer place with very little financial loss—only the cost of transport for the machines and the personal belongings of the members. Industry organized in this way certainly comes close to being indestructible.

"Because they are so mobile, it is not necessary for the industrial co-operatives to return a thousand miles behind the Chinese defence lines to the Far West. Many units in the Northwest work virtually at the front and supply armies which have established new bases of Chinese resistance in "occupied" territory in the rear of the Japanese army. In one Chinese Industrial Co-operatives depot located at the base of such army, officers' wives have banded together in a tailoring co-operative for the manufacture of uniforms and other military equipment. When the writer visited them, they were singing as they worked. Plans were being made to educate their children—to provide a medical service for them—and to increase their own production.

"Not only articles that were formerly supplied by the lost industries along the coast are being made by the co-operatives. In many cases, they produce goods for which the raw material was once imported. A dry cell co-operative goes to all kinds of lengths to keep up with the demand. Old cells are collected from nearby cities and the parts used. Local materials are constantly being tried and some have been found useable. Many dyers have returned to vegetable dyes."

The dearth of manufactured goods in the areas which the co-operatives serve ensures that all their products will have a ready market. The various headquarters conduct investigations and inform would-be co-operators of the type of goods needed. There is no general form of distribution. The coal co-operatives deliver their product from house to house. Co-operatives serving the army always have their hands full with government orders. At many points, co-operative stores have been established, and under the Northwestern Headquarters, in whose territory 200 of the existing 300 coperatives are now functioning, a Federation of Co-operatives has been established to market the produots of all. With the exception of units serving the army all the co-operatives now dispose of their goods in their own localities.

To meet transportation difficulties, two special transport co-operatives, with 100 mule carts, have been organized in the Northwest.

The co-operatives are organized democratically, with an elected chairman and directors. No member is permitted to own more than 20% of the stock in any co-operative. After the payment of share interest, interest on borrowed and other capital, deductions for the extension and reserve funds, payment of wages and salaries for officials, the remainder, within 10% of the total capital of the society or 25% of the total wages, is divided among the members. If more than this percentage is left over, the surplus is paid into a foundation fund retained by the federation of co-operatives to develop activities for the good of the whole movement.

Various social and educational activities are carried on by the co-operatives. The members of each society meet regularly for mass singing of patriotic songs, lectures and discussions. Inter-society meetings are held on Wednesday evenings in the head office of any given locality. The Northwestern Headquarters published a bi-weekly. In several towns all social life has begun to revolve around the co-operative, local officials, newspapermen, bankers, students and others having been incorporated in their subsidiary social organizations. A more specific training project is the school for co-operators established in the Northwest which gives a three month course.

The present aim of the movement is to establish 30,000 industrial co-operatives all over the country. Thirty thousand industrial co-operatives can utilize the idle labour power displaced by the destruction of of large-scale industry in China, put a million refugees to work, utilise the raw material resources.

NATIONAL COSTUME.

(By J. M. Ganguli.)

The National Costume, like the national flag, has a significance of its own. To people, who are politically subject to others, and whose national culture and traditions are assailed by those zealous propagandists of the ruling race and of its kindred races, who take pride in showing up to advantage their own culture and manners in contrast to those of the people they rule over, the national costume has all the more significance. For it gives a sense of national consciousness and dignity to the wearer, and national inspiration to his other countrymen. And, therefore, just as its popularity will indicate the measure of national consciousness surviving in a dependent country, its neglect and its substitution by the dress of the rulers will show the extent of denationalisation proceeding in the country.

In India the rapidity of the spread of the European dress vogue, with the spread of university education, ought to have provoked serious thinking in the directors of the university education as to whether the education, that was imparted, was on right lines;—for, education that sucked out self-confidence from students, and instilled in them, instead, a slavish mentality to merely imitate in dress, habit and the commonest details of life, whatever their political masters did, would not surely have been on sound and generally approved principles of education. It must be remembered, however, that till but lately education had been under bureaucratic control, and, as such, it was not likely to be directed towards the nursing of national consciousness, or the development of love and regard for the customs and traditions of the native land. But with the Indianisation of the Universities, there should have been a change in the educational outlook. Has that been the case?

One had only to attend the Jubilee session of the Indian Science Association held in Calcutta in January 1937 to know what the answer was to be. Educationists, scholars and scientists from all over the country were there,—and how they seemed to vie with one another in the tip-topness of their European dress and even in their adopted European manners. The juniors who have yet to make a career, sometimes say that it is necessary for them to put on European dress, for, otherwise they do not get respect and are ignored in society. That may be true, more or less, but what about the elders, the Professors and those who have already got recognition and have even come into eminence? These were all clad in European dress, with collar and tie, though both the temperature and humidity were high enough to make such outfit most unhygienic and uncomfortable. There were several European scientists also attending the Congress, but they were all in their respective national dress. It was regrettable to think that even their examples did not prick the sentiment of self-respect and national-respect in the mass of Indian professors and scientists, who had collected in that cultural gathering. What a pitiable demonstration of slave mentality even in the high intellectuals of the country to those foreign visitors who carried their national taste, manners and style wherever they went! What indeed, must the thoughtful among these visitors have thought of those scientists in particular, who even apart from the question of nationalism in the matter of dress, dressed themselves most unscientifically and uncomfortably in their own country for the matter of imitating and putting on the dress of their political rulers! Scientists and educationists, the leading ones amongst them specially, are expected to be rational in their outlook and practical in the application in their lives of the scientific knowledge and principles, which they teach and profess. But there was an altogether different picture in that distinguished assemblage.

It is not only in such places that one finds such slavish mentality in the matter of dress, though the observance of it in the country's intellectuals is certainly very distressing. It is, in fact, all around that one notices it. Petty clerks and typists wear European dresses airily as school teachers, bank apprentices, shop attendants and even those who, serving nobody, go to a library for study or for a walk out in the evening. Big national leaders, who always exhale contempt for British imperialism are, in fact, more helplessly imbecciled under the cultural sway of the British than under their political domination, and they feel nervous and ashamed to appear in their national dress before Europeans. Mahatma Gandhi has no doubt effected a very valuable change in this respect, but the inferiority complex has gone far too deep to be eradicated so easily. Look at Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru discarding his dhoti and shirt and donning hat, coat, pants, tie and the rest, which constitute the European style, as he sails off from his country's shores.

'It is the European climate which necessitates the European style'—says he;—but is there no cold weather and are there not cold places in this country, which have evolved suitable dress for protection against cold? In the hills, in the Punjab and in the upper nothern India generally, it is pretty cold in winter. Do the inhabitants of those places put on European dress? Does he himself put on European dress, when visiting those places in winter, since his membership of the Congress? Panditji explains further, "I didn't like to attract notice by any distinctiveness in my dress."

Do Europeans ever think of changing into Indian dress when visiting this country under any circumstance? No; obviously because they feel proud to maintain their distinctiveness of ruling people from the ruled. They do not change even if they feel uncomfortable in the Indian climate. Indians are, however, quick to change in order to show that they had English education and have become cultured. There is no point in Panditji's saying that he wanted to avoid notice, for, as a matter of fact, he was not travelling incognito; rather he was by all means attracting notice by his press, platform and associational activities. The truth is that, even without his own knowledge, the inferiority complex, that has been traditionally, as well as through his education and upbringing, developing in him throughout his life, as it develops in the lives of so many other Indians, works internally and subsconsciously, making him and others lose confidence, respect and love for national things and imitate the ways of the European rulers. And that is really the saddest aspect of India's political subjection. An European writer has recently described Pandit Jawharlal Nehru in a Journal as an Indian turned westerner. Probably Panditji himself and many others too will take that description as very complimentary (Panditji has not expressed any disagreement with that description). But nothing indeed could be more pitiable than for any nationalist, particularly for a national leader, to become in outlook and habits the reflected image of his political superior. Should an Englishman be described as having become mentally metamorphosed into an Indian, far from deriving any pleasant satisfaction he would be violent on the describer and would feel he had been slandered.

This inferior mentality in our national leaders, which lies beneath their sayings and doings and their khaddar-clad outward form, is the most serious handicap in India's cultural rennaisance, the rennaisance that is necessary for her political forwardness also. And, painful though it is to say so, it is for such reason that it is difficult to lay trust and confidence in their stewardship. How can people, who despise the evolutionary social, cultural and other products of their mother-land, who always look for guidance and inspiration to their European political masters, who send away their sons and daughters for education and cultural training, work out their country's destiny and re-establish it on its natural foundations? Mentally alienated as they are from their own country, and cut off from the thought-strings of their countrymen as they have become, they can only introduce perversion and consequent weakness by trying to drag their people from their natural moorings. Laws of evolution, which follow local conditions and cause the origin and growth of customs, traditions, physical and mental formations and other features in different places cannot be overridden at will, however some unthinking people, whose vision has been dazled by the glamour of European civilisation, may try. The only thing that will happen, the more they try, will be the retardation of India's coming to her own and of her people feeling the strength and inspiration to stand confidently on their own legs.

Coming to national costume again, there are people who do not comprehend what national dress constitutes. Some even think that perhaps national dress means some standardised mode of attiring for all people in India. Nothing could be farther than that from the true significance of national dress. In an extensive country like India, having different climate and weather, to prescribe a uniform dress for all would be meaningless and most unscientific. Different parts of the country have in the course of ages already evolved suitable dresses; and it is such dress that is truly national, honourable, and hygienic for the people of respective places. A man from the Punjab going to Madras, say, may adopt the Madrasi dress for climatic reasons, but that should not mean that he should adopt even the unnecessary details of it or that he should carry it to his homeland. One may, however, raise that plea in justification of putting on European dress also. But the fact that the Europeans are the ruling races, most of whom look contemptuously at Indian culture, Indian customs, Indian traditions, and at almost everything Indian, makes the adoption of Europeanism by Indians a submission to a mentality slavish to their rulers and a shameless admission of the inferiority of their own things. This the anglicised Indians unfortunately forget.

THE CASE AGAINST PROHIBITION.

(By A Moderate Drinker).

If I venture to put the case against Prohibition in the columns of so staunchly prohibitionist a paper as The Indian Social Reformer, with its consistent record of anti-liquor advocacy over several decades, it is not because I hope to dissuade the paper from its life-long convictions. My object is merely this: to show that in the minds of moderate men there can exist legitimate doubts as to the validity of imposing a ban on liquor and, moreover, doubts as to the feasibility of enforcing such a ban. If I succeed in persuading even one ardent supporter of the principle of Prohibition that, after all, there is a case against it, my article will have served its purpose.

Before getting on to generalisations, I would summarise my own background, so as to give the reader a notion of the psychological premises from which I argue. This may seem to savour of conceit, but I take the risk. Briefly then, I was brought up, in India, in a society which set no stigma on the moderate consumption of alcohol. In my own family we drank moderately and occasionally, mainly on festive occasions. As I grew up, I learnt that alcohol had its abuses as well as its uses; in my unregenerate youth I occasionally drank more than was good for me, got drunk from time to time, and finally graduated through the school of commonsense and experience to a realisation that excessive drinking was a "mug's game". At present my attitude to alcohol is one of take it or leave it, that is to say, I often don't touch it for days on end, but on companionable and convivial occasions I drink enough to make me more cheery than is my wont. Should Prohibition become the law of the land, I would give up drink, with a sense of resentment at being deprived of what I regard as an inherent personal right.

The first ground on which I contest Prohibition, as applied to India or any other country, is that it constitutes an infringement of an inalienable civil liberty. Every member of every society, regardless of whether the orthodox majority regards drink as a form of moral turpitude, has the right to indulge in a personal practice which, in the vast majority of cases, does him no harm, does his family no harm and does society no harm.

The right to imbibe alcoholic beverages is something which depends upon no religious or political sanctions; it is an ethical and rational right granted to man by his Creator when the latter endowed him with intelligence enough to ferment the juice of the grape and restraint enough to drink as much of it as is good for him. To argue that, because some people drink to excess, therefore, all must be penalised, is logically unsound; as well say that, because some men are gluttons, therefore, no one should eat at all.

If we are to concede that majority opinion in a society is entitled to prevent individuals from touching what is anathema to the majority, then equally we cannot resist carrying the concession to lengths. Today, the orthodox Hindu and Muslim majority may enforce its will upon the unorthodox minority of depressed classes, Parsees, Christians, Europeans and the rest. Tomorrow, the orthodox Hindu majority may on equally strong grounds enact a law preventing anyone from eating meat. The day after, fanatical reformers may convince most people that tobacco is a vice which must be banned, or that pan-chewing is a crime against society. There is not the slightest moral difference between these forms of prohibition.

Again, if we say that because a section, perhaps an important section, of medical opinion considers alcohol bad for the health, therefore no one shall be allowed to touch it, we must equally grant that tobacco, or meat, or any other such substance is liable to be excluded from our routine. And here we must differentiate between the use of drugs like opium and cocaine, which are universally condemned as deleterious and degrading, and alcohol, which is actually approved by a large section of the medical profession and has no obvious adverse effect on the great majority of "addicts"—an opprobrious term which apparently includes everyone who drinks in moderation.

So much for the moral issue. On the practical side, it may be said at once that in no single country in the world which has tried it—and several have—has the complete Prohibition of alcohol proved a success. In each case, the State has been compelled to revise its attitude and substitute instead a system of controlled licences under which a modicum of liquor, of approved potency, is rendered available to people who decline to be deprived of it.

But, it is argued, India is different. In India public opinion is against drink; in India orthodox sentiment condemns drink; in India respectable society outlaws the drinker; in India the drink habit is not so deeply ingrained as elsewhere. All this may be granted. Yet the fact remains that among the masses, both in the countryside and in industrial areas, the habit of drinking in moderation is widespread. It is not spreading because of western influence; it has existed from time immemorial due to the ease with which intoxicants can be obtained over wide areas from the palm tree, the mohra flower and other sources. The peasant, who may be orthodox in other respects, imbibes quite generally if only because he regards toddy as a "pick-me-up" after a hard day's work. So it is; medical research has also shown that it is a valuable constituent in his dietary and its nutritive content helps to ward off beri-beri and other deficiency diseases.

So also, other hard-working and poorly-fed members of the lower strata of society drink regularly to keep up their strength; fishermen do, millhands do and manual labourers generally. That they sometimes drink to excess is undoubted; that a minority of them spend an undue proportion of their wages in drink is equally certain. But here again, we must not seek to cure a sore by cutting off the limb. Because some people spend too much money on clothes, or the cinema, we do not ban these entirely. To eliminate the evil of alcoholism (in its true meaning of excessive drinking) from the working classes, what is needed is education, education and again education. Only thus, and by temperance propaganda, can the worker be weaned from undue indulgence. But to impose an arbitrary ban on all liquor is merely to set a premium on evasion and bring the law into contempt.

For the present, I would drive home the moral of the above argument by saying that, taken by and large, drunkenness is very rare among any class of Indians. It is commonest among the small "europeanised" section of society which has imbibed western license along with western emancipation, but even here it is less common than is generally imagined. As for the working classes, a few may drink heavily on pay-day and the day following; the great majority are sober, decent citizens who spend a proportion of their wages on drink, partly because they need it and partly because it is one of their few comforts, and take the rest of their money home to their families. No social worker can honestly say that drink is a crying problem among the poor; far greater problems are insanitation, and malnutrition, and above all, ignorance. If we put first things first, we must tackle these problems before we seek to deprive the peasant and the worker of his alcoholic solace and sustenance.

It has been said that facilities for producing country liquor are present almost everywhere, in many areas almost embarrassingly so. Even under the present system of licensed liquor shops and strict excise supervision, illicit stills abound in jungle and field. It is impossible by an arbitrary ban to check the production and consumption of liquor throughout the countryside or even in urban areas. I have it on good authority that in alleged "dry" zones like Salem and Ahmedabad, more than a trickle of liquor enters and is consumed; if the Prohibition Department like to turn a blind eye and proclaim the success of Prohibition from the house-tops, that is nothing more nor less than self-deception.

But once Prohibition is accepted as the law of the land everywhere which is the ideal of Congress and other social reformers—the scope for lawlessness will be much enhanced. Organised bootlegging and rum-running on the large scale which the U. S. A. experienced during its "dry" decade will probably not come, if only because of the force of orthodox opinion. But petty smuggling and retail peddling of liquor by the "small man round the corner" will be omnipresent, and in the country districts at least, the law will be reduced to a farce. The mere process of locking up offenders will not help matters; the great majority of offenders will escape detection. Public drinking will perhaps be stopped; a premium will be set on clandestine drinking. And because human nature is the same the world over, and because forbidden fruit is always sweetest, drunkenness will become a much graver social evil than it is today. So will defiance of the law, and, so will crime generally, if the experience of other countries is anything to go by—and we have nothing else.

I do not need to stress the economic case against Prohibition. A policy which compels provincial governments to abandon between 25 and 30 per cent. of their revenues, in pursuit of an idealistic will-o-the-wisp, and in the hope that it will add to the "purchasing power" of the masses, while quite obviously it starves nation-building departments and handicaps the spread of education which alone can cure alcoholism, stands self-condemned.

For these reasons, I contend that Prohibition as a national policy is misconceived, impracticable, and foredoomed to failure. Both as a realist and as a liberal (with a small "l"), I am opposed to it. It is too late to persuade the Congress to abandon or modify its programme. It has become so obsessed with the Noble Experiment (which it does not regard as an experiment but as a "mission") that it accuses all anti-prohibitionists of being the victims of an obsession. Yet as one who is, consciously at least, obsessed by nothing so much as the need for gradualism, moderation, and above all, education, I raise my ineffectual voice to predict that Prohibition will prove the biggest mistake, the most "Himalayan blunder" ever made in India.

NEW HISTORY TEXT-BOOKS.

The following Press Note has been issued by the Information Bureau, Hyderabad-Deccan:

The Education Department of His Exalted Highness' Government have taken the initiative in revising and recasting history text-books with a view to eliminating any communal bias. This effort is among the several that are being made in the State for national regeneration and cultivation of a progressive outlook.

It might be recalled that the need for "Decommunalisation" in the treatment of books on Indian history was also stressed by the Rt. Hon'ble Sir Akbar Hydari in his Convocation address at the Dacca University last year. Certain Provincial Governments too have realised this need as is evidenced by the resolution passed recently in the United Provinces Legislative Council.

The Education Department engaged itself in this task two years ago by setting up a special Committee for the purpose. The Committee consists of certain teachers of history in the University as well as representatives of the Education Department. The triple principles guiding the work of the Committee have been:

1. The elimination of communal bias so as to conduce to the development of a spirit of toleration among students.

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

(2) Greater emphasis on the cultural and social aspects of historical events; and

(3) Simplification of language.

The Committee has further avoided descriptions of crime and intrigues and has instead incorporated events calculated to infuse in the minds of the pupils a sense of pride for a common national heritage. So far, five text-books have been completed by the Committee for the Classes III, IV, V, VI, VII, and VIII, and these are expected to be published shortly.

A few instances will serve to illustrate the principles observed in the preparation of the text-books. Legendary or semi-historical or controversial narratives such as of Allaudin Khilji and Padmani of Chitor, or the Black Hole of Calcutta have been discarded or treated briefly. The struggle between different sections in India for political domination has been presented in its true perspective and described not in terms of religion or race but in the light of the centripetal and centrifugal forces which have been at work at different times. Thus the struggle for supremacy between Akbar and the Rajputs or Aurangzeb and the Mahrattas has been treated in this light. On the cultural side, due prominence has been given to such movements as the Bhakti Movement which was inspired by seers like Kabir, Nanak, Namdeo and others and which was the healthy result of a fusion of Hindu and Muslim cultures. The Committee has fully availed itself of the results of the latest researches and investigations by reputed scholars.

THE PANDHARPUR ORPHANAGE AND FOUNDLING ASYLUM.

To most people Pandharpur is a place of pilgrimage where thousands of pilgrims flock every year in all sincerity of worship and earnestness of devotion. But few people are aware of the extent to which it is frequented by young, erring widows for an entirely different purpose. Inspite of law being in their favour, social usage has condemned these unfortunates to a life of perpetual widowhood. They are led into sin by designing immoral persons. When all attempts at abortion fail, they go to Pandharpur posing as pilgrims. Hundreds of infants are thus born at Pandharpur every year. The Pandharpur Orphanage and Foundling Asylum is for the last sixty four years doing the work of saving them from death by exposure or strangulation. This institution gives shelter to these unfortunate women, before and after confinement if it is found that they have no relations to go to, they are given shelter in the institution. A new building has just been erected at a cost of over a lakh of rupees and the institution is indebted to the extent of twenty thousand rupees on account of the new building. The current expenses are increasing month by month as new and necessary improvements are being introduced. This institution is being conducted by the Bombay Prarthana Samaj, presided over by Dr. Kashibai Nowrange and Mr. V. N. Chandavarkar is its Vice-President. The authorities appeal to all kind hearted people to respond heartily to this appeal on behalf of the helpless, the distressed and the fallen. Any donation, however small, may be sent either to the Hon. Secretary, Prarthana Samaj, Bombay, or direct to the Superintendent, Pandharpur Orphanage, Pandharpur.

WELL-BEING OF THE PEOPLE.

"In the last analysis, man will always be the subject of all our endeavours; whether the purpose be cultural or material, the action we undertake always has as its fundamental object the improvement of the condition of mankind and the protection, raising and enrichment of human existence."

This is the faith and creed of the little group of health and medical experts who are now preparing for the Conference on Rural Life which the League of Nations has called for next October.

Scientific experiment has approached every aspect of human living, and medical knowledge in particular has made great strides during the past decades; but, in every country, medical practitioners and social workers find serious gaps between scientific progress and practical achievement. We are still far from applying the knowledge we possess in ordering everyday living.

The first concern in any action for "the improvement of the condition of mankind" is health. And the League experts consider that the health and well-being of people living in rural districts is a question of special urgency. The country districts of any country still help to people the towns, since the birth-rate has remained relatively high in rural areas. But, all too often, these immigrants come from districts where living conditions are less healthful than in towns, and so bring poor physiques to the stress of city life. In spite of living in close contact with nature, where they should be able to enjoy smokeless air, sunshine and produce fresh from the soil, rural dwellers in many countries suffer a higher mortality rate than townspeople; they are subject to diseases such as tuberculosis and typhoid; and they have not learned to organise their planting and reaping, their building and digging, so as to ensure to their children an adequate nutrition and healthful surroundings. There is thus a common need in every country for an examination of the health problems of agricultural communities and a search for practical remedies. These remedies, if they are to be effective, must take account of the whole social economy of rural life—its economic resources and the way of life and social habits of country dwellers.

The League's experience has been that a study of health and welfare in rural communities grows ever wider in scope. Its first approach to the problem was made at the European Conference on Rural Hygiene, which met at Geneva in June and July 1931. That Conference was followed by the Inter-Governmental Conference of Far-Eastern Countries on Rural Hygiene, held at Bandoeng, Java, in August 1937. These two Conferences laid down the principles, methods and means of action of a policy for improving health in rural districts. The recommendations of the European Conference were unanimously accepted by the delegates of the twenty-three nations represented there, and at Bandoeng the thirteen Far-Eastern countries present adopted the scheme which the meeting proposed.

These recommendations have influenced the development of rural hygiene policies in European and Far-Eastern countries. Meanwhile, the Health Committee of the League has continued its study of various factors of rural well-being, and, as this study has gone on, it has become increasingly clear that considerations of public health and welfare call for a survey of the demographic, economic and social factors of rural living. The Assembly of the League recognised this fact when it decided to transform the second Conference on Rural Hygiene into a European Conference on Rural Life. This is the Conference which is to be held at Geneva in the autumn of this year. Its Preparatory Commission is directing preparation of documentary material to be issued as a basis of discussion. It will be drawn from the studies, not only of the Health Organisation, but also the Economic and Financial Organisation of the League, the International Labour Office, the International Institute of Intellectual Co-operation and the International Institute of Agriculture.

THE JEWISH QUESTION.

The following report published in the current number of World's Youth, comes from Central Europe. It is by a Scotsman who has given his life to missionary work among the Jews:

The Jewish problem is the problem of a coherent minority acting as an irritant in the body politic of almost every country in the World. If 10% of the population of the cities of London, Paris, Berlin, Budapest and New York were very compact groups of Japanese, there would arise at once in each city a feeling of hate against the Japanese, and this might receive the name of "Anti-japanism," in the same way as the word "Anti-semitism" has arisen. Note how Negroes are more and more tolerated in the United States the farther north one goes, in proportion as they become fewer in number.

Simple and uneducated people, moreover, everywhere fear what is strange and "different." Ghosts are feared because they are ununderstandable. In the first century the Christians were feared and hated because they worshipped in empty churches where no gods were visible. In the same way the Jew is hated by simple people because he is "different" and this natural distrust of the stranger has been exploited to the full by evil demagogues within recent years. The old myth that Jews kill and eat Christian babies is again believed in many parts of Europe, having been engineered by politicians, but the myth arises from the mystery of the Passover supper, which is "different" from Christian Church festivals, and is carried on in the privacy of the home.

Amongst educated people, however, it is not the "difference" of the Jew that arouses dislike, but his success. Having been trained by centuries of ghetto life to live by his wits, since most lines of livelihood were closed to him by law, and having been trained by centuries of persecution to hold his property in its most movable form—money—and not in real estate, he has naturally become the business man of Europe and America, fitting into positions since his emancipation from the ghetto which the Gentile either could not or would not hold. Under the old Hapsburg Empire, for example, Jews were invited in to run the commercial life of the Danube basin, since the gentry thought only of the army as a career and despised business, and the peasant had not enough education to rise to be the middle man. With the social upheaval consequent upon the Great War, other classes in the community found that they had arrived on the scene too late, and that they could not compete with the old established business of Jews. Most Jews are honest business men, with a greater "flair" for business than the Gentile, at least in Central Europe, where, for example, the Gentile is usually less reliable from a business point of view than the Jew. In his heart the Gentile business man knows his inferiority in this respect and is jealous of the Jew. It is not the poor Jew that is hated by this class of person, but the successful and honest Jew. Thus to the middle class Anti-semitism is as much a form of jealousy as the Class War is to the proletariat.

But amongst sensitive and religious people there is a third reason for Anti-semitism. The provocativeness of the average Jewish nature is something that arouses dislike and resentment the world over. The writer, for example, has found many of the emigrants he has helped most objectionable people, with no sense of gratitude, who claimed every little help received as a right. The refugee who has succeeded in reaching the new country often demands as his right every advantage of citizenship, and does not see that this should be looked upon only as a privilege. The Christian Church in forcing the Jew into his unnatural life in the ghetto in the Middle Ages, is partly responsible for this trait in his character; but this flashiness and pride, this "loving of the chief seats in the Synagogue," is definitely also the product of a religion which does not understand that unique Christian quality humility.

GENERAL FRANCO AT MADRID CEREMONY

The medieval religious ceremony of welcoming the Chief of State back to his Capital after a victorious war was celebrated at Madrid on Saturday, May 20, in the Church of Santa Barbara, Patroness of Artillerymen, writes Major J. S. Barnes in the Universe: The approaches to the church were lined with troops and only a select public were admitted by ticket.

On the high altar—a blaze of candles—was placed the historic Crucifix of Lepanto, which had been brought from Barcelona where it had lain hidden during the rule of the Reds.

This is the crucifix that adorned the chapel of the flagship of Don John of Austria when the power of the Infidel Turk was finally broken in that decisive naval battle.

No setting could have been more fitting. On the Gospel side was erected the triumphal arch known as the Arch of Oviedo. On either side of the steps of the high altar, six massive silver candelabra were placed bearing torches. Outside the sanctuary, cutting off the altar, there were hung the historical claims of Navarre. On the walls were hung old Flemish tapestries depicting the great events of Spanish history.

All members of the Government were present, as well as the military chiefs. The Caudillo, Generalissimo Franco, in full uniform, was received by Cardinal Goma, primate of Spain, and conducted to the steps of the sanctuary while a choir of Benedictine monks from behind the altar chanted the tradition antiphon.

After the "Te Deum" the Caudillo, deeply moved, unbuckled his sword and, advancing to the steps of the high altar, laid it reverently at the foot of the Crucifix of Lepanto.

There followed the singing of the special blessing; and, while the Caudillo knelt, the Cardinal gave his solemn blessing in the following words:

"May the Lord be always with you. May He, from Whom proceeds all right and power, and beneath Whose rule is everything, bless you and with providential admiration bestow on you His protection, as also on the people whom He has confided to your rule. May the blessing that I give you be in token of Him. In the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost."

When the Caudillo rose his eyes were filled with tears.

The organ pealed out a triumphant voluntary.

Later in the day the Generalissimo visited the Monastery of the Escurial, where he prayed before the tombs of the King.

S. Natarajan's

WEST OF SUEZ.

Prof. L. Rushbrook Williams writes in The Asiatic Review

"He adds to a lively, and occasionally malicious, pen a keen sense of humour and a certain confidence in his own judgment, which is the habitual prerogative of youth. The result is an engaging book, which tells us almost as much about Mr. Natarajan as about the places he visited and the persons he encountered."

"May well prove invaluable to other young Indians addicted with Western Wanderlust. For here they will read of the hotels he patronised, the tips he gave the porters he employed, where and what food he found, and the conclusions he sedately drew." The Times of India, Bombay.

"A pleasant souvenir of a six-months holiday which Mr. S. Natarajan spent in Europe last year. Mr. Natarajan left the shores of India on February 12, 1937 and when he set foot in Europe he found the whole Continent in a State of frenzy. The Civil war was in full swing in Spain, nervousness had gripped Naziland, Paris was getting the Exposition ready and England was all agog with excitement in view of the (then impending) Coronation of King George VI. Mr. Natarajan had plenty to see and hear during his sojourn. And he did well in taking his typewriter with him." The Hindu, Madras.

NOTES.

The British Submarine Disaster :—The sinking of the submarine "Thetis" at the final trials off Birkenhead, before delivery by her makers, with 99 persons who were in it, has aroused feelings of horror and sympathy throughout the world. If the submarine had been pursued and sunk by an enemy ship, after it had been launched, there would have been the anodyne of the excitement of battle and the pride of dying for one's country. Here, these men had no such satisfaction. The passengers of the "Titanic" knew that the ship had been broken by colliding with a mountain of ice and were able, in the short time left, to nerve themselves to meet their end. Here these poor men did not know what had happened to the ship. For four terrible days, while the supply of fresh air in the drowned ship held out, they were cherishing illusory hopes of rescue by the resources of skill and science of the greatest naval power in the world. During this time the public were told that there was every chance of every one in the ship being rescued. Then suddenly the tone changed. The ship could not be saved in time for the inmates to be taken out alive. There is to be an official enquiry and the full truth about this calamity will not be known until after it is finished. Utterly ignorant as we are of naval mysteries, we can not help a first feeling that the disaster was the result of culpable negligence not far removed from deliberate sabotage on the part of somebody in the know. Any other explanation seems inadequate to explain the sinking at the time and in the circumstances when it happened...The disaster will not be altogether in vain if it calls the world's attention once more to the crass inhumanity of the submarine and the urgency of banning its use in war. In peace, of course, there is no case for it. The submarine has no other destiny except blowing up ships or being sunk like the "Thetis."

Corruption in Congress :—It will be a mistake to attach too much importance to the cry of corruption in the Indian National Congress organisation which Gandhiji raises from to time. That he himself does not mean it literally, is evident from the fact that he continues to be the de facto leader of the Congress. The kind and degree of corruption in the Congress are not different from what it is in politlcal movements all over the world. A political movement is no more prejudiced by being known to be corrupt than is a kettle by being seen to be black. In the Congress itself corruption is not a matter of recent growth. The non-co-operation resolution was carried at the Congress session twenty years ago against the strong opposition of nearly every experienced Indian leader, by swamping the meeting with several hundred voters enrolled overnight from the highways and byways of Calcutta. It has since been from time to time reinforced by similar methods. There have always been bogus Congressmen, that is men who wore the phylacteries and shouted the slogans of the Party without any inward conviction. The number has no doubt swelled since the Congress accepted office. It is further accelerated by the evidences that there are, of tacit understandings between the Government of India and the so-called Right Wing. All is grist that comes to the mill, and however or for whatever reasons, a political party attracts numbers, they add to its voting power in the constituencies and its shouting power at mass meetings. Party leaders have not hesitated to claim the confidence of the constituencies because of the existence of corruption. The occasional denunciation of corruption in his party by its acknowledged leader, has an advantage. The outside world is impressed by the high moral standard set before the rank and file. A few purges now and then of some satelites for not speaking the truth, or for not acting in the spirit of non-violence, have also their propaganda value. The Bombay Health Minister, Dr. Gilder, being badgered about the hardships caused by Excisemen rummaging the luggage of respectable arrivals in the city, pleaded that high respectability was unfortunately found associated with smuggling liquor and cited the instance of a whisky bottle being found in the khadi bag of a passenger who, no doubt, was dressed from head to foot in the same material. We may add that the obligation to wear Khadi, is responsible for a good proportion of hypocritical behaviour in the Congress Party as at present constituted. Its abolition will appreciably diminish corruption in its ranks.

Gandhiji and Prohibition :—We looked forward to the result of the Parsi deputation to Gandhiji with some misgivings. Among the characteristics which he shares with the British is a passion for compromise. Starting with high sounding principles, the Britisher will compromise a great cause on some small side issue. William Pitt agreed to the impeachment of Warren Hastings, although he justified his Indian administration, on the ground that the fine imposed on an Indian ruler was a bit excessive. Similar incidents in British history can be found by the score, the most recent being Mr. Neville Chamberlain's dealings with Austria and Czechoslovakia. Gandhiji's political career too furnishes parallels. Our misgivings, however, have been belied in this instance. No official account of the interview with the Parsi deputation has yet been published but, from such reports as are available, we gather that Gandhiji not only did not yield a single inch but banged and bolted the door so to speak against anti-Prohibition efforts. But the most effective answer to the anti-Prohibitionists came from Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru. Gandhiji is always open to appeals on the economic ground and he seems to have felt that something should be done specially to relieve the persons who are now making a living by the liquor trade, and who may find their employment gone on the introduction of Prohibition. Pandit Jawaharlal had no such qualms. "They are better unemployed than employed in a nefarious trade," was his cut and dry reply to the question about finding employment for those thrown out of the liquor trade. That is a conclusive answer and the question must now be considered closed. Of course, the measures devised to relieve unemployment generally, will be available to the Prohibition unemployed also. Incidentally, Gandhiji is said to have been enlightened by the Licensed Victuallers who also waited on him in deputation, as to the actual contents of what he has been advocating under the name of 'nira'. It contain 5 to 6 per cent of alcohol, which is rather more than that in beer. We trust that there will be no more attempt to popularise the use of 'nira' on the part of Gandhiji and the Bombay Government who were reported to contemplate selling it in sealed bottles.

The Archbishop's Speech :—In his Rotary speech against Prohibition, the Archbishop of Bombay explained at the outset that neither he nor "those whom" he represented were committed to one side or the other in the matter of Prohibition. The words could only mean that the Archbishop and the Roman Catholic community —the only people he represented since he disclaimed that he was speaking against Prohibition and therefore could not be speaking for the anti-Prohibitionists—were indifferent to Prohibition. When later he descended on the anti-Prohibition side of the fence, he omitted in the heat of his argument to mention whether he had brought his community, "those whom he represented," down with him. As a result of this omission, Mr. B. F. Bharucha has claimed in an article that the Christian community as represented by the Archbishop was opposed to Prohibition. In a letter to children in the Catholic Examiner, the Archbishop removes this misimpression. In view of the importance of the subject, we quote below his solemn injunction to the children: "I would ask the elder ones among you to read the Address over carefully with your parents or teachers and to note my words that every Catholic is free to support or condemn Prohibition." What a pity that his Grace did not make it equally clear in his Rotary address that he spoke for no one but himself! It is no use telling the children this, so long as the parents and teachers are still labouring in the belief that the Archbishop has spoken the last word on the subject, not because of the wisdom of his words but because of their issue from the mouth of the Archbishop. And anyone who has the least acquaintance with Indian Catholics, must be aware of this. The Archbishop will require more than a letter to children to undo the mischief of his Rotary address.

Liquor Interests :—The public generally expects a more serious and dignified handling of a subject from a religious head than the Archbishop was able to give to Prohibition. His reference to "Chief Constable Dr. Gilder" was, in particular, in shocking taste, very like the cartoons in anti-Prohibition newspapers and, it is not impossible, perhaps inspired by one of them. We would not have referred to what the Archbishop evidently regarded as just another after-lunch performance to amuse the listeners, but for the solemnity with which he himself introduced the subject and the enthusiasm with which vested interests have taken up his speech. The Archbishop accuses Dr. Gilder of not presenting a coherent case for Prohibition. But His Grace himself was not very clear in his advocacy. He began with a request that the subject should be considered without regard to vested interests, political or commercial, and then argued that there was a moral case for the compensation of liquor interests. Moreover, this is as much in the event of the nations agreeing to disarm, munitions dealers should ask for compensation for the loss involved in the scrapping of their merchandise. It is possible that the Archbishop regards that also as moral sound, but he will find little support even among Europeans for it. Indian opinion on the liquor question is just as strong; otherwise we would not be having legislation for Prohibition.

Text-Books and Teachers:—Public interest has been aroused on the subject of text-books prescribed in Bombay schools by a resolution moved by Mrs. Lilavati Munshi in the Bombay Legislative Assembly and later withdrawn by her on an assurance from the Prime Minister that a Text-books Committee would be appointed to go into the question. The case put forward by Mrs. Munshi was the importance of standardisation of text-books to bring about uniformity in the subjects taught to school children. Mrs. Munshi in her introductory speech gave a picture of what happened in the Bombay Municipality:

> When somebody represented to the Schools Committee to prescribe a text-book of which that person was the author or the publisher, and the name came before the committee, the majority of the members of the committee had no knowledge of the book which formed the subject matter of discussion. If the book happened to be backed up by an influential member of the committee and if he or the author or the publisher had canvassed well, it had a good chance of being prescribed, although very few of us had even seen that book. We have different languages in the Province and we do not know all the languages. So, it is not possible for members to read all the books in different languages. What happened was that these books came before the committee and they were prescribed, not because they were the best books but because they had the support of some members of the committee or the publishers or the author of the books had canvassed well for support.

Other bodies are similarly influenced in choosing text-books and as a result a variety of text-books are used in different schools for the same subject. The hardship to students who are forced to change their schools, and to their parents in having to change the text-books, was vividly depicted by the speaker. The great defect, it seems to us, in the prevailing system is that the selection of text-books is left to people who know nothing of their job. After all is said, it is obvious that in any sound educational system the text-book plays a minor part and it is only lay people who attach an almost superstitious importance to the printed word, who can be persuaded to change books frequently. In her eloquent plea for the greater use of visual education, Mrs. Munshi rightly stressed this fact. There are not lacking in the teaching profession, men and women who combine devotion to their daily work with a large vision of educational needs. They could render invaluable service on any text-books Committee and they should naturally form the majority of its members. If that is not done, we fail to see how any resolution to restrict the number of text-books on any subject can satisfy Mrs. Munshi's demand for good text-books as well as few text-books.

China's Industrial Co-operatives:—We publish this week an informative article on a recent industrial development in China by Mr. Rewi Alley, a New Zealander who was formerly Director of the Industrial Department of the Shanghai Municipal Council and is now Technical Advisor to the Industrial Co-operatives, the organisation which he describes in detail. We are indebted to Dr. Walter Brooks Foley of Manila who is well known to our readers, for the article. Dr. Foley who has organized an association in Manila to help the cooperatives financially, writes, "The last information we have received is that 800 of these small mobile cooperatives have been established in China since last August, and 1,000 will probably be in operation by June 1. The Co-operative Movement in England has recently become greatly interested and are contributing £ 100,000 towards this." A Manchester Guardian correspondent describes the movement as "guerilla industries" and points out that the co-operative experiment will be on a scale hardly ever seen before. The first task of the co-operatives will be on a barter basis with farmers. The possibilities of the movement are great and it might well lead to a new industrial order. For once the co-operative movement reaches the remote districts of China, there will be little scope for the old capitalistic system. The Chinese cooperatives have the whole-hearted support of their Government.

The Dnyanodaya:—In response to our invitation to cite a parallel to the Inquisition in India, the Rev. J. F. Edwards writes in the Dnyanodaya:

> In the Nizam's Dominions, for instance, to quote the latest case to hand, where the British Methodist Church alone has increased by eighty thousand in the past twenty years, an average yearly increase of four thousand, there is bitter persecution even of those who declare they 'want to be Christians,' and the persecution is being borne so courageously as to be one secret of the increase. The amazing story of the persecution of two such unbaptised enquirers we had just received when we read the Reformer's statement.

The Inquisition burnt people at the stake, Bishops and other high Church and State dignitaries being present at the function in their official habiliments, for the crime of not believing in the dogmas of Christianity as they were held by the Catholic Church. This Mr. Edwards wants to hush up in order to promote goodwill among Indian communities. We object to history being faked for any purpose whatsoever. Mr. Edwards' reply is that, if you will not agree to cover up Christian atrocities, I will expose Indian atrocities. As the latest specimen he refers, without mentioning details, to information he has just received of two men in the Nizam's Dominions being subjected to amazing persecution. Have these two men been burnt at the stake by the Government of the Nizam and in the presence of high officials of the State? Otherwise and if this amazing persecution is, as we suspect it is, the acts of a mob resentful of the contemplated apostacy of two of their fellow rustics, there is no comparison between it and the Inquisition. We ask Mr. Edwards to publish his information exactly as he has received it. If there have been any breaches of the law, the Government of Hyderabad may be trusted to take suitable action to punish the offenders. We assume, though Mr. Edwards is vague on the point, that he does not charge the Nizam's Government with persecuting the two unbaptised individuals.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER
BOMBAY, June 10, 1939.

"THE PEACE FRONT."

In the excitement caused by the sinking of the "Thetis" and the visit to Canada of the King and Queen, the small progress of the negotiations between London and Moscow, without whose co-operation the Peace Front against the Dictator Powers will be futile, has passed without comment. As a matter of fact, they are as good as broken off. If there was still a spark of life in them, the intervention of the Pope with an invitation to the two surviving European Democracies and the two principal Dictatorships to come to an understanding together to preserve Peace, has snuffed it out. The Pope is said to fear that the formation of a Peace Front with Soviet Russia as the central figure would lead to the Bolshevisation of Europe. In the remarkable essay on "The Roman Catholic Church and Democracy" which we reproduced last week from the Social Question Bulletin, it was pointed out that the Vatican being itself totalitarian in outlook has no prejudice against totalitarianism in principle. It is not particularly well-disposed towards Democracy—Gibbon's remark that the banner of the Church was never raised in the cause of the people is as true today as when the "Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire" was published—but she can get on with it when it suits her. Her normal tendency, her natural tendency, is to oppose all liberal movements. The hope expressed by the writer of the Bulletin that, under Pope Pious XII, the leadership of the Church may give more vigorous opposition to anti-democratic forces in the future than in the past, can not be said to be in a fair way to be realised if the Pope's motive in calling a conference of Dictators and Democrats is to thwart the formation of the Peace Front with Moscow as its predominant partner. Mr. Neville Chamberlain's fear of associating with Moscow, has been forced to relax by the force of public opinion in Britain. How deep-rooted this is, is proved by the alacrity with which he has undertaken to guarantee the independence of Poland which is as anti-semitic and anti-Democratic as Nazi Germany, and the cold and cruel callousness of his refusal to stand by democratic Czechoslovakia. Herr Hitler with shrewd insight had accused Dr. Benes of Pro-Bolshevik leanings while Poland's antipathy to Russia was notorious. This was no doubt one of the causes which weighed with Mr. Chamberlain in cold-shouldering the only democratic country in Eastern Europe in her hour of supreme trial, though, as a matter of fact, Dr. Benes, for fear of offending the British Government, threw away the one chance which remained to him of repelling the German invasion of his country. G. E. R. Gedye who, expelled from Vienna by the Nazi Government, went to Prague as correspondent of the London Express, in his brilliant account of the fall of Austria and Czechoslovakia, entitled "Fallen Bastions" gives the following as he heard it from a friend of Dr. Benes:

> On the Sunday immediately before Britain and France forced Benes to agree to the surrender of the Sudeten districts, after Berchtesgaden, Benes sent for the Russian Minister to Czechoslovakia, Alexandrovsky, to see him in the Hrudschin. To Alexandrovsky Benes formally put the following two questions: The first question postulated Russia abiding by her treaties with Czechoslovakia and France. The Minister's answer was in the emphatic affirmative. Then Benes said: "If France dishonours her signature and refuses to help, what would be Russia's advice to this country as to the right course to pursue?" Alexandrovsky's reply was that the League of Nations should declare Germany an aggressor and Russia will come to Chechoslovakia's aid under the League Covenant even if Britain and France did not. After this, continues Gedye, there was a long silence between the two, broken at last by Alexandrovsky saying: "M. le President, is there not another question you wish to ask me regarding Russia's action should appeal to the League be made impossible by some trickery or other?" Benes looked at him for a long time very steadily, but did not open his mouth. Alexandrovsky rose, shook his head sadly, bowed and left. Thus did the man, whom the Goebbels propaganda machine had denounced daily as a Red, refrain from calling in the direct aid of Russia which he knew was available for him and which might have saved his country's independence.

The passage, even as summarised, is long but it reveals a hitherto undisclosed chapter of contemporary history and, what is more, it indicates what most probably will be the end of the present much-advertised coalition against the Dictators. France was obliged to enter into an alliance with Russia (now torn up) at a time when Britain had forsaken her. France has regained British friendship and has come under British dominance. The Peace Front will not materialise because without Russia, as Lloyd George and Winston Churchill have clearly shown, it will be a farce, and Russia will not come in merely to oblige the two western democracies unless they undertake reciprocal responsibilities towards her, which they will not except under extreme danger, and, if they did, will take the first opportunity to release themselves from on some pretext or other. For a long time Oriental chicanery was a by-word with Europeans. Has there ever been such chicanery as that displayed during the last eighteen months by the civilised Democratic countries of the West?

Since the above was written, the British Premier made a statement in the House of Commons regarding the negotiations with Moscow. He professed the usual optimism about their outcome but it is plain that his heart is not in the business and that he would any day prefer another Pact of appeasement with Germany to any sort of alliance with Russia. On the other hand, Moscow on her part is suspicious of the motives of the Western democracies and, in the words of M. Molotov, is not anxious to pull their chestnuts out of the fire without an adequate recompense. The situation has an amusing aspect. The three countries on her north-wes-

Baltic borders which Russia wanted to be protected, have vehemently protesting that they will not have any protection from the Soviet-Democratic concern. The difficulty, Reuter naively reports, will be "evaded" if the Soviet Government should declare that they consider the territorial integrity and political independence of the Baltic States to be a vital interest, and the objections of the States themselves "circumvented" so as not to have a guarantee thrust upon them. A Pact which is based on evasion and circumvention, will not be proof against itself being evaded and circumvented. Anyhow the Moscow negotiations will be protracted until their Majesties are safely back in London. The reports from New York describe the great enthusiasm of the reception and also the great precautions that are being taken for the safety of the Royal visitors. The President's wife, in her syndicated article published in Friday's Times of India, mentions that many people would protest violently against the orders reported to have been given in New York city that all people in the sidewalks where the procession passes on its way to the World Fair, must stand motionless and that all windows must be closed.

INDIANS IN CEYLON.

For the past few months considerable tension exists between Indians in Ceylon and the Sinhalese. Faced by unemployment, the Sinhalese Government has resorted to the extreme step of deciding on the expulsion of Indians from the jobs at present held by them. Against this threat Indian leaders have invoked the intervention of the Government of India and of the British Government; they have asked for communal representation in place of the present general constituencies and they have even suggested the replacement of the Cabinet system by Government by Committee. These are retrograde measures. Ceylon has been fortunate in her reforms which ignored the differences between majority and minority communities. Eight years are too short a period for declaring the experiment a failure. Indians should be extremely careful in their agitation abroad not to set themselves up as opponents of national progress. In Ceylon this is particularly important. Mr. R. Rustomjee in his presidential address at an All Ceylon public meeting of Indians held in April, remarked that conditions in India favoured the Cabinet system while in Ceylon a Committee form of Government was necessary. Mr. K. Chandy's article on the minority problem which we publish this week, ought to disillusion him on that point. Here too representatives and leaders of communal minorities are opposing representative democracy based on a national citizenship, even though the communal electorates dilute Indian nationalism. If for any reason Ceylon is forced, against the wishes of her people, to substitute Government by communities for national government, India will very soon be moving along the same path. Ceylon Indians have every right to urge their case as effectively as they can in demanding rights from the Government of Ceylon. The matter, however, assumes much more serious proportions when they turn to outside forces like the Government of India and the British Government. There is an element of truth in the Sinhalese protest that Indians claim privileges in a dual capacity, as a minority community and as a body of aliens living in Ceylon. Mr. Rustomjee truly said in his address that Indians in Ceylon could not be treated as mere aliens. He was, however, on less sure ground when he went on to observe :

> Indian workers have spent the best part of their lives in Ceylon and many are domiciled in Ceylon. They are British subjects and expect the same treatment that is given out to the permanent population.

Obviously their rights are as subjects of Ceylon, and not as British subjects.

At the same time, the denial of political rights to Indians does not help to instil a feeling of citizenship in Indians in Ceylon; and the methods proposed by the Ceylon Government to meet the unemployment problem are far from equitable. The Indian community in Ceylon has a proud record of service in the past. It is poor reward for years of ungrudging labour to be now turned out to make room for Sinhalese unemployed. Many of these Indians, as Mr. Rustomjee points out, have married Sinhalese women. In the article which we publish this week by "An Indian in Ceylon," a case is made out for the enforcement of economic sanctions against Ceylon, by the Government and people of India. This is a dangerous weapon which we would not recommend against any country except as a last desperate measure; and against Ceylon not at all. Our correspondent remarks on the proximity of Ceylon from a geographical point of view. Mr. Rustomjee has mentioned in his address the historical and cultural ties that bind the two countries together. Even in politics, he says, our problems are common. The only possible attitude to adopt is that Ceylon and India are one. If we are to work to that end, India cannot, whatever the provocation, take up a threatening attitude. If responsible leaders of both countries could discuss the immediate issues that have now arisen, we do not see why the present crisis in Indo-Sinhalese relations cannot be surmounted. There is no reason for the Government of India to give up its traditional policy of sympathetic adjustment.

ANOTHER CONVERSION AND MARRIAGE.

We dealt in a leading article in last week's Reformer with the case of a Hindu school girl of Karachi who was converted to Mahommedanism and married to a Muslim youth in the course of a few hours.

About the same time as this drama was being enacted in Karachi, a similar one was

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

shaping itself in Bombay, the parts being reversed. In this case, a Muslim girl of a respectable family was abducted by an upcountry Hindu and taken to Benares where after being converted to the Arya Samaj, she was married to him under the Arya Marriage Act passed two years ago. The legal position is clearly set forth in the order, reproduced elsewhere from the Pioneer, of the Magistrate of Lucknow where the couple had gone from Benares after the conversion and marriage, and where they had been arrested at the instance of a friend of the girl's father who recognised her.

We have repeatedly called attention, both while it was being debated in the Legislature and after it was passed, to the disruptive anomalies of the Arya Marriage Validation Act. The Bill as orginally drafted had a definition of what constituted an Arya Samajist but this was omitted by the Select Committee and the question was left to be determined as a question of fact in each case. In this case the girl had secured certificates both of conversion and marriage and the Court did not feel called upon to go behind them.

The Karachi and Bombay cases taken together suggest some reflections. First and foremost they expose the unreality of the common assumption that abductors are always Muslim men and the abducted are always Hindu women. Abduction of Hindu girls are publicized in the Press as Hindu feeling has developed a high sensitiveness over matters of conversion and marriage. If equal publicity were accorded to cases of abduction of Muslim women by non-Muslims, it will most probably be found that there is no basis for giving these incidents a communal flavour. Another question suggested by the case is whether a Judge or a Magistrate who has to deal with such cases, should act as if his function did not extend beyond ascertaining whether the letter of the law was satisfied. The Judicial Commissioner of Sind, while strongly denouncing the circumstances of the conversion and marriage, felt obliged nevertheless to find that both were legally valid; and it was by a loophole presciently introduced in the Act that the girl was saved from the consequences of her infatuation. In the Bombay case likewise, the Lucknow Magistrate was put off by the production of some certificates from applying his mind to plain considerations which are involved in the case regarded from the point of view of social stability.

Almost every feature of the affair raises doubts about the bona fides of the man in the Bombay case. The sudden migration to Benares where the conversion and marriage were performed, is itself a suspicious circumstance. There is an Arya Samaj in Bombay and he could well have had the ceremonies performed here if he was assured that the girl was sincerely convinced of the truths of the Arya Samaj and that her consent to marry him was the result of her cool judgment and not the result of a momentary infatuation created, serhaps, by the neighbourhood of a cinema house. Any honourable man would have got into touch with the girl's parents and given them the opportunity of ascertaining the real mind of their daughter. From the man's own point of view this would have been wise. Incidentally, the case shows that the mere raising of the age in the Abduction section of the Penal Code, as suggested by the Sind Judicial Commissioner, will not meet all the needs of the situation. The Bombay girl was just over eighteen years of age but most Indian girls of fifteen would have shown more circumspection than she did.

While the Karachi Judicial Commissioner and the Lucknow Magistrate were within their judicial rights, we think that cases of this kind require to be handled with more freedom if the well-being of society is to be furthered by the administration of justice. The Judicial Commissioner was able to find a way which indirectly led to the correction of a wrong which he felt himself powerless directly to rectify. The Lucknow Magistrate had no such escape. Without in the least questioning the correctness of his procedure, we may ask if it would have been an undue extension of his judicial capacity if he had questioned the parties about the suddenness and furtiveness of their actions and instructed the Police to keep a watch on the movements of the couple. In view of the recurrence of cases of this kind, it would, we think, be desirable to institute special Courts empowered to investigate the circumstances before adjudicating the validity of conversion marriages.

Anti-Prohibitionists:—The Western India Council of the Liberal Federation have, it is reported, collected 40,000 signatures to a memorial protesting against the Prohibition policy of the Bombay Government. The protest actually is directed more against the pace of Prohibition than against Prohibition itself, since the signatories are believed to have expressly confined their objection to the suddenness of the measures. The value of such a protest loses rather than gains by its association with the Liberals, many of whom tried unsuccessfully to introduce Prohibition by easy stages when they were administering the province. Having failed in their efforts, they might well have left the Congress Ministries to total Prohibition without holding up a discredited alternative as the ideal method..... The anti-Prohibition dinner which was held on Thursday to celebrate the King's birthday as well as to register the organisers' opposition to Prohibition, was a costly futility. The money which was lavished on this function, might more usefully have been applied to relieving the Prohibition unemployed for whom the organizers of the dinner so often express the utmost sympathy.

CHINESE INDUSTRIAL COOPERATIVES.

(By Rewi Alley.)

The destruction of 90 per cent of her pre-war machine industry which was situated in the maritime and river ports was not a death-blow to China because her economy is still largely agricultural and decentralised. But it was, nevertheless, an extremely serious setback—and if China is to carry on the struggle, she needs to replace immediately the productive power which has been lost. To win the victory which she believes will be hers, and to preserve herself from a semi-colonial status, she must not only re-establish but expand her industrial power now, under wartime conditions.

This situation forms the background for a new effort to bring together the great human and material resources of Free China. Salvaged machinery is set up in small industrial units. Refugee workers wandering over the face of the country are brought together and given a job to do. Determined young organizers and engineers, starting from scratch—are working with splendid initiative, earnestness, and faith in the future to create a new type of industry suited to China's wartime needs—an industry that is decentralised and thus relatively invulnerable to bombing and consists of small workshops that can readily be moved if threatened by an enemy advance. Giving concrete form to the new patriotism and new democracy now taking shape in China, these units are organized co-operatives. Their workers labour doubly well because they know that it is not for another's enrichment that they are working, but for themselves and for the country.

Beginning the ninth month of their existence, the Chinese Industrial Co-operatives have now five headquarters and 22 depots throughout Free China. Each depot serves as an organizing centre for a network of small industries, and several hundred units are now producing the goods needed in the localities they serve. Schools to train co-operative organizers and workers have been opened. Machinery and refugees are being distributed according to plan. Hundreds of new units are to begin production in the near future, and the final goal is 30,000 industrial co-operatives throughout the country.

A recent tour by the writer through the area under the jurisdiction of the Northwest Headquarters of the Chinese Industrial Co-operatives strengthened his conviction that a chain of small industries run by and for the people, exploiting local resources, serving local needs, and linking up the villages and small towns of China, is the only sure foundation for the country's wartime economic development. Apart from its other aspects, it can solve the great problem of the refugees. The rapid spread of the idea, and the new enthusiasm of the workers in the units already existing are the best proof that industrial co-operatives are the real answer to the question of how, by collective effort, China's millions of producers can fight simultaneously for their own and their nation's existence. One of the widespread slogans of this war in China has been: "Those who have money must give their money. Those who have strength must give their strength." The industrial co-operatives provide the best medium for giving effect to this slogan.

The opening of new avenues of transportation in the Northwest has caused little villages, hitherto almost unknown, to assume a new importance. In one such place, situated near rich mineral deposits, the refugees and local workers who have collected there, have set about building a real co-operative town. The industrial co-operatives here include a foundry, a machine-shop, a flour-mill, a paper mill, and a pottery works. There are co-operative mining ventures in the vicinity and new ones are being planned. Refugee workers from other parts of the country have brought new ideas into this region, in which there was previously no industry at all. A valley stream has been diverted to flow through the co-operative paper factory, supplying it with water and carrying away waste. The channel of a river has been altered to turn a water-wheel which supplies power to run a furnace blower. It is safe to say that this backward hinterland of China will never be the same again.

In this town, the co-operatives shape the civic life. A training school for co-operative workers and organizers has been established near-by. Several enterprises have banded together to set up a co-operative hospital. A co-operative restaurant and lodging house are being planned. When the writer arrived, members of the local co-operatives met to welcome him in the loft of the co-operative machine shop. Songs were sung and jokes told, as they are when men meet the world over. The workers spoke of the co-operatives as their own "show" and indicated in every way that they were proud to belong to them and confident of the future. A foundry apprentice who had never been to school, declared that it would now be good for him to learn to read and write and the same atmosphere of ambition to achieve a new and richer life was apparent every where. In chorus the men sang the song of industry, "We Work Together to Build Our Defence"—vigorously and well.

In another co-operative centre, the industrial units are clustered along the lowest hillsides in cave villages. The same atmosphere of happiness at having found this new way of work prevails. A number of refugee mill girls from Hankow said they were glad to be there, and did not want to return to any other kind of industrial enterprise. In their co-operatives, they felt that they were in an environment that they could master, an environment much less relentless than the old sweat-shop cotton mills which had now fallen into the hands of the enemy.

In this district, the various units have formed a Co-operative Federation which assists the weaker co-operatives and helps its member-enterprises to find markets. A co-operative store does a thriving trade, and when the writer passed through it was thronged with soldiers who patronise it for the various supplies needed by their detachments. One group of soldiers was carrying bales of canvass to an army truck. Another was loading cotton gauze for field hospitals. Winter gloves and candy seemed especially popular with individual soldiers.

Co-operative enterprise is constantly spreading to new branches of productive activity and it seems that there is no industrial work that cannot be carried on along these lines. Transport is an important and integral part of industry. In the Northwest C. I. C. transport co-operatives are being organized one after another. One large unit consists of 150 mule carts, running on old truck wheels with rubber tyres. This co-operative transports cotton. Camel and donkey trains carry soda and salt. There are plenty of animals in the Northwest, and plenty of refugees to look after them. For the refugees themselves, handcarts are being turned out by a co-operative machine shop which also makes weaving looms which the women-folk of the transport workers can band together to operate.

New and better methods of work are constantly being introduced in the co-operatives. Old implements have been adapted to produce increased output. Metal castings have taken the place of wooden cogwheels on handpowered machines. Other improvements of primitive tools have been carried out, many of them suggested by the workers themselves. Word of a better method of doing a thing apreads like wildfire. The war and this new industrial revolution seem to have completely changed the character of the slow-thinking Northwesterners who have proved themselves both willing and able to drop time-honored methods of work as soon as something better presents itself. Technical instructors of Nanking University, now operating in Chengtu in the far West, are fathering the co-operatives in this region and have devised an excellent wool-spinning machine which turns out just double the amount of yarn produced by the type previously used. This spinner will be welcomed in many a Northwestern woollen-workers co-operatives, and its adoption at this time can be considered a national victory for China.

Woollen manufacture is destined to play a much larger part in the economy of China's Northwest than it has hitherto done. The raw materials are there and the need is great. Chinese soldiers freeze to death because the only blankets they have are cotton ones from India. The population is inadequately clothed to face the winter cold. At the same time, great stores of wool formerly exported, are now available for domestic production. The Chinese Industrial Co-operatives are laying the groundwork for a new industry while filling orders for a million blankets for the army. Spinning presents a much more serious problem than blanket-weaving. But now, with the Nanking University's machine and the other improvements in local methods on which co-operative engineers are working, this problem too is approaching solution.

In one sleepy old city which was once famous there are paper workers in plenty. Here ancient methods still prevail. But with demand constantly increasing, the co-operatives have appeared on the scene and co-operative engineers are finding work. The printing co-operatives, too, are becoming a popular institution. In the Northwest, one puts out a daily newspaper, another a bi-weekly magazine. The local demand is great and the co-operative printers are kept busy.

Gold washing is another field in which co-operatives are active along the rivers of South Shensi. Most of the men engaged in it are refugees. The Northwest Headquarters sends out prospecting parties consisting of an engineer and twelve men to spot likely localities.

THE MINORITY QUESTION.

(By K. Chandy, Kottayyam.)

For more than ten years past, the problem of majorities and minorities in India has been discussed by me, but as there seems to be a lack of clear understanding yet, I crave your indulgence for inflicting on the readers of the Indian Social Reformer a further contribution summarising the relevant arguments. Romain Roland said at the beginning of one of his articles that he was writing for easing his conscience and did not expect to convince. A very humble admirer of his has taken courage from that confession.

Lord Zetland said a few days ago that unless Hindus and Muslims co-operated as equal partners engaged in a common task, the future of India would be black indeed. Sir Mirza Ismail, speaking at Salem, referred to the nervousness felt by Muslims in India and to the example of modern Turkey where Mahomedans and Christians worked together as members of the same nation, the crescent and the cross intermingling in joint national processions.

In India, the case is very different. Wherever there exist these two large communities, there seems to be mutual suspicion, and conflicts usually arise during processions. It should be remembered that in the old autocratic days such conflicts were very rare. The reason was that the autocrat, whether a Prince or a Collector, was free from communal prejudices, and had also immense prestige and power for putting down lawlessness. It is obvious that this worsening has a direct relationship to the grant of the vote. Minorities, whether Moslem or Hindu, feel that the majority community is less tolerant and less likely to be just than an autocrat or bureaucrat and the latter is feared less also.

The voting system was introduced into India with the best of intentions. The MacDonald Award and the Harijan fast were also well-intentioned. The fallacy underlying the adoption of the English system is that whereas in England a person votes for a party candidate and hence for responsible Party Government, in India the voting is mostly for a member of the voter's community and hence ultimately for a communal government. Even where there is a Party, the emphasis, in most men's minds, is on the community. Congress majorities, although they actually include Moslems, are regarded as communal majorities; and hence the failure of the Congress to form a government in those provinces where Hindus do not form the majority. The Frontier Province is an exception which will cease to be one whenever Abdul Gaffar Khan goes out. It is an exception which does not disprove the rule. A communal majority does not possess the rights of a parliamentary majority because it is based on birth and not on political policies which men of different sects could adopt, but a wrong system has impregnated Indians, even politically minded Indians, with the idea that it has such rights and hence all the present unrest and confusion. Speech after speech could be cited for proving the point. There is scarcely any emphasising the difference. An example will be given from Travancore, where it is Hindu and Christian, not Hindu and Moslem, but the idea is just the same.

The Elavas are a Hindu community midway between caste Hindus and depressed classes Hindus. There has recently occurred a change in the method of voting; the details need not be discussed. Any speech in a Malayalam paper discussing this change illustrates the confusion. Advocates of the new system have repeatedly said that under the old method the Elavas were the 'slaves' of the Christians, and opponents, including the Caste organization of Elavas, viz, the S. N. D. P. Yogam, assert that they have now become the 'slaves' of the Nairs. No Elava, Nair or Christian orator has expressed the view that an Elava voter has a political opinion and ought to cast his vote for the candidate whether Christian, Nair or Elava, who holds that opinion. The object of the change, it has been repeatedly asserted in speech after speech and also in editorials, is the consolidation of the Hindus. The consolidation of Hindus socially is quite legitimate, and this has been confused with consolidation politically, which is equally illegitimate in genuine democracy. The British form, which is the model, is possible only when there are two great parties both consisting of Hindus, Christians and Moslems, and hence there is no meaning in the assertion which is repeatedly being made in speeches and writings that because Hindus form the majority, therefore the Hindus have the right to rule, duly safeguarding the rights of Christians and Moslems. Although not so openly stated elsewhere the idea is generally prevalent all over India, and hence the counter-claim made by some Moslem Ministers that India should form a confederation of Moslem states where Mahomedans are the majority, and Hindu states where Hindus predominate. The parliamentary majority which is a matter of Parties and policies, has been submerged in the communal majority.

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

It ought to be stated that this confusion does not occur in the Travancore Government communique. There it is stated that whereas Latin Christians and Mahomedans are both backward and small in numbers, a successful candidate in a general constituency with seats reserved for these communities should get 60 per cent of the votes of his own community. This privilege is denied to Elavas not on the ground that they are Hindus, but on the ground that they are a numerous community. It was, however, forgotten that they are very backward, although not as depressed as the Harijans in British India; that they are weak in voting strength, and that they have interests separate from those of caste Hindus. As a result, their communal organization, S. N. D. P. Yogam, whose nominees were all elected previously, has not put up candidates for the bye-elections.

The confusion is most apparent in speeches and editorials which point to the election of Christians at the previous election with the help of Hindu (Elava) votes in constituencies with a predominance of Hindu voters as a great enormity and due to communalism and fraction, whereas the election of Hindus (Elava or Nair) at the bye-elections in such constituencies on account of the change in the voting system is applauded as a triumph of nationalism and democracy.

Such outspoken confusion between a parliamentary and a communal majority when regarded in terms of genuine democracy is not apparent in British India, but there is the underlying idea in many papers that because Hindus form the vast majority, therefore, Hindu culture and nationality could be equated with Indian culture and Indian nationality. This is what is causing nervousness even in a sober statesman of the calibre of the Dewan of Mysore.

Realising the communal prejudices of Indians, I had shown in article after article that the British method is unsuited for India, and that the ascent from autocratic government ought to be on the lines of the national government in England and Panchayets in India. It will take a whole pamphlet and not a single article to repeat all that was said. A story against me, which taught me the value of the Panchayat idea will, however, bear repetition. When I was a raw Assistant Commissioner, at the suggestion of the experienced Tahsildar, I appointed a Panchayet in a village for settling a long standing dispute. Riding back to camp, I asked a Panchayetdar who was accompanying me, what should be done in case the Panchayet passed an unjust decision. The old ryot said, "But, Sir, it is a Panchayet that you have appointed." The meaning was that a Panchayet should be expected to come to a just and a final decision from which there would be no need or occasion for an appeal.

After ten years and looking at recent incidents it is still my conviction that the Hindu-Moslem problem in India as also the Nair-Christian question in Travancore, are capable of being settled satisfactorily if the communal majority notion is supplemented by the Panchayet idea. Simultaneously active steps should be taken to secularise politics and create in the minds of the people, especially of the younger generation, fellow feeling and active sympathy with those of other faiths.

PROBLEMS OF CEYLON INDIANS.

(By an Indian in Ceylon.)

Ceylon has fast developed into an acute Greater India problem for the Government of India and the Indian people, as will be evident from the major crisis now enveloping the Indian community in Ceylon. The adoption by the Government of India, all along, of a policy of non-interference in the affairs of this small island, dependent on India for her political and economic existence, provides the obvious explanation. Perhaps, this is due to the fact that India with her infinitely superior power as a major state, was eager to be fair to a small Island in her continuous endeavours to keep her head above water.

The Board of Ministers and the Sinhalese bloc in the State Council in their restrictions of the political and economic rights of Indian nationals in the Island for the past eight years of autonomy, have brought about a state of affairs in which such non-interference cannot be kept up. Indians in Ceylon have no remedy available since the Governor, Sir Andrew Caldecott, has sanctioned the Amended Village Communities Ordinance, which has reduced over 600,000 Indian Estate labourers to rightless men and women slaving for the planter and towards keeping Government revenues in sound position. He has, in the second instance, now blessed the scheme for the compulsory dismisal and repatriation of 8,000 daily-paid Indian employees in Government service which when computed at 4 dependants per employee (according to the official estimate) would involve a total exodus of 32,000, with, however, a large number of additions to be weeded out from quasi-Government services, such as Municipality, and Urban Councils, making the aggregate, anything over 500,000 Indians, at an ultimate cost of Rs. 2,500,000 to the Ceylon tax-payer. This coup of the Sinhalese bloc is a studied counterblast to the impartial findings of the Jackson Commission Report.

The strangling process begun thus without any regard to the economic and political consequences and without any justification, does not come on the Indian community in Ceylon with any surprise; because they are fully aware of the instincts of the Ceylonese politicians sedulously supported by the reactionary press, endorsed in a luke-warm manner by the European planter, and acclaimed as a logical necessity by the Sinhalese bourgeois as the only solution for all the ills of unemployment in this country.

The State Council, at the instance of the Board of Ministers, has now thrown the gauntlet by the adoption of an initial vote of Rs. 500,000 for the repatriation scheme by a majority of 24, which clearly indicates a deliberate determination to put through this policy.

There is an unbridled outflow from India into this Island of huge credits without sufficient import cover, in the shape of consumption goods such as rice, textiles, dry fish, chillies, and onions, wheat, etc., to the tune of Rs. 54,000,000 as against Rs. 9,000,000 of exports from Ceylon. This policy, it will be noted, has been going on for the past fifty years as part and parcel of the immigration of estate labour on a large scale with its necessary accompaniments of trade expansion. The adverse trade balances against Ceylon on this account have now crystallised itself into non-self liquidating assets standing to the credit of Indian nationals. India has thus been throwing her credits into Ceylon with no hope of recovery; and this is the reason why immigration into the Island on such a large scale has been going on as a necessity to secure cover for such credits. At the same time, this has become a political problem since 1931 as has been demonstrated by the various legislative activities directed against the Indian mercantile and working class interests in Ceylon.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The Government of India can on no consideration shirk their responsibility for this sinister development of a political plague-spot before their very eyes, in as much as they have allowed this large scale immigration as well as the flow of extensive credits every year in the shape of consumption goods into this Island unchecked and without cover.

A member in the Ceylon State Council in the course of the debate on the vote for Rs. 5,00,000 for repatriation scheme, has provided India with the cue to deal with the drastic action of the State Council in its present temper. He wants to cure drastic ills with drastic remedies. The State as a model employer can ill-afford to adopt a policy of wholesale dismissal of thousands of its employees without laying itself open to the charge of abusing its statutory powers towards effecting the maximum distress to these employees. In consequence, India has little justification to regret the adoption of equally drastic steps which would check Sinhalese politicians.

India should forthwith repatriate her estate labourers who form the mainstay of the Government revenue. India should adopt immediately economic sanctions in respect of consumption goods leaving her ports for Ceylon as her trade with Ceylon is only a trifle less than 1½ per cent of her total foreign trade. Again India should peremptorily demand financial and economic safeguards through the Colonial Office for over sixty crores of rupees standing to the credit of Indian nationals in the Island. India further should dispense with the services of the considerable number of statutory civilians hailing as nationals from Ceylon now in the Indian Civil Service thus implementing the Reciprocity Act. Unless India decides to meet this emergency, the intransigence of Ceylon would be still more disastrous.

Apart from the immediate adoption of these measures, India can ill-afford to allow a rebel camp to flourish in Ceylon in close proximity to her southern frontier, but 21 miles across the Palk's Strait. India, as the legitimate guardian of peace in the Indian Ocean, is obliged to police the area in consonance with her indisputable claim for such precautions in respect of her national defence. Moreover, India spends considerable amounts every year on military expenditure which Ceylon makes use of in times of emergency as in 1915, over and above securing defence for Ceylon, without the latter incurring any expenditure on this account. In commerce, agriculture, industry and finance again, India gives her maximum accommodation regardless of consequences and risks. India should understand by now that Ceylon's visible export balance in her favour is accounted for by the huge drain annually of tea and rubber exports as a set-off against dividends and depreciation funds of the Sterling and Rupee companies operating in the Island, as well as cover against imports from European countries. India is relegated to a secondary place in respect of repayments in goods against exports from India into the Island though she has been a helpful hand-maid to the tea industry and the European investor.

A considerable portion of the trade credits in the Island during the last 10 years have now become frozen assets undergoing automatic depletion through legislation directed against Indian trade interests. The diverse control schemes now set in motion by the Ministry of Commerce in Ceylon in Rice, Sugar and Wheat would certainly drive away the Indian operators out of the field since their legal provisions are essentially forfeitory in character. The Shop Act and the promised threat to Ceylonise seventy-five per cent of even private establishments is the last straw. At this rate there is absolutely no common ground to have any trade talks between India and Ceylon. Ceylon has decided to take the law into her own hands.

Nor is there any necessity to go into the merits of the question of the future representation of Indians in Ceylon legislature under the circumstances.

On all fronts the Indian community in Ceylon is now confronted with ruin and distress. There is but one solution to all these accumulated sins of omission and commission. India has to decide now to take the reins into her own hands and direct the course of events to avert certain disaster to her nationals and to this unfortunate Island.

MYSORE DEWAN ON STATES' PROBLEM.

There is one subject of the most profound interest to all of us, to which I cannot altogether omit reference. It is the subject of re-adjustment—re-adjustment in the internal organisation and the external relations of the Indian States. As I have already said, here in Mysore, a Committee is at work on these subjects. We are awaiting its report. But meanwhile it seems necessary to indicate the attitude of Mysore to the recent statesmanlike exhortation of His Excellency the Viceroy to the Rulers of the Indian States. The answer of Mysore to that appeal was—you will endorse this—a complete and full agreement. And from what I know of other States their answer is the same. For an Indian Prince there can be no higher object in life than this—to live for and to strive for the welfare and contentment of his subjects. There belongs to him, by age-long tradition, the natural leadership of his people in all that pertains to their prosperity and honour. In their approbation lies his highest reward. But how is he to secure this approbation? Apart from the necessary personal exertion and interest, two things must be provided—appropriate constitutional machinery to ascertain public opinion, and administrative agencies to give effect to the decisions arrived at in the light of that opinion.

To the importance of all this, the Rulers of our States are fully alive; and if action on their part has not been as rapid as some might wish, the reason is to be sought in the difficulties which beset the task.

The conditions of the modern world suggest the Roman maxim—"Hasten slowly." All around us we see forms of government and of society on trial. None has definitely passed the test. How then can we proclaim aloud or even feel in our heart, "This system is better than any other?" Even if a system of government or society appears to pass the abstract test, how can we be sure it will survive the acid test of crude realities?

I refer to these difficulties not to justify stagnation or re-action. To-day if we wish to survive we must take courage in both hands and move forward. Otherwise we perish. To leave the accustomed track involves risks, to keep to it involves greater risks. To reconcile the forces of progress and order—that is the task of wisdom.

In view of the difficulties of the problem one is gratified to note the tone of moderation and practicalness in some of the recent statements of Mahatma Gandhi on the subject of reforms in the States. It would be ridiculous to start with the presumption that the Ruling Princes of India are the enemies of their subjects. To have faith is fairer than to distrust and is more conducive to progress. The way of salvation in our political and social ills seems to me to lie in a patient and tentative advance made in the spirit of compromise and goodwill. Compromise and moderation — the policy of the middle path will consolidate our strength and lead us on from strength to strength.

I make this plea not only with reference to the question of reforms within the States, but also with reference to the issue of Federation. Even there, where is need, and the most clamant need, for the exercise of the spirit of compromise, not from this, that or the other side only, but from each and every side.

Speaking of Federation, I should like once again to make it clear that it is not correct to look upon our own particular questions—the subsidy and the retrocession of the C. & M. Station—as questions arising out of that issue. These two questions were there calling for solution long before Federation appeared on the horizon; and they would remain to be solved even if the Federation scheme be put aside. What Mysore has been asking for is that these old accounts be settled before the proposed new account is opened with Federation. Both are questions connected not with the State's relations with British India as such, but with its dealings with the Imperial Power; and that Power need not complicate our relations with a Federated India by handing over to the Federal authority something to which it can lay no claim. It is no satisfaction to us to know that our claims have been admitted in principle. We look for a final settlement at the earliest date possible, whether there is Federation or not.

BANNING OF OM MANDLI.

Mr. R. V. Thadhani writes to the Editor, Sind Observer:—

Sir,—I think in applying the provisions of section 16 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act to the Om Mandli and Om Nivas the Government of Sind have misused their powers.

In my opinion, section 16 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act has no application in the case.

Section 16 reads as follows :

"If the Governor-General in Council is of opinion that any association interferes or has for its object interference with the administration of law or with the maintenance of law and order or that it constitutes a danger to the public peace, the Governor-General in Council may by notification in the Official Gazette declare such association to be unlawful."

The Government of Sind in applying the provisions of this section have made use of the latter part, namely, that the Om Mandli constitutes a danger to the public peace.

For the meaning of the phrase "danger to the public peace" one has to look to the preceding parts of the section, namely, that the association interferes or has for its object interference with the administration of law and order. This phrase cannot be read independently to mean "Danger of any kind whatsoever to the public peace."

Taking the worst view of the case, all that can be said against the Om Mandli is that it is an institution where domestic marital ties are set at naught and girls of tender age and immature judgment are taught to look upon Bhai Lekhraj as the Reincarnation of Sri Krishna and that there is no sin in his indulging in spiritual kisses and embraces, etc.

I do not wish it to be conveyed that I accept this as at all proved. What I wish to convey is that even assuming that all this is true, this institution cannot be worse than so many houses of ill-fame spread throughout the country and the provisions of the Criminal Law Amendment Act cannot be availed of to suppress them—much less can they be invoked to suppress the activities of the Om Mandli and Om Nivas.

I expect the readers of your journal will agree with me that the Criminal Law Amendment Act was never intended to suppress evils of this kind, namely, the existence of houses of ill-fame and the Om Mandli, if at all a den of darkness, cannot be worse than these.

In making use of the provisions of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, the Government of Sind have created a precedent which is bound to react on them at one time or the other.

It cannot be gainsaid that, in having recourse to the provisions of this Act, the Government have yielded to pressure from the Hindu members of the Assembly and the actual regisnation of the two Hindu Ministers.

It was indeed at the point of the bayonet that the Government appointed a Tribunal and they don't quite seem to be sure about its legal status, as they often call it an Advisory Committee, and that its creation was under compulsion is clear from the speech of the Law Member who then admitted on the floor of the House that in taking action against the Om Mandli, they were stretching the law to satisfy the Hindu members of the Assembly.

My only regret is that His Excellency the Governor of Sind should have been a party to the publication of this notification.

ANOTHER CONVERSION—MARRIAGE CASE.

The Court room of Rai Bahadur Jyoti Prasad, City Magistrate, was packed to capacity when judgment was delivered in the case in which one Tribhuvan Nath Tandon was charged with kidnapping Razia Begam of Bombay from the residence of her father, Mirza Ali Beg, a head clerk in the G. I. P. Railway.

Ordering that the girl be set at liberty and that she might go with any person she liked, the City Magistrate remarked, "Mst. Razia Begam, according to her own statement, embraced the Aryan religion in Benares and thereafter she was married, in accordance with the Aryan religion, in an Arya Samaj temple. The girl got herself examined by Lt.-Col. Vaidia, I. M. S., Civil Surgeon, Benares, before her marriage and he certified that the age of the girl could be about 18 years as stated by her

"The girl has stated before me that she is now running her 19th year. She was examined by the Civil Surgeon of Lucknow, who is also of the opinion that she is about 18 years of age.

"I have seen the girl myself and I am satisfied that she is a major and that her statement that she wants to live with Tandon is voluntary. I do not think that under these circumstances I would be justified in detaining the girl in police custody.

"I, therefore, direct that the girl be set at liberty and she may go with any person she likes. I am assured that sufficient precautions will be taken for her safety.

"It was argued before me that the girl should be detained till the arrival of her father. This request was made to me in Court on Saturday and I was given to understand that the father was coming by the evening train. This request was made on behalf of one Sri Niwas Shashtri who alleges that he has been sent by the father of Razia Begum. He has, however, failed to show me any evidence to the effect that the father of the girl has sent any intimation to the effect that he is coming to Lucknow to take his girl. I, therefore, direct that the girl should be set at liberty."

It will be recalled that Tribhuvan Nath Tandon and Razia Begum (Shanti, as she was afterwards named) were arrested by the Hazratganj police on Thursday night at a house on La Touche Road.

Mr. S. S. Choudhary, Mr. Jagdish Narain Seth, Mr. B. L. Kaul, Mr. Raghunandan Prasad Mathur and others appeared for Tribhuvan Nath. Mr. Ahmad Shafi for Srinivas Shastri.

RELEASED.

Shanti Devi Tandon (or Mst. Razia Begam as she, was formerly called) was set free from the Lucknow Central Jail, on Saturday night following orders issued by Rai Bahadur Jyoti Prasad, City Magistrate Lucknow. The girl was taken in a car under police protection to the City Arya Samaj Bhavan where Tribhuvan Nath Tandon met her.

Tribuvan Nath and Shanti Devi left the Samaj Bhavan the following morning for an unknown destination. It is, however, understood that they have gone to some State in Rajputana, where Mr. Tandon has received some job.

"THE 'REFORMER' AND RELIGIOUS PERSECUTION." *

We admire the weekly Reformer as one of our most powerful moral sledge-hammers in India. Imagine our surprise, therefore, when in its issue of May 27 it could content itself with describing as a mere 'reference' to the Inquisition four or five detailed columns on the subject in the Marathi Kesari of May 9. This unusual mildness concerning such sordid details has made us wonder whether those four or five Marathi columns had been read, or whether it was that their sordidness was being minimized. In either case the imaginary inferences drawn about ourselves fall to the ground. We made no 'insinuation,' no 'inuendo' about 'matching the Inquisition,' but a plain statement of fact that the present century's Indian Christians can give many 'stories of religious persecution.' Our phrase 'similar stories' meant similarly shocking stories, not similar Inquisitional methods. In the Nizam's Dominions, for instance, to quote the latest case to hand, where the British Methodist Church alone has increased by eighty thousand in the past twenty years, an average yearly increase of four thousand, there is bitter persecution even of those who declare they 'want to be Christians,' and the persecution is being borne so courageously as to be one secret of tho increase. The amazing story of the persecution of two such unbaptised enquirers we had just received when we read the Reformer's statement, 'If there are cases of persecution, organized religious persecution (our italics),. . . it is his' (i. e. our) 'obvious duty to come out with them.' The best way we can 'come out with them' is to advise our respected contemporary to arrange for a visit to the Indian Christian leaders or missionaries in the area mentioned. We are quite sure one result would be the Reformer's profound admiration of those of its countrymen who are suffering daily for their principles without any publicity being given them. Moreover, none would disapprove such publicity more than would the Reformer, and rightly so, as the Reformer has had its full share of obloquy during its nearly half century of noble service. May that service long continue.

THE LEAGUE TO-DAY.

In the present extreme tension of international politics, it is difficult to define the exact position of the League of Nations. Shorn for the moment of its capacity for taking an active part in the political discussions of the day, the League has nevertheless its own anxieties and doubts. Still there is a clear quickening of the faith which looks to the principles of the Covenant as valid guides to international conduct. The membership of the League has been again reduced in consequence of recent events. It is, however, noticeable that, as the world faces the accumulation of crises which seem to threaten yet another catastrophe, the language of the covenant, the doctrines of the League and the vocabulary of its creed are being consistently, if not consciously, invoked. This does not mean that politically there has been a direct "return to Geneva." In all probability, the present malaise must, for some time, invite firmer emphasis on the League's humanitarian and technical labours rather than on its capacity for solving political enigmas.

In this situation, especially when every country, great or small, has to put itself on guard against all imaginable dangers, the League's future cannot but be a subject of attention and even concern. Nevertheless, if the history of the last decade means anything, it certainly shows that, to quote the recent words of Earl Baldwin: "Unless mankind is for ever to be subject to the law of the jungle, we shall have to come back to the Covenant, or something like it again and again."

FLAGS ON SCHOOLS.

A circular issued by the Bombay Government says:—

"It has come to the notice of Government that a School Board has, by a majority, recently passed a resolution to hoist the National (Congress) Flag on its Primary School buildings and on its office building when there was substantial opposition to the proposal. Government desires to impress on all local bodies the fact that the National (Congress) Flag is essentially an emblem of non-violence and communal unity and has been deliberately designed to be accepted as such. It follows, therefore, that unless it is resolved unanimously by all the members of a public body to do so, the National (Congress) Flag should not be flown on any public buildings belonging to that body."

NEWSPAPERS AND ADVERTISEMENTS.

The Editor,
The Indian Social Reformer.
Dear Sir,

May I congratulate you on the courageous article in your issue of May 27th by Mr. J. M. Ganguli of Calcutta.

I refer especially to the latter part of the article wherein Mr. Ganguli blames newspapers for the advertisements they dispaly concerning every conceivable sexual disease, abnormality and desire. Occasionally an Indian friend lends me copies of a journal and I have been amazed at the disgusting nature of some of the advertisements which are blatantly displayed on nearly every page. This morning I began to cut out these adverts to send to you, but the collection was so vile that I care not send them. Can nothing be done about this sort of thing? Is this the only way a newspaper can pay its way?

Those of us who love this country and have the welfare of its people at heart, feel very strongly about these things. There is enough vice and bestiality in the heart of man without encouraging more, and it would be a great thing if Congress were to establish a strict censorship over all advertisements.

Yours etc.,
J. LAWSON GARFORTH.

WEST OF SUEZ.

Prof. L. Rushbrook Williams writes in The Asiatic Review

"He adds to a lively, and occasionally malicious, pen a keen sense of humour and a certain confidence in his own judgment, which is the habitual prerogative of youth. The result is an engaging book, which tells us almost as much about Mr. Natarajan as about the places he visited and the persons he encountered."

"May well prove invaluable to other young Indians addicted with Western Wanderlust. For here they will read of the hotels he patronised, the tips he gave the porters he employed, where and what food he found, and the conclusions he sedately drew." The Times of India, Bombay.

"A pleasant souvenir of a six-months holiday which Mr. S. Natarajan spent in Europe last year. Mr. Natarajan left the shores of India on February 12, 1937 and when he set foot in Europe he found the whole Continent in a State of frenzy. The Civil war was in full swing in Spain, nervousness had gripped Naziland, Paris was getting the Exposition ready and England was all agog with excitement in view of the (then impending) Coronation of King George VI. Mr. Natarajan had plenty to see and hear during his sojourn. And he did well in taking his typewriter with him." The Hindu, Madras.

THE TRADITIONAL HOME OF THE SANDALWOOD TREE.

It is in perfumery that the greater proportion of Sandalwood Oil is employed at the present day and to discriminating buyers, such as perfumers and soap manufacturers must of necessity be, it is hardly necessary to extol the virtues of the East Indian Oil which is without equal, both as a fine perfume base and a fixative for the increasingly popular bouquets of the Oriental type. In addition it is now being used extensively, and with marked success, in the creation of some of the more delicate perfumes in which the Sandalwood odour is not required as a predominant character.

A few trials will convince the perfumer who has not taken full advantage of the odour-value of this oil, that is of the greatest use to him, not only for predominant Sandalwood odour where required, but also a modifier and a fixative for other odours. This is true for liquid perfumes, soaps, creams, powders and all other cosmetic preparations. It will be found invaluable to those up-to-date perfumers who pride themselves on their own "creations."

NOTES.

Sir R. Venkataratnam Naidu:—We received on Friday the 26th May, too late for notice in last week's Reformer, a telegram intimating that Sir Venkataratnam Naidu has passed away. Another link with the past snapped. Venkataratnam Naidu was distinguished as an educationist and a social and religious reformer. A man of strong, rather stern, principles, he was never a popular figure. His father was an army officer and a sort of military discipline was a part of Venkataratnam's mental heritage. He was one of the oldest Brahmo Samajists in Madras. His religion shaped itself as a rigid and rather forbidding puritanism to many outside the circle of his devoted friends and admirers. He was one of the most formidable protagonists of the Social Purity movement inaugurated by social reformers in Madras forty-five years ago. Total abstinence from intoxicating drinks, purity of private life, the abolition of the devadasi system, were its main objects. In pursuance of the second object, Venkataratnam led a crusade against public men who were known for laxity of private morals. He reminded Miss Muller when, at the open Congress session, she moved that the late Mr. Eardly Norton should not be heard when he rose to move a resolution, because he happened at the time to be a defendant in a divorce case. Alfred Webb who presided, disallowed Miss Muller's motion but the event created a great stir. At the Subjects Committee of the National Social Conference the next day, Ranade, after a heated debate lasting over a couple of hours, himself drafted a resolution insisting that no one whose private life was not pure should be accepted as a leader in any sphere of the national movement. In social reform, Venkataratnam was most keen on the abolition of caste. He was one of the pioneers of the movement for the abolition of untouchability. In later life he came in contact with the Maharaja of Pithapuram who regarded him as his friend and preceptor. Venkataratnam was Vice-Chancellor of the Madras University for a term. We do not think he took much interest in the Andhra separatist movement. As a Brahmo his outlook was universal and he had no inclination to parochial politics. When he ceased to take active part in public movements, he spent much of his time in meditating on things of the spirit, and not long ago we had the privilege of noticing a volume of his sermons and addresses, chiefly to students. His religious thought, as that of many other Brahmos, was profoundly influenced by the writings of the great British Unitarian philosopher and divine, James Martineau whose "Endeavours after the Christian Life" was almost a scripture to several generations of devout Brahmos. Viresalingam Pantulu, the first and foremost of Andhra leaders of social and religious reform, was also a member of the Brahmo Samaj but his religious thought was patterned on the Advaita of Hinduism and also, paradoxical as it may seem, on the pure rationalism of the English philosophers of the nineteenth century. Andhra nowadays has turned to politics to the exclusion of religion and social reform. She has no leaders today of the stature of these two moral giants, none to take their place as representatives of the deeper spiritual instincts and aspirations of her gifted people.

The Pandit's Dilemma:—Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru has been moved to write out his reflections on the situation in the Congress created by the Tripuri developments. He has, as he has himself stated in his autobiography, often suppressed his own convictions in deference to Gandhiji. He had persuaded himself that by doing so he would be best serving the cause or causes which he had at heart. But Tripuri has aroused in him serious doubts as to the rightness of his conduct in doing so. Undoubtedly by his acquiescent attitude he led other less glamorous politicians similarly to swallow their convictions and follow Gandhiji blindly. In our opinion, as suggested last week, Gandhiji is less to blame than acquiescent friends like the Pandit, for the uncomfortable pedestal on which he finds himself perched beyond reach of human counsel.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Gandiji has frankly proclaimed that he has broken his compass and cannot find his bearings in the troubled sea of Indian politics. His friends, Rajagopala Charya, Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel and, now, Latthe (of all men) have come forward to proclaim their unswerving "faith" in Gandhiji. Pandit Nehru, on the other hand, finds himself in a terrible dilemma. As President of the States People's Conference, the Pandit had thought of taking the lead in the Rajkot trouble. But Gandhiji stepped into the scene and, for fear of coming into conflict with him, the Pandit silently abdicated his office. He could not, he says function where he did not understand. "I do not understand the logic at all of what has taken place." The fault is the Pandit's. He was like the proverbial blind man seeking in a dark room for the black cat which was not there. The events in Rajkot were not conceived or carried out in any logical sequence. Gandhiji has many qualities in common with the British which makes him so effective in dealing with Simla and Whitehall. Prominent among these is a contempt for theory and logic. The Pandit writes:

> But more and more the choice before many of us becomes difficult, and this is no question of Right or Left or even of political decisions. The choice is of unthinking acceptance of decisions which sometimes contradict each other and have no logical sequence; or opposition or inaction. Not one of these three courses is easily commendable. To accept unthinkingly what one cannot appreciate or willingly agree to, produces ultimately mental flabbiness and paralysis. No great movement can be carried on this basis, certainly not a democratic movement. Opposition is difficult when it weakens us and helps the adversary. Inaction produces frustration and all manner of complexes, and is hardly conceivable when from every side comes the call for action.

These are not the only alternatives and what makes the Pandit think they are, is that his vision has been blurred by the darkness in which he has so long confined himself in the honest but mistaken belief that he is thereby advancing the cause of Indian freedom. He has now awakened to the fact which was plain as can be for several years past, that "the acceptance unthinkingly of what one cannot appreciate or willingly agree to, produces ultimately mental flabbiness and paralysis." Did not Sarojini Naidu say at some election meeting in the United Provinces that if Congress nominates a stick as a candidate all should vote for it? The fourth alternative which has escaped the Pandit's observation, always remains. Every man can work for the cause he has at heart according to his own ideas. The great movements which have shaken the world in the past originated in one or a few minds. A crowd is an encumbrance not a help to constructive thinking. Reading the Pandit's articles brings to mind Hamlet's pathetic lines:

> The time is out of joint: O cursed spite,
> That ever I was born to set it right.

Lord Zetland's Apology:—Lord Zetland's defence of British Imperialism at the Empire Day Dinner in London was in the nature of an apology. He said in effect that if there was any better Imperialism going round anywhere he would like to be told of it. The noble Marquess missed the point of the Indian nationalist charge. It is that Britain pursues in this country a policy and methods which it dare not pursue in her own territories or in the Dominions. He declared that the goal of India was Dominion status. As we have repeatedly pointed out, having regard to the racial, linguistic, religious and cultural differences between India and Britain, Dominion status has no sense as applied to India. Even the present Dominions, notwithstanding their cultural and dermal affinity to Britain, are kicking against Dominion status and demand to be called Kingdoms. We had great hopes of Lord Zetland when he came to the India Office. He has dipped into the spiritual springs of Indian life and would, we thought, infuse into British policy greater insight than the general run of holders of his office. Experience has confirmed the wisdom of the British tradition against entrusting a man who knows too much of any subject with its administration. When his lordship who had denounced the Communal Award as harsh and unfair to Bengali Hindus, set himself to enforce that very Award as a part of his official duty, the rift between conscience and official exigency began. Such rifts can not be confined to one particular subject. So long as Mr. Butler was Parliamentary Under-Secretary at the India Office, Lord Zetland's knowledge of India was not allowed to be used to the prejudice of India. Since his departure, if rumours are not altogether unfounded, the attitude of the India Office to India has deteriorated. Lord Zetland does not seem to remember that Dominion status today is not different from Independence and, if Great Britain is prepared to grant the one, it may as well agree to accept the other. If it is intended that India should have a different and inferior kind of Dominion status than Eire or South Africa, the Secretary of State may be assured that no one in this country is prepared to accept it. The only position which India can accept is that of absolutely equal partner with Great Britain in the Commonwealth which must be known as the Indo-British Commonwealth in order to mark our distinct status.

Sir Hari Singh Gour on Hinduism:—The London correspondent of the Sind Observer gives the substance of an address on Hinduism delivered by Sir Hari Singh Gour at the Indian Students' Union in London. Sir Hari Singh has left India for good and settled down in England. The starting point of his jeremiad was that the Hindus in 1871 were seven times as many as the other religionists while at present they were only as three to one of the latter. This is a misleading statement. Statistical comparisons are valid only when the aggregates of the things compared are approximately equal. Fifty blind in a population of 1,000 would be in the ratio of one twenty while in a population of 10,000 it will be one in two hundred. The numerical strength of the Hindus has increased during the last sixty years at a smaller rate than that of Christians and Muslims, as it might have been expected to, having regard to its enormously preponderant mass. The rate of increase of a population, we may observe in passing, is no sure index of the superiority of one religion over others as Sir Hari Singh assumed. All the testimony available shows that Hinduism far from being a declining and doomed religion has developed considerable strength and vitality under the impact of the modern spirit. Our enquiries during the last several years have consistently confirmed that Hindu shrines, temples and places of pilgrimage attract ever-increasing numbers in all parts of the country. A considerable proportion of the books published bear directly and indirectly on Hindu religious thought. Hindu thinkers are not content to write and speak to their own co-religionists. Hindu thought is permeating Western culture. As regards the intrinsic worth of Hindu civilisation, thoughtful men will admit that a system which has no recognised place for the trades of butcher and liquor-seller in its economic life, is superior to one of which the two are integral factors. The Indian Students' Union has appropriately invited Sir Sarvapalli Radhakrishnan to be its next lecturer. No one is better qualified to expose the crudities of Sir Hari Singh Gour.

Business and Politics :—In an editorial devoted to Dr. Schacht's business interest in India and to the German press anxiety to bring about a trade agreement with India, the Times of India advises Indian business men to follow the example of the U. S. A. where President Roosevelt offered economic assistance to Germany if she abandoned aggressive preparations. Unfortunately deeds speak louder than words and the many warnings from Americans published by the Times itself, accusing Germany of breaking faith and supplying inferior goods, are sufficient evidence that business with Germany if it fails, will do so not because of Mr. Roosevelt's dislike of dictatorships nor even on account of a desire not to assist a war-minded nation with funds, but because trade has grown uncertain and undependable. The national boycott, which is no more than the introduction of sentiment into business, is peculiar to Asia, and even here it is not the strong point of the business community. We remember a few years ago when the boycott of foreign goods was vigorous in India, the Times of India was loud in its protests against mixing up "politics with business," and business "with sentiment." Now apparently it is a good thing. Does the Times of India seriously believe that British business men will refuse a good deal with Germany because they dislike the colour of her shirts? Indians must feel proud of the higher standards expected of them by the Times of India.

Marriage Reform Legislation :—The first number of the Magazine of the Poona Law College reviews the proposals of social legislation formulated last year in a lengthy editorial. It notes the awakening of the legislative conscience in regard to the question of marriage not only in the Central but also in the Provincial Legislatures, not only among Hindus but also among Muslims. Analysing the proposals, the journal finds that one group frankly addresses itself to the dissolution of marriages; while the other group is primarily concerned with the enforcement of monogamy by preventing polygamy, and only incidentally, as a means of enforcing monogamy, does this group let in divorce. Monogamy does not necessarily require to be supported by a divorce law, the most conspicuous example being the Canon Law of the Roman Catholics. Indian reformers, however, have gradually come to think that the present state of the Hindu law which, while allowing a husband to marry a second wife, is without any provision for the wife to release herself from a husband who has married a second wife or in other ways makes life intolerable to her, is anomalous and should be changed by giving relief to the unhappy wife. A perfect marriage in which "joy is duty, and love is law," is a true sacrament. The average marriage falls far short of it. But so long as the parties agree to differ so to speak, and to lead a peaceful existence so as not to disturb their friends and neighbours, there is no need for them to have recourse to the divorce court. But there may arise and do arise cases in which both or either of the parties, unable to live without constant bickerings, lead a cat and dog life causing demoralisation to children and the household generally. The journal suggests that in the proposals for enforcing monogamy, an exemption should be made where the first wives themselves urge their husbands to take second wives! We put this proposal before a Hindu matron and she promptly replied that all cases in which the first wife's approval is claimed are faked. Another friend pointed out that there is the possibility of the second wife also not giving birth to a son. A third friend mentioned a case within his knowledge in which the first wife bore a son soon after the second marriage. Then the second wife also bore a son and both women continued to make additions to the family to the embarrassment of the poor husband. Monogamy should be absolute. No exemptions should be allowed.... The journal points out that Mr. Jayakar's Act of 1929, intended to improve the position of female relatives in the order of succession, actually places a sister in a lower position than that she has been accorded by the Bombay Courts. The Editor adds: "Although the Bombay High Court has held that the Act does not affect the sister's position in Bombay, there is no provision in the Act itself to save her existing rank in the order of succession in the Bombay Presidency." Another difficulty connected with this Act is whether the term "sister" includes a "half sister." The Chief Court of Oudh has held that it does not: the High Court of Nagpur, on the hand, has held that it does.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER
BOMBAY, June 3, 1939.

ARCHBISHOP ROBERTS ON PROHIBITION.

The Roman Catholic Archbishop of Bombay, Dr. Roberts, delivered an address on Prohibition at the luncheon meeting of the local Rotary Club on Tuesday. His Grace began by averring that he was not committed to one side or the other on the subject. But the whole speech was a criticism and an adverse criticism of the policy of the Bombay Government. We regret to have to add that it was also ignorant criticism. His Grace is a comparative newcomer in this country. So far as one can judge from his utterances and activities so far, he has not any very deep knowledge of Indian history or culture outside the narrow limits of the Church of which he is an exalted prelate. (Even if he had such knowledge it will be against the inveterate tradition of the Roman Church to allow that there is any light or truth outside it.) The Archbishop, to do him justice, condemned drunkenness in no uncertain terms. "Drunkenness," he declared, "paralyses reason and wrecks homes." He proceeded, however, at once to sidetrack the far-fetched significance of that remark by bringing in the analogy of "the intoxication of false ideals now wrecking whole nations of the world itself." The Archbishop may be reminded that these false ideals have nearly all originated in countries where his Church has exercised a predominant influence for over a thousand years —Spain, Italy, Austria. On the other hand, Hinduism and Islam are living influences in this country and both of them in their attitude to Prohibition belie the assumptions of His Grace. We were astonished to read in the speech of this high dignitary of the ancient Catholic Church that what the Government of Bombay had adopted as their policy in 1921 was irrelevant as an argument for their resuming the policy in 1939. How like the modernists who say that what a Galilean fisherman said or did two thousand years ago is irrelevant to the consideration of present day problems! Another astonishing declaration of the Archbishop's is that the reaction of the Indian to Prohibition will be the same as that of the American or Irishman because human nature is the same. The taste for drink does not come naturally to man. The craving for drink is emphatically not, as His Grace said, a craving shared by human beings with animals. A dog would sniff at a saucer of whisky, or nira for that matter, and walk away in disgust in search of less noxious drink.

The Archbishop adopted another line of argument which, coming from a member of the Catholic hierarchy, can not but fill one with wondering perplexity. Sir Richard Temple, it seems, had said at a previous Rotary meeting that the Indian child will tend, like any other child, to convert "don't" into "do." The Archbishop thought that this may be true of the average child anywhere but in his opinion it was not true of the average adult, man or woman. Nevertheless His Grace and his Church have bidden the average child for centuries, and is still bidding them, to observe the ten Commandments most of which are "don'ts." Does His Grace seriously believe—as Sir Richard Temple apparently does—that children taught the commandments not to lie, not to steal, not to hear false witness and not to commit adultery, will do the opposite when they grow to be adults? In spite of the authority of Sir Richard Temple, who is just now engaged in creating new ideals for Indian society through the cinema film, it is the fact that teachers and parents throughout the ages have mainly relied on "don'ts" to guide children in the path of rectitude. Manu, Moses, Zoroaster, Buddha, Jesus and Mahomed, every one of them used "don'ts" and he would be a bold man who will maintain that they thereby led men to commit the very offences which they sought to prevent. His Grace cited the example of Ireland which, he said, was threatened in her very soul by the demon of drink. The method adopted by the Catholic priesthood to avert the peril was thus described by His Grace:

> I have often watched Irish Gurus (he evidently meant priests) exorcising that demon, and they did so chiefly by letting the drink go round the dinner table and never touching it themselves. At the same time they maintained a constant campaign against the evils of drunkenness, not the evils of drink, for though one might count by the hundreds of thousands total abstainers who would say, "I will not drink," one hardly ever found a man there to say: "You shall not drink." It was another variety of Guru who tried to impose on the United States his religion of "You shall not drink" and the whole world knew with what results.

The services of the Irish priesthood to the Irish nation not only in the matter of drink but in all spheres of life, have won the world's admiration. But we venture to doubt if what the Archbishop saw was the sole or principal method adopted by the clergy and whether, even if it was, it would have worked but for the fear of excommunication and other religious sanctions in the background. We also doubt if the demon of drink has been exorcised in Ireland, as the Archbishop's words would suggest. Has His Grace tried the Irish method in his Bandra Parish? Would he consult the local priests as to its probable efficacy? The Archbishop's speech betrays at every sentence a partisan spirit due chiefly to his ignorance of Indian conditions. The New Leader, the organ of the Catholic episcopacy in Madras, with its closer touch with Indian sentiment, is nearer reality.

Devasthan Lands:—The Bombay Government has directed that in all cases of regrant of resumed devasthan inam lands attached to Hindu religious institutions the further condition should be attached to the regrant that the institution will be open to Hindus of all classes. If the holders or managers of the institution refuse to accept this condition, the lands will continue as khalsa.

CONVERSION AND MARRIAGE.

Although the Koran allows the same rights to men as to women including the right of divorce, in practice Indian Muslim wives were exactly in the same position as Hindu wives in respect of their incapacity to dissolve their marriage-tie should they find themselves unhappy in their conjugal lives. This may be regarded as a striking illustration of the sociological law that all creeds and communities dwelling together tend to a single pattern of family and social life. Owing to this circumstance, the only way open to an Indian Muslim wife to release herself from a marriage tie which had become intolerable, was to become a convert to some other religion as by the Muslim law administered by the Indian Courts until a few weeks ago, change of religion automatically dissolved a Muslim marriage. The frequency of conversions on this account led Qazi Muhammad Ahmad Kazmi to introduce in the Indian Legislative Assembly the Muslim Dissolution of Marriage Bill some eighteen months ago. The Qazi listed in this Bill some eighteen grounds on which a Muslim wife can obtain a divorce. At the same time the Bill omitted the long-standing rule that conversion to another religion automatically dissolved a Muslim marriage. This measure was strongly opposed by Hindu members of the Assembly. They feared that the change would make it practically impossible to reclaim women, forcibly converted and married to Muslims, back to their families and their society. Qazi Muhammad Ahmad Kazmi recognised the force of this objection and agreed to put in a proviso that his Bill would apply only to women born in the Muslim faith and not to women converted from other faiths.

The importance of this proviso has received impressive confirmation from a case decided last week by Mr. Justice Davis, the Judicial Commissioner of Sind. A Hindu school girl of sixteen was persuaded by a Muslim youth to embrace Islam and marry him within a few hours of her conversion. The guardian of the girl moved the Court to declare the marriage void on the ground that the girl was a minor. The Court appointed an interim guardian and entrusted the girl to his care until the case was decided. The Muslim husband applied thereupon to have his wife restored to him. The learned Judicial Commissioner in his judgment held that the conversion and marriage of the girl were validly performed according to Islamic law which prescribed 15 years as the age of majority. But under the British Indian law the girl would be deemed a minor requiring the protection of a suitable guardian until she attained the age of eighteen. The learned Judge considered that the Muslim husband was by character and antecedents utterly unfitted to be the guardian of the girl. On the assurance that she would be treated with all kindness and would not be forced to relinquish her adopted faith, the Court handed over the girl to the guardianship of her father. A few days later the girl, it was announced, returned to her ancestral faith after performing purificatory rites before several citizens. The marriage would have subsisted if the Qazi's Bill had passed as originally drafted. But with the proviso inserted at the instance of Bhai Parmanand, exempting converted women from the provisions of the Act, it is automatically dissolved.

In the course of the trial several residents of the locality testified that the young Muslim husband, said to be the son of an ex-Prime Minister of Khairpur State, had at the head of a gang been in the habit of molesting the young women of their families. Some of them were retired officials and were Christians. They described Alam going about on a motor bike, throwing flashlights in the eyes of women and girls and creating a nuisance in Cincinnatus Town. They had waited as a deputation on the Police authorities but without effect. The learned Judge commented severely on the state of things disclosed by these witnesses. We quote from the report of the judgment in the Sind Observer of May 23 :

> It appears a matter of regret that in a city of the size of Karachi the authorities could do nothing really effective to save the young daughters of decent citizens from molestation and annoyance of this kind. Mr. Hardasmal said that they had not one uniformed policeman to spare for this beat, and, if that is so, then it would appear the police staff is undermanned. The Deputy Superintendent of Police, Mir Maqbul Khan, could do nothing really effective to abate this unmitigated nuisance. It appears, however, the bounden duty of the authorities to take some more effective action in the future than in the past to deal with undesirable characters such as the applicant.

The learned Judge called attention to the serious difficulties caused in similar cases by having two different ages of majority in the British Indian law. He said:—

> This case, in my opinion, shows the urgent need of the amendment of Sections 361 and 366 I. P. C. and other relevant sections relating to the protection of minor girls,—the age under Section 366-A is already 18 years—so as to raise the age under the criminal law to the age under the Guardians and Wards Act; and one of the most unpleasant features of this case is the manner in which the applicant interfered and continued to interfere with the minor girl when she was under 16 years of age, for, on the admission of both the applicant and the minor girl, they knew each other for two years. It is not reasonable to suppose that the first advances were made by a school girl under 15 years of age.

The two sections of the Indian Penal Code first referred to, relate to the offence of kidnapping. A boy under 14 years of age and a girl under 16 are under these sections minors and kidnapping them constitutes an offence. Section 366 A relates to procuration and here a girl under 18 years is defined as a minor. Prompt action has been taken by a Sindh member of the Indian Legislative Assembly to give effect to the learned Judge's suggestion. We publish elsewhere the draft Bill which Mr. Lalchand Navalrai proposes to introduce in the Assembly.

Two years ago Sind was convulsed over a communal problem arising out of an incident between a Hindu College girl and a Mussulman fellow student. For the last several months, the affairs of the Om Mandli and its women inmates have kept this new little province on tenterhooks. And now we have this conversion-marriage case. It is high time that Sindhi leaders set about overhauling their social system particularly at the points where Hindu and Muslim factors come in contact.

The Mahars :—The Mahars are a highly-gifted people who, with the opportunities now provided for them by Government as well as by private agencies, will soon take their full share in the advancement of national progress. A study of their manners and customs by the Rev. Alexander Robertson, has been published by the Y. M. C. A. Publishing House, Calcutta (Price Rs. 2). Principal John Mackenzie in his Foreword testifies to the high qualifications of Mr. Robertson for his task. He has lived and moved for many years intimately with members of the community. "He presents," writes Mr. Mackenzie, "the Mahar to us not as a mere object of scientific interest but as a man; and as a man possessing all the worth and dignity, and all the capacity for practical and spiritual intellectual attainment, that are found in other members of God's great family." Mr. Robertson, of course, commends Christianity as the best means of redeeming the Mahars and others hitherto regarded as untouchable among Hindus. But this opinion is not obtruded on the reader. The book is a careful and candid account of the Mahars.

The Aundh Constitution:—Constitutional government in the tiny State of Aundh in the Southern Mahratta country has been inaugurated by the Raja Sahib nominating his second son, Prince Appasahib Pant Pratinidhi, as Prime Minister. It is a well-established convention that a member of the ruling family should not hold a political office. The reasons for it are obvious. The unpopularity of the measures proposed by the Ministry will affect the prestige of the Crown which is expected to be above political partisanship. The first Act of the Raja Sahib of Aundh thus nullifies the whole spirit of constitutional government. It was reported that the Raja Sahib personally participated in the election campaign! The result, as it was described to us, has a comical as well as serious side to it.

U. S. A. DEPORTATION OF ALIENS.

The House of Representatives has passed without debate the Dempsey bill (H.R. 4860) to exclude and deport all aliens advocating "any change in the American form of government." Since there is no further definition of the term it would seem that aliens might be deported for expressing approval of any proposed change, such as the reorganization of government departments or, to use an older example, the repeal of the Prohbition Amendment. Foreign visitors, for instance, could not criticize any aspect of American government, either here or abroad—no matter how badly it might be working.

THE RAJKOT SETTLEMENT.

(By K. Chandy, Kottayyam.)

The Rajkot settlement is exceedingly intriguing. Durbar Viravala telegraphed to Gandhiji that the Thakore Saheb did not wish him to enter Rajkot. Gandhiji nevertheless went. At Rajkot he performed a mental or spiritual Harikari, repudiating his Rajkot fast and the Gwyer Award, and told the people who had put their trust in him that they should not look to him, that he was wrong in getting help from the Viceroy, and that people should look to their Thakore. The Parishad seems to be non-co-operating. How this new light which dawned on him, is Satyagraha, I do not know, and whether it would lead to democratic government the future will soon exhibit. My present problem is mainly a desire for further enlightenment. I have come across men of Durbar Viravala's type, and, whether it is my natural pessimism or the truth, my feeling is that Satyagraha will not change them. Pressure from above and enlightened self-interest are the only forces known to me which change them — also, as there is a God above, sometimes the appeal of a wife or a child. Did the Viceroy give a clear hint that Gandhiji should not be compelled to go on a fast again? That would be the pressure of a stronger force. Or is it presumed that, as the result of the Committee deliberations, the Dewan would become a kind of Governor, with toy ministers as a buffer between him and the people? The King would then be the God in the temple, and the Dewan the God taken out in procession. Gandhiji is, I hope, much too shrewd to be satisfied with such a denouement as a final solution of the problem of the States. The world has known Kings by the grace of God, and Dictators through the will of the people as fashioned and tortured into shape by a determined party; neither is Democracy. A Governor or Dictator-Dewan who is a nominee of the Prince, and who rules under forms of Parliamentary institutions and with the help of ministers with no ultimate responsibility is even more different from Democratic rule.

The essence of parliamentary democracy is that a set of men whose choice depends on the people and who are usually dominated by one of them, always has the last word in policy and administration. The completed plan of it is impossible in an Indian State; but there would be no popular government, even in a restricted measure, if the final word should rest with the Dewan who is a nominee of the Prince. When the Prince is a saintly ruler, and the Dewan a practical idealist as in Mysore, greatly beneficent results follow; but that is a rare combination with no succession value, and the attempt of democracy is to find succession always, with heights and depths, with trials and errors, but with the welfare and the will of the common man as the sole and abiding lodestar of effort. This is very different from the will of a King or of a Nazi, Fascist or Communist Dictator, or of the nominee of a Prince in India.

It is the ultimate source of authority that matters, and not the forms. A historical recent example will illustrate the point. If a citizen of an Indian State with no knowledge of parliamentary democracy in England happened to be a visitor to the House of Lords on the 11th December 1936, he would have witnessed the following events. The clerk of the Parliament stood beside the table of the House of Lords and said in French that the king wills it. The members of a Royal Commission, dressed in scarlet and ermine sat in front of the Throne (to represent the King). They asked the Black Rod to summon the Commons; the Speaker and the Commons arrived and stood at the Bar of the House of Lords. The Head of the Commission notified to the Lords spiritual and temporal and the Commons that the King had given his assent to the Act of Abdication. These formal events would give our citizen of an Indian State quite a wrong picture about the abdication. The person really responsible for the abdication as representing the will of the people was one of those standing at the Bar, viz. Lord Baldwin. The rest was all formal, because the British race believes in forms, and follows precedents even after they have lost their ancient meanings. In ancient days in the Cochin State, salutes were fired from an old muzzle loading cannon. After the sepoy had finished loading, he shouted to his officer in Malayalam, "Now you may shout your cry." The officer then gave in English the order to fire, and the gun was fired. It was indelibly impressed on the schoolboys standing near that there is a difference between reality and forms.

There is only one method whereby any measure of self-government which might be introduced in Rajkot or elsewhere would lead ultimately to real democratic control. In whatever restricted sphere it might be, and subject to whatever amplification or confirmation, in that sphere and in that manner, the wish of the people, as expressed by the minister or ministers, must prevail, whatever might be the private feeling or conviction of the Dewan and the ruler. If every measure proposed by the ministers should be subject to control or veto, there would never emerge from such a system any form of real democracy. It is better that simple people should make mistakes and learn than that a wise and shrewd Dewan should exercise final control—because there is no method by which a succession of such Dewans would happen, and because the growth of the people in wisdom and in self-respect is possible only under a system of trial and error by themselves.

THE ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH AND DEMOCRACY.*

The collapse of the Roman Empire forced the Church into government affairs to protect itself and Roman culture. There was no other organization with enough ability or vigour to meet the complete social and economic collapse in the years following the sacking of Rome. During the several hundred years that the Church remained the dominant political force in Europe, its fundamental theories of church-state relationship were developed, and these have naturally influenced subsequent thought and action.

It is often pointed out that the Church has an unspeakable dread of communism and is openly friendly to the corporative or fascist state. That the Church is seeking an adjustment, during a period of transition, that will be to its advantage in years to come, is not unreasonable to believe. The Church is anxious to avoid major set-backs. She has withstood three—by the Mohammedans, the Greek Orthodox Church, and the Protestants—and sees a fourth looming large. Communism seems to her to be the inevitable culmination of the ideals of the French Revolution—another menace driving at the heart of the remaining territory of the Church. Where the Church has had authority it has openly fought expressions of the liberal temper. It has not been a matter of making an easy adjustment to new ideas and practices. Rather it has been a matter of facing a heresy that threatened its very life.

Yet the Church has for centuries encouraged, sponsored, and at times even been preserved by, the essentially communistically organized monastic orders. It has exerted a major progressive force toward the development of a system of international law. It has demanded the rights of an international organization in matters of religion and morals. It has preserved scientific and religious truth during times of doubt and decay.

The Church has adjusted itself to changed conditions in the past. Will it find its future more secure under liberal democracy or the anti-democratic movement usually called fascism?

Pope Leo XIII in his political testament urged persistent enmity with the Italian government as the only way open for the Holy See to preserve its independence. The day the Holy See gave up its uncompromising attitude it would irretrievably fall under the influence of the Italian government. Events of the last few years tend to show that Pope Leo XIII feared with foundation. Although many of the Church officials in Italy are friendly to fascism, the fact remains that the Church is not at ease under a totalitarian government which controls propaganda and exerts pressure on the Church. It has sought an honourable treaty with Mussolini, but has found that the fascist state has no more regard for a treaty with a Church than with another government.

The von Papen-Pacelli Concordat gave the Church a foundation for dealing with Hitler, but almost immediately efforts were made by the Nazis to undermine it by propaganda to the effect that the Church was seeking political power. This gave the Nazis an excuse for violating the Concordat in fields of education and youth work. Since the time of the Concordat there has been increasing friction. Catholics are persecuted, priests are charged with crimes, churches are damaged and even cardinals attacked. Yet not once has the Church attacked the form of government, or political policies of Hitler. The Bishops even wired Hitler consent to his Czechoslovakian policy. The Church has sought bases of agreement, showed patience, criticized only where abuses and flagrant violations of essential Christian truth were involved.

The Church has tried to get along with Hitler, but again it seems that an international and totalitarian Church and a national and totalitarian state find so many points of overlapping interest and power that conflict is inevitable. Nazism increasingly reflects its religious nature in avowed paganism. The Church can make a satisfactory adjustment to paganism with only great difficulty. One doubts if a common fear of communism can suffice for long as a basis for friendly relations. "The Nazi Government will yet hear more from the Roman Catholic Church."

Spain has been the focal spot of most of the charges of co-operation between Fascism and the Church. From the beginning the Church opposed the Republican Government, excommunicating those who framed the Constitution. Here "the entente between the Papacy and Franco has been so constant and intimate as to combat utterly any claim to neutrality." As one noted Catholic put it, "the terrible thing, from a Catholic point of view, is that in the eyes of millions of Spaniards fascism and Christianity have become identical, and in hating one they must automatically hate the other."

The majority of people were loyal to the government as were many of the parish priests and a few of the Hierarchy, but the majority of the Spanish Hierarchy followed the land-owning class and the army. Although an effort was made to turn the war of fascist aggression into a Holy Crusade, the effort has never been convincing. The factor that probably comes closer to explaining the sympathy and support of the majority of the Spanish Hierarchy is that Franco promised to reestablish the Church as the state church, with power over education and protection of land holdings.

The answer to the question of whether the Church was wise in throwing its support to the anti-democratic government lies in the future, but if the word of Franco counts for no more than the pledge of Hitler or Mussolini, the future holds embarrassment for the Spanish Church.

As one surveys the relation of the Church to democracy, does it not seem that in the United States, at least, the majority of Catholic laymen are earnest supporters of democracy? But this support grows more from their participation in the national life of a democracy than from the pro-democratic leadership of the Church. When the democratic principle is extended beyond the political life to touch the racial, social and economic realms, there is often the charge that such effort is leading to atheism and socialism, which oppose the Church's interests.

In the United States the Church has adjusted itself to political democracy, and as a minority group it has had more to gain than lose. But in Spain the Church opposed democracy as there it had more to lose than gain. In Germany and Italy its opposition has been negative and based on limited areas of conflict where the Church was involved. In Spain and Mexico the Church has opposed the democratic governments, not only on specific Church matters but on the larger front of opposing the trend towards liberalism which has long been considered an enemy.

One cannot fail to recognize the fact that the Church in its official statements and attitudes is more favourably disposed toward a movement in the direction of the corporative or fascist state than toward the more socialized state which develops with efforts to introduce the democratic principle into economic and social problems. The Church itself is a totalitarian organization. It shares with fascism the belief that communism is its worst enemy. Both deny the class struggle and preach harmony among the classes. Both reject the idea of a classless society. Both favour a state system under strong authoritarian leadership, the Church leaning toward the type seen in Austria under Dolfuss, or in Portugal. Both commend and strive for a state organisation along vocational lines in which conditions of labour are fixed by law and strikes and lockouts are prohibited. Hitler proclaims his ideal in Mein Kampf and the Roman Catholic position is fully stated in Quadragisimo Anno. The German Labour Front is in complete agreement with this statement so far as social and economic principles are concerned.

In certain definite ways the Church favours the fascist organization of society and gives its support to it. In other ways it opposes it. In the United States the Church might be brought into a position of support for a totalitarianism that would fulfill the requirements of reactionary Americans, for fascism is not implanted from without but grows from within through the collapse of capitalist economy. If the Church has a stake in capitalism it would probably support efforts to bolster the capitalist economy. We have been facing the weakening of capitalism for several years and have found centres of fascist sentiment developing. The Church in certain sectors has been one of these through its local support of Hague, support of Franco, use of censorship and political pressure measures. The effect of such pressure on our foreign policy was made evident by the maintenance of the arms embargo on Spain through minority pressure though according to the Gallup Poll about 8 in 10 voters favoured the Loyalists. Minority pressure at this point may have definitely changed the future history of Europe and South America in the direction of fascism. It is such activity that shows the fascist danger.

The Church has a strategic position in creating the democratic spirit in the lives of millions who come from anti-democratic countries in Europe. The Church can be a strong force for democracy, though to date its opposition to anti-democratic forces has been largely negative. Where it has taken a positive position as in Spain, it has favoured fascism, on religious grounds, to be sure, but grounds with definite political results. It is well to point out here that to understand Catholic doctrine one must see the Church as an eternal expression of Christian life, though which alone salvation may be gained. Church-State relations are influenced by a concept of an eternal Church and a temporary and changing state power.

The newly elected Pope, Pius XII, faces a trying church-state problem. It is generally believed he was elected because of his record as a diplomat. Though the head of a totalitarian organization, it is generally believed he understands democracy more intimately than any of his predecessors. He is largely responsible for the Concordat with Germany, and headed the staff of diplomats who have tried to work in accord with the three fascist dictators. It is evident this policy is one of co-operation rather than antagonism.

With the evident interest in democracy on the part of Pius XII, the vigorous pro-democratic attitudes of such members of the Hierarchy as Cardinal Mundelein, the new emphasis on the catechism, the new drive for education in the ideals of democracy, it seems that the leadership of the Church may give more vigorous opposition to anti-democratic forces in the future. However, is it not true that these democratic expressions in general would be far more convincing with more democratic action where specific issues are involved? To date the largest pro-democratic force in the Church has been played down to the advantage of the anti-liberal group. Within the Church as well as without, the liberals have suffered at the hands of the conservative press.

NIRA AND TEETOTALISM.

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

Not long ago Gandhiji used himself to apply the axe to palmyra trees for being cut down by his followers, as much as to say, that they constituted a kind of a curse in creation. This propaganda went on for a pretty long time. The palmyra trees that were sought to be cut down were specially singled out for this kind of "aggressive Satyagraha." I was told in my younger days that palmyra trees like buffaloes are a part of the "Vishwamitra Sristi" being counterparts of cocoanut trees and cows. Although their yield and utility to mankind are more marked compared to cocoanut trees and cows still war was waged by Gandhiji.

But the onslaught acquires added significance if it is realised that the palmyra trees have always been regarded as the mainstay of the depressed classes, now known as Harijans who tapped them and prepared a kind of jaggary which was used in place of the article prepared from the more costly sugarcane juice. This they exclusively used themselves, for the higher classes rarely used the same as an article of consumption; firstly on account of the insanitary surroundings in which it used to be prepared by persons regarded as untouchable, and secondly because it was prepared from toddy though of an unfermented kind, for which, the higher classes took an almost invincible repugnance. I do not, however, dispute its general untility from the point of view of Ayurvedic medical scieuce which recommends it as an ingredient in its medical preparation.

Palm juice, whether of a palmyra or of any other palm tree in its fermented or unfermented stage, was tabooed by the higher classes. The unfermented palm-juice was never distinguished from the fermented juice. If at all it was used by the lowest-classes designated as the depressed classes. The degree of prejudice the palm juice acquired from historical times increased, because, it was offered to evil spirits or, 'Kshudra Devatas' by the depressed classes. Should the higher classes now accept this beverage because its qualities are extolled beyond measure? This is as much as to say that the higher classes all these days did very wrong—at any rate they did not do the right thing in saving themselves, from the use of this Nira.

The reasons for the unqualified repugnance of the higher classes of Hindus for Nira are not only its insufferable smell but also its tendency to intoxicate. It is believed that Nira when taken beyond a particular measure does intoxicate. Even Westerners like Abbe Du Bois plainly said so. In such a case where is the difference between Nira and toddy? Whatever the shortcomings of Indians generally and of the Hindus particularly in the eyes of the Westerners, one thing, teetotalism prevalent in the cultured and civilised classes of Hindus, was taken as their great virtue. It extorted their unstinted admiration. Will it not, therefore, constitute now a sort of a fall if the classes which tabooed the use of a substance as irreligious and obnoxious were to be asked not only to use it themselves with impunity but also popularise its supposed beneficial qualities amongst all classes of people and encourage its use amongst them?

It is beyond any doubt that Nira does really cause intoxication if drunk beyond certain limits. The nature of this limit must needs depend upon the nature of the constitution of a given individual. How is it possible to set a limit in the case of each individual saying that he should indulge in it so far and no further? Above all, is it within the range of possibility for the government, granting that people would learn to drink it with discrimination and thus avert bad consequences to regulate tapping, sale, and distribution of 'Nira' without this trade degenerating and flowing into dishonest channels? Will not this be an easy means of encouraging addicts to drink toddy under cloak of Nira or better still, make them commence with Nira and end with toddy, arrack, or other spirits?

The intoxicant qualities of Nira, if taken in excess once admitted, it ought to be necessarily eschewed as contributory to internal defilement in the same way as toddy or liquor. Addiction to Nira in initial stages is bound to lead a person unmistakably to the degrading and infamous vice of drunkenness. Hence, addiction to Nira can in no sense be reconciled with the ideal of teetotalism. It can not be called total abstinence in the case of a person who pretends to having given up toddy but yet goes on drinking Nira which has tendency to form a habit and to inebriate.

Is not Nira then in Dr. Johnson's words "An old coat with a new facing, or the Old dog in the new doublet?"

WHERE SOVIET RUSSIA FAILS.

Editor.

The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

Is it not the poor, the disinherited, the formerly oppressed and downtrodden in Soviet Russia who have now come into their own? It is often asked. Truly, masses of them have and all credit will be given when it is due. But it must be noted that it is conditional. Should any individual or portion of these masses happen, politically or economically to obstruct in any way the plans of the State, they are ruthlessly wiped out. The bourgeois, whose property and money were wanted for the proletariat, were simply killed out of hand or exiled. The Kulaks, hardworking small peasant proprietors living for generations on their bits of ancestral ground, because they dared to object when dispossessed of their land and to be thrown into the collective farms, were driven away into far distant parts, some say to famine-stricken districts, anyway they disappeared. The vagabond children, poor little wretches, homeless and deserted after their parents had been killed, had become quite unmanageable—after a time all disappeared! And there are assertions as to the method of their disappearing.

Any individual whose existence was awkward to the state disappeared! Mysterious "wreckers" who happened to be civil or military officials in higher places, were being arrested and tried in half or wholly mock trials, confessing in a benumbed and dazed manner to the most fantastic and grotesque crime and passing out at the rate of some hundreds a month to face the firing squad. Surely the most ghastly series of trials ever known since the days of the Spanish Inquisition, or the dark periods of witch-burning. The ship of the Soviet State has sailed in recent years literally upon a sea of blood. Even some of its staunchest admirers in England could not stand the horror of it. Maxton Fenner, Brockway and others, got over a message to Stalin which ended with the words, "Stop the Killing."

Whatever may be said for the extraordinary development, progress and uplift materially, of the proletariat, what is one to think of a government whose only way of dealing with difficult and inconvenient people of its own State, is by killing them? Are they still doing this? We have no reason to think that they are not.

Let the present comparatively prosperous and progressive conditions of life in the Soviet State be carefully studied, and it will be found that the orthodox Communist principles have been much modified, and in some cases abandoned; the fact being that Stalin has found that undiluted Communism is not workable. The old fantasy of a classless society, some say, is already beginning to fade out. It was found that the industrious skilled worker did not put out his best when he received no more wages than the lazy and unskilled "comrade." This gravely affected economic progress. So the skilled worker is given more wages; more wages means he can live better, better houses, better clothes, better food, even some are beginning to keep servants. Where is this going to end? Will not numbers of these people be living in better conditions of life than others? They will become more cultured, and seek the society of others of equal culture and so a higher class will gradually be created. It is also prophesised that it will be found that the free individual enterpriser, the capitalist will become a necessity. Will not this be enough to kill this fallacy of the equality of man? God has created a universe characterised by endless inequality, and limitless diversity.

When has there been more cruel exploitation, more barbarous oppression of liberty than in the Soviet State? Deny it who can.

The people of Russia have always been characterised by what is called a slave mentality, and submit docilely to a change from the Czarist tyranny to that of Stalin's. Probably their temperament is such that they can only be governed by a despot. The peculiar mentality of the Russian can easily be discerned in their literature. Intensely introspective in their genius, there is always an undercurrent of of submission to fate, despair and an acute and morbid sense of futility.

The people of India, if they ever find themselves under Communist despotism, will soon see what the Communists' idea of liberty, freedom and justice are! With very loud and insistent demands for liberty of opinion, freedom of the press, and civil liberties, before power has come into their hands, it is quite apparent, after they hold the reins of government, that what they mean by liberty of opinion, is liberty for their opinion, but not for any one else's. Freedom of the press, means freedom for their press, but not for anyone else's. Civil liberties mean, a preference given to those of their own way of thinking, and coercion and persecution are admittedly allowable methods of government amongst them.

And Justice? It will certainly not be that immortalised by Shakespeare in the Merchant of Venice. It will "fall" only upon those who hold the same political opinion or who do not have the courage to obstruct them; and the aristocrats, the wealthy, the landowners may think themselves fortunate to escape without being liquidated.

A leftist leader from India comes to one of our University towns, is entertained, and speaks to a large meeting mostly of youthful admirers. Taking advantage to the full of all the amenities of English life, the kindness and friendliness of the people, the perfect freedom to go, do, say, what he likes so long as it is not anti-social, an amount of freedom which he would probably find nowhere else in the world, and for which our government is responsible, he is able to proclaim with much gusto, "I hate the British Government" and enlarge upon his deadly enmity with evident delight. No one turns a hair and nothing is done to interfere with him in any way.

The situation into which this man puts himself and his utterances betray an utter lack of appreciation, of comprehension of that freedom surrounding him, and which he draws in with every breath of British air. It is altogether beyond his ken.

WHAT HITLER WROTE ABOUT INDIA.

[As there seems to be a certain amount of interest and a good deal of confusion as to what Herr Hitler wrote about Indians in his Mein Kampf, we reproduce below the passage from the uncensored English translation of his book. In his suspicions of Indians who claimed an importance for themselves in Germany and elsewhere as leaders of Indian nationalism, Herr Hitler whose interest is not in ideas but in results, instinctively arrived at conclusions borne out by political trends in India. The Indian National Congress long ago abandoned foreign propaganda and, as the premier political organisation in the country, deprived even its own leaders abroad, whether exiles, students or tourists, of any more than personal worth. The whole trend of Indian politics has been against seeking in foreign countries a strength which in the last resort must come from India herself. If Indians would recognise this in travelling in foreign countries, they would gain by it. The most responsible of our leaders, and therefore the ones who could really speak with some authority, have been scrupulously correct in this matter. If all Germans took up the sensible attitude of Herr Hitler that Germany was their peculiar problem and India, Egypt, the Balkans, etc., should be left to work out their own destiny, politics would be much simplified. Herr Hitler's approval of the British Empire was a shrewd political move which succeeded in immobilizing Britain after he came into power. After all one cannot quarrel with a man who shows himself so ardent an admirer. None of this can be construed as insults to India as some over-sensitive souls have done. Herr Hitler's references to inferior races and to the inability of Indians to win independence by their own efforts have undergone modification. The Japanese, also stigmatised as an inferior people, have been accepted as "honorary Aryans" not only by Nazi Germans but by South Africans as well. Herr Hitler recently expressed the opinion that India would be free when she was led by an Indian Hitler who was bound to arise. Herr Hitler himself has declared that his acts and public statements constitute a partial revision of his book.—Ed., I. S. R.]

As early as 1920-21, when the young movement began slowly to appear on the political horizon and movements for the liberation of the German nation were formed here and there, the Party was approached from various quarters in an attempt to bring it into definite connection with the liberationist movements in other countries. This was in line with the plans of the 'League of the Oppressed Nations', which had been advertised in many quarters and was composed principally of representatives of some of the Balkan States and also of Egypt and India. These always impressed me as charlatans who gave themselves big airs but had no real background at all. Not a few Germans however, especially in the nationalist camp, allowed themselves to be taken in by these pompous Orientals, and in the person of some wandering Indian or Egyptian student they believed at once that they were face to face with a 'representative' of India or Egypt. They did not realise that in most cases they were dealing with persons who had no backing whatsoever, who were not authorized by anybody to conclude any sort of agreement whatsoever; so that the practical result of every negotiation with such individuals was negative and the time spent in such dealings had to be reckoned as utterly lost. I was always on my guard against these attempts. Not only that I had something better to do than to waste weeks in such sterile 'discussions,' but also because I believed that even if one were dealing with genuine representatives that whole affair would be bound to turn out futile; if not positively harmful...

The attempt to make possible the disarmament of the all-powerful victorious States through a League of Oppressed Nations' is not only ridiculous but disastrous, It is disastrous because in that way the German people are again being diverted from real possibilities, which they abandon for the sake of fruitless hopes and illusions. In reality the German of today is like a drowning man that clutches at any straw which may float beside him. Any one finds people doing this who are otherwise highly educated. Wherever some will-o'-the-wisp of a fantastic hope appears these people set off immediately to chase it. Let this be a League of Oppressed Nations, a League of Nations, or some other fantastic invention, thousands of ingenuous souls will always be found to believe in it.

I remember well the childish and incomprehensible hopes which arose suddenly in nationalist circles in the years 1920–21 to the effect that England was just nearing its downfall in India. A few Asiatic mountebanks, who put themselves forward as "the champions of Indian Freedom," then began to perambulate throughout Europe and succeeded in inspiring otherwise quite reasonable people with the fixed notion that the British World Empire, which had its pivot in India, was just about to collapse there. They never realized that their own wish was the father of all these ideas. Nor did they stop to think how absurd their wishes were. For in as much as they expected the end of the British Empire and of England's power to follow the collapse of its dominion over India, they themselves admitted that India was of the most outstanding importance for England.

Now in all likelihood the deep mysteries of this most important problem must have been known not only to the German-National prophets but also to those who had the direction of British history in their hands. It is right down puerile to suppose that in England itself the importance of India for the British Empire was not adequately appreciated. And it is a proof of having learned nothing from the world war and of thoroughly misunderstanding or knowing nothing about Anglo-Saxon determination, when they imagine that England could lose India without first having put forth the last ounce of her strength to hold it. Moreover, it shows how complete is the ignorance prevailing in Germany as to the manner in which the spirit of England permeates and administers her Empire. England will never lose India unless she knows racial disruption in the machinery of her administration (which at present is entirely out of the question in India) or unless she is overcome by the sword of some powerful enemy. But Indian risings will never bring this about. We Germans have had sufficient experience to know how hard it is to coerce England. And, apart from all this, I as a German would far rather see India under British domination than under that of any other nation.

The hopes of an epic rising in Egypt were just as chimerical. The 'Holy War' may bring the pleasing illusion of our German nincompoops that others are now ready to shed their blood for them. Indeed this cowardly speculation is almost always the father of such hopes. But in reality the illusion would soon be brought to an end under fusillade from a few companies of British machine-guns and a hail of British bombs.

A coalition of cripples cannot attack a powerful State which is determined, if necessary, to shed the last drop of its blood to maintain its existence. To me, as a nationalist who appreciates the worth of the racial basis of humanity, I must recognize the racial inferiority of the so-called 'Oppressed Nations' and that is enough to prevent me from linking the destiny of my people with the destiny of those inferior races.

THE FRUITS OF HOLY OBEDIENCE

The 1939 William Penn lecture was delivered before the Philadelphia Yearly Meeting of the Friends on the subject "Holy Obedience" by Thomas R. Kelly, associate professor of philosophy of Haverford College. Excerpts from the abstract of the lecture as published in the Friends Intelligencer (Philadelphia), for April, 1, 1939, are given below:—

"Out in front of us is the drama of men of nations—seething, struggling, labouring, dying. Upon this tragic drama in these days our eyes are all set in anxious watch-fulness and in prayer. But within the silences of the souls of men an enternal drama is ever being enacted, in these days as well as in others. And on the outcome of this inner drama rests, ultimately, the outer pageant of history.

"Meister Eckhart wrote: "There are plenty to follow our Lord halfway, but not the other half. They will give up possessions, friends, and honours, but it touches them too closely to disown themselves." It is just this astonishing life which is willing to follow Him the other half, sincerely to disown itself—this life which intends complete obedience, without any reservations—that I would propose to you in all humanity, in all boldness, in all seriousness.....

"When such a commitment comes in a human life, God breaks through, miracles are wrought, world-renewing divine forces are released, history changes. There is nothing more important now than to have the human race endowed with just such committed lives.

"This is something wholly different from mild, conventional religion which, with respectable skirts held back by dainty fingers, anxiously tries to fish the world out of the mudhole of its own selfishness. Our churches, our meeting houses are full of such respectable and amiable people. We have plenty of Quakers to follow God the first half of the way. Many of us have become as mildly and as conventionally religious as were the church folk of three centuries ago against whose mildness and mediocrity and passionlessness George Fox and his followers flung themselves with all the passion of a glorious and a new discovery and with all the energy of dedicated lives.....

"The fruits of holy obedience are many. But two are so closely linked together that they can scarcely be treated separately. They are the passion for personal holiness and the sense of utter humility .....

"Another fruit of holy obedience is entrance into suffering. I would not magnify joy and rapture, although they are unspeakably great in the committed life. For joy and rapture need no advocates. But we shrink from suffering and can easily call all suffering an evil thing. Yet we live in an epoch of tragic sorrows.

"There is a lusty, adolescent way of thought among us which oversimplifies the question of suffering. It merely says, 'Let us remove it.' And some suffering can, through more suffering, be removed. But there is an inexorable residue which confronts you and me and the blighted souls of Europe and China and the Near East and India—awful, unremovable in a lifetime, withering all souls not genuinely rooted in Eternity itself.

"Our return from Europe with the sound of weeping in one's ears, in order to say, 'Don't be deceived. You must face Destiny. Preparation is only possible now. Don't be fooled by your sunny skies, by distance in time or space, or the false security of a bank account and an automobile and good health and willing hands to work. Thousands, perhaps millions, as good as you have had all these things and are perishing in body and, worse still, in soul today.' An awful solemnity is upon the earth, for the last vestige in earthly security is gone. It has always been gone and religion has always said so, but we haven't believed it.....There is no escape for you or for me. There is an inexorable amount of suffering in all life—blind, aching, unremovable, not new only terribly intensified in these days....

"In my deepest heart I know that some of us have to face our comfortable, self-oriented lives all over again. The times are too tragic, God's sorrow is too great, man's night is too dark, the cross is too glorious for us to live as we have lived, in anything short of holy obedience. It may or may not mean change in geography, in profession, in wealth, in earthly security. It does mean this: Some of us will have to enter upon a vow of renunciation and of dedication to the 'Eternal Internal' which is as complete and irrevocable as was the vow of the monk in the Middle Ages. Little groups of such utterly dedicated souls must, knowing each other in Divine Fellowship, take an irrevocable vow to live in this world yet not of this world, and if it be His will kindle again the embers of faith in the midst of a secular world."

VISIT OF DR. MONTESSORI.

Dr. Arundale, the president of the Theosophical Society, has been trying for some time to arrange for Dr. Maria Montessori to come to India in order to give her attention to the problem of child education in this country. She has now agreed to stay here for six months from October, 1939. The first visit of Dr. Montessori to India is of very great importance to education here. The whole world is aware of the scientific revolution in educational principle and methods which she has effected during a life-time devoted to the reverent and scientific study of the child.

From birth to youth and through the adolescent period, Dr. Montessori has now developed her method and doubtless will speak of the whole field of her study during her visit here. In addition she will conduct a training course in the primary section of her method, that is for children from birth to the age of six years, for she believes that only as we go to the baby, shall we find the clues to guide us in studying the later development of the man who is already expressing himself through the baby form.

This course which will be of three months' duration, will be held in association with the Besant Theosophical School, Adyar, Madras, from November to January. Like all her courses it will be international, but Dr. Montessori fully realises that conditions in India are radically different from those abroad and intends to adapt her principles to the needs of Indian children. She herself is particularly happy to come to India because she believes that this country will be more receptive in many ways to a truly spiritual view-point of education. The course should be of particular value for mothers, doctors and child-specialists as well as teachers and it is a great opportunity for us to come into personal contact with an educationist of such genius and inspiration.

The Montessori diploma will be awarded to those who attend regularly and pass the necessary tests—this has not been possible hitherto without attending a course in Europe.

During the other three months of her visit—which Dr. Montessori hopes will only be the first of many—she will tour all over the country to acquaint herself with conditions everywhere and to lecture before universities and other learned bodies.

Further detailed information may be obtained from K. Sankara Menon, Secretary, First Indian Montessori Course, Olcott Gardens, Adyar, Madras.

AGE OF MINORS BILL.

Mr. Lalchand Navalrai, M. L. A., proposes to give notice of introducing the following Bill in the Central Assembly with a view to get the Indian Penal Code Act XLV of 1860 amended:—

The object of this amendment is to raise the age limit of a person, female as well as male in connection with the offence of kidnapping and abduction to under eighteen years, instead of the existing limit of under sixteen and fourteen years in the case of a female and male child respectively.

This reform is over due. Experience shows that advantage is being taken of the weak intellect, immature judgment of minors both male and female, and their present day fancies and fantasies, in seducing them to immoral and unlawful purposes. The age of majority according to the provisions of Majority Act is eighteen years, and twenty-one, if the person is under a guardian appointed by courts.

The Indian Penal Code has already been amended in cognate Sections. In Section 366 A of the I. P. C. the age of a minor girl for the purpose of that Section has been raised to eighteen years. Nowadays kidnapping and abduction of immature and less intelligent boys and girls has much increased. Therefore there is no reason to make any distinction between the case of a male or a female child, as was done a long time ago.

In Section 366 B of the I. P. C. the age limit in the case of a girl has been raised to 18 years. In Sections 372, 373 of the I. P. C. which also deal with the moral ethics of persons, the age limit has been raised to under eighteen years. Lastly some High Courts and recently the Judicial Commissioner of Sind in "Mohini-Alam Romance" Case, have recognised the urgent need of this amendment.

Where it is necessary and expedient to amend the Criminal Law of kidnapping and abduction in India, it is hereby enacted as follows:—

(a) This Act may be called the Amending Act of the Indian Penal Code, Act XLV of 1860.

(b) It shall apply to the whole of British India.

(c) It shall come in force on.....

That in Section 361 of the Indian Penal Code, the words under fourteen years of age, if a male, or under sixteen years of age, if a female, be deleted and words "under eighteen years of age" be substituted, after the word "minor."

PROHIBITION IN N. W. F. P.

"The province of the North-Western Frontier will go completely 'dry' in the course of the next four or five years," declared Dr. Khan Sahib, Premier, who was in Simla in connection with the Home Ministers' Conference, in the course of an interview to the "United Press."

Asked whether there were any forces in the Frontier Provinces to obstruct any such proposals of complete prohibition, Dr. Khan Sahib replied:

"There is no such community in my Province who think themselves anglicised and would obstruct our work."

WEST OF SUEZ.

Prof. L. Rushbrook Williams writes in The Asiatic Review

"He adds to a lively, and occasionally malicious, pen a keen sense of humour and a certain confidence in his own judgment, which is the habitual prerogative of youth. The result is an engaging book, which tells us almost as much about Mr. Natarajan as about the places he visited and the persons he encountered."

"May well prove invaluable to other young Indians addicted with Western Wanderlust. For here they will read of the hotels he patronised, the tips he gave the porters he employed, where and what food he found, and the conclusions he sedately drew." The Times of India, Bombay.

"A pleasant souvenir of a six-months holiday which Mr. S. Natarajan spent in Europe last year. Mr. Natarajan left the shores of India on February 12, 1937 and when he set foot in Europe he found the whole Continent in a State of frenzy. The Civil war was in full swing in Spain, nervousness had gripped Naziland, Paris was getting the Exposition ready and England was all agog with excitement in view of the (then impending) Coronation of King George VI. Mr. Natarajan had plenty to see and hear during his sojourn. And he did well in taking his typewriter with him." The Hindu, Madras.

NOTES.

Gandhiji in Rajkot:—Gandhiji's action in wiping the slate clean of all the proceedings connected with his intervention in the Rajkot affair and in leaving the Thakore Sahib free to devise measures of constitutional reform suitable to his State, has been characterised as 'recantation' by people who have applauded Mr. Neville Chamberlain for the Munich Pact and for his present endeavours to guard against the consequences of that Pact. They do not see any incongruity in the British Prime Minister changing his mind and still retaining his office. Gandhiji holds no office. Whatever he does he does in a purely personal capacity. No one is obliged to accept his views. If people who rely on his popularity with the masses for their political careers, choose to adopt his views even when they swing from one extreme to another, they are doing much the same thing as the members of Parliament belonging to the Conservative, National Labour and National Liberal Parties, who supported Mr. Chamberlain when he brought back the Munich Pact and support him now when he is forming combinations to thwart Herr Hitler in carrying out the policy of the Pact. In invoking the Paramount Power which it is the declared object of the Congress to eliminate from Indian politics, to coerce the Thakore Sahib in to accepting Gandhiji's interpretation of the Thakore's notification, Gandhiji resorted to a step in conflict with the Congress objective. In the heat of his righteous indignation at what seemed to him the breach of faith of the Thakore Sahib, for whom he cherished friendly feelings, Gandhiji momentarily lost sight of the Congress objective. He has since perceived it and, like the man of Truth that he is, he has publicly declared that he was wrong and that he does not hold the Thakore Sahib to the conditions of the Gwyer Award. Incidentally, Gandhiji's frank avowal has relieved Indian States of a nightmare which has been oppressing them for the past two years.

Indian States and Prohibition:—A gratifying feature of the movement for Prohibition is the sympathetic attitude of important Indian States. We publish elsewhere the Press Notes issued by the Baroda and Mysore Governments regarding the measures they have adopted to co-operate with the Bombay and Madras Governments in giving effect to their programmes. Both the States Governments have closed liquor shops in the border villages so as to prevent smuggling. The Mysore Government has also definitely initiated Prohibition in some part of its own territories with the object of extending it eventually to the whole State. The Prime Minister of Hyderabad, Sir Akbar Hydari, has also at heart the cause of Prohibition and we may hope to see the first steps towards it taken a no distant date. Hyderabad has large untapped sources of revenue which can easily make up for the loss sustained by the introduction of Prohibition. We earnestly trust that other States will follow the example of the progressive States.

Satyagraha against House Tax:—The Government of Bombay has levied a tax of 10 per cent on the rateable value of houses in Bombay City and Suburbs to recoup part of the loss of Excise Revenue consequent on the introduction of Prohibition. In our view the reason for selecting Bombay city to introduce Prohibition is that it is from Bombay that the habit of drinking is acquired by the workers in factories and carried to their villages. It follows that the introduction of Prohibition in Bombay is a measure of benefit to the whole province and Government would be justified in raising the revenue needed to countervail the loss on Prohibition from the whole province. The principle that each locality should pay for the closing of liquor shops in its area, may or may not be a sound one but it does not hold good in the case of Bombay. However that may be, Government have announced that the taxation now proposed is tentative and that it may be revised at the end of a year. Some wealthy landlords in Bombay, it seems, have refused to pay the tax on the ground that they have been advised by high legal authority that its levy is illegal. The Government of Bombay felt constrained to explain that the tax has been sanctioned by the Provincial Legisature and has received the assent of the Governor and the Governor-General and that it is therefore today the law of the land. No opinion of lawyers, however eminent, can postpone the enforcement of a law. Government, of course will not go to the Federal Court to find out whether a tax which they have themselves levied after the necessary legislative procedure, is or is not legal. It is for the aggrieved persons to do this and meanwhile they should pay the tax under protest. None of the firms or individuals who are said to have adopted the attitude of a satyagrahi about this tax, would perhaps have done so if the bureaucracy were still in power. Many of us have still to acquire the habit of yielding to our own people when they are running the administration, the same respect as we have been yielding when the Government was in the hands of British personnel. This speaks poorly of the sincerity of our demand for self-government. Obviously many of us never clearly understood what we were asking for.

Ministers' Salaries and Allowances:—Public Information of the United Provinces, displays prominently in its issue dated April 1939, a comparative table of the salaries of ministers of various provinces and the travelling, motor car and contingency allowances drawn by them. The figures are from the 1939-40 Budgets and they afford a useful basis of comparison between the expenditure of the leading Congress and the two non-Congress provinces on their Cabinets. The scale of salaries for ministers in the Punjab has been retained at Rs. 3,000—3,500; in Bengal at Rs. 2,500—3,000. The Congress Provinces have, of course, enforced the Rs. 500 per month rule throughout. Here there is not much to choose as the Congress ministers have to follow the dictates of the party organisation. In the matter of allowances, where party scrutiny is lacking, the difference between Congress and non-Congress provinces is not very noticeable. The figures (average) are as follows: Punjab, Rs. 8,775 per year per minister; Bengal, Rs. 7,842; the United Provinces, Rs. 7,550; Madras Rs. 7,450; Bombay, Rs. 6,186; Sind, Rs. 7,450; Bihar, Rs. 8,050; the other provinces being less than Rs. 5,000. These figures deserve wide publicity. There is a general belief that the Congress Ministers tend to make up in allowances for any deficiency which their low salary might make in their standard of living. It is impossible to hold that view after a scrutiny of the information contained in these tables. Another point which arises is on the question of salaries. The limit of Rs. 500 was imposed by a party which had no experience of the cost of office to an individual. Now we have had that experience for two years. The scrupulous regard for public funds shown by ministers in the Congress provinces must in itself be a factor to inspire confidence in them. It would, we think, be in the interests of the country as a whole if the ministers could confer among themselves on what would be a just salary for cabinet members. The Congress might well leave the question to these men who are best fitted to pronounce an opinion on the subject. If it were done, we are sure the figure will not reach the high rewards still retained in the Punjab and in Bengal. But they would certainly not be Rs. 500 a month.

Dr. Schacht in India:—Many Indians were surprised at the nervousness shown both by the Nationalist and the Anglo-Indian press of Bombay at Dr. Schacht's visit to this country. When we protested against the Bombay Chronicle's hysterical abuse of any Indian who did not share its revulsion to Dr. Schacht, that newspaper assumed a high degree of omniscience on international affairs as well as a special knowledge of Indian feeling towards Nazi Germany and Dr. Schacht in particular. Not to be outdone in attacking an Axis power, the Evening News of India—under Times of India proprietorship—produced a leading article on the eve of Dr. Schacht's departure from Bombay implying that the distinguished German had left the country on finding that he was not "welcome." It was rather a surprise, therefore, to learn that Dr. Schacht a few days later was not only still in India but was at Simla as the guest of the Viceroy; that he had been invited to attend the birthday durbar of the Maharaja of Mysore as a State guest and that Sir Mirza Ismail was giving a party in his honour; and on Wednesday that he had addressed a public meeting at Madras presided over by Mr. S. Satyamurthi, Deputy leader of the Congress Party in the Central Assembly. Mr. Satyamurthi not only stressed the need for friendly relations between India and Germany but spoke optimistically of his chances of converting Dr. Schacht to ahimsa.

Holiday and Business:—Much has been made of the fact that Dr. Schacht is not in India purely on a holiday but has in view the consideration of business possibilities—far too much. It must be remembered that whatever Dr. Schacht can do in this direction is rendered possible by the continued presence of German Consulates in this country. There is also a good deal of business with Germany even at present although it is not ostentatiously carried out. If anti-Nazi enthusiasts want to sever all relations with Germany, it is not with casual visitors but with the Consulates and the established business houses that they should begin. Otherwise all they achieve is a certain popular reputation for the fearlessness of their opposition to Nazi-Fascist system, and this is in most democratic countries the supreme test of one's devotion to democracy. In his speech at Madras, Dr. Schacht said he was on a holiday visit but was also studying the people and the possibilities of trade between Germany and India. To those innocent minds which believe that Dr. Schacht is the only German working to this end or that trade with India is a new idea for Germans emanating from Dr. Schacht, this will cause another hysteria. A Reuter's message from London announces that Germany is considering an economic drive in India, primarily directed to those undeveloped fields where Britain has given up her preferences in the recent trade agreement. As for the barter system which Dr. Schacht was the first economist to apply on a large scale to international trade, it is interesting to note that other countries are following in Germany's footsteps. The fact that Dr. Schacht did not disclose his business interest in Bombay was doubtless due to wrong advice from local Germans who were momentarily thrown off their balance by the unprecedented virulence of the press attacks.

The "Dnyanodaya" on Bassein Celebrations :— Bassein about thirty miles from Bombay, celebrated recently the bi-centenary of a famous battle in which the Marathas overcame the Portuguese. In articles devoted to this theme in the Marathi Kesari, there has been a discussion of the conditions prevailing at the time and particularly the compulsory conversion of Indians to Catholicism, and a reference to the Inquisition. Now the point about Bassein is that it was the chief Indian centre where the Inquisition was set up and, bi-centenary or no bi-centenary, we fail to see how the history of Bassein could be complete without the fact being mentioned. There are ways of doing so and the Kesari apparently had not chosen the least provocative. For the Dnyanodaya has been stung into observing:—

> Suppose the people of other religious faiths, the Christians, for instance, were to string together similar stories of religious persecution from the present century, would that help the building of a worthy Indian nation? To Mr. Vaidya and the Kesari editors, who wrote a long editorial in a similar strain, based on the Bassein Victory of the Maratha Army over the Portuguese on May 12, 1739, we would point out that such squalid journalism mars the joy we can all feel in commemorating the remarkable prowess of India's soldiers displayed in what the English historian of the Marathas, Grant Duff, describes as 'the most remarkable siege ever prosecuted by the Marathas.' And to inject into Marathi journalism the spirit that poisoned these four or five columns of the Kesari on May 9 is to lose the far more important battle for that self-control and religious tolerance on which India's future so greatly depends.

The method of insinuation is unworthy of Mr. Edwards, a veteran editor and one who as the official spokesman of six missionary organisations has a special responsibility to refrain from hinting at things which he will not mention outright. If there are cases of persecution, organised religious persecution, matching the Inquisition, as Mr. Edwards more than suggests, it is his obvious duty to come out with them. We had occasion to protest recently against innuendoes in the political press. In religious journalism the innuendo is even more reprehensible. We would venture a friendly appeal to Mr. Edwards to consider seriously whether it will make for a worthy, or even healthy, India or for religious tolerance to indulge in this peculiar form of attack. We do not think that Mr. Edwards actually means what his words convey to any reader, that religious journalists should buy each other's silence on the sins of their respective communities by a "gentlemen's agreement." Whatever he meant, however, we would point out to Mr. Edwards that it was not in the best traditions of Christianity: "Charity," wrote Paul, in a memorable passage, "doth not behave herself unseemly.....is not easily provoked thinketh no evil."

Om Mandli :— We are by no means happy over the manner in which the Om Mandli of Hyderabad and Karachi has been suppressed by an executive order under a law meant to deal with violent revolutionary crime. Many of the persons at whose instance the Allah Bux ministry reluctantly agreed to suppress the institution by an executive fiat, would, we suppose, resent being classed as political reactionaries. The Om Mandli, it may be remembered, was twice acquitted by Courts of Law of the offences alleged against it. It would be a dangerous thing if the action of the Sind Government should be regarded as a precedent to be followed. Every one who starts an institution for women, does so at the risk of foul aspersions cast upon his character. A pure-souled reformer like Viresalingam Pantulu had to endure in his old age aspersions about the conduct of the Widows' Home which he was conducting at his own expense for the free boarding and schooling of destitute widows. The Reformer has good cause to remember the incident because, in its defence of Viresalingam Pantulu, it got involved in a litigation which, of course, resulted in its favour in the first and two appellate Courts. We know other men of unblemished integrity whose names were similarly traduced by irresponsible gossipmongers. It is unfortunately true that of late several institutions professing philanthropic objects have been found guilty of carrying on nefarious activities. The United Provinces Government has initiated legislation for the control of institutions professing to help women. Control and supervision by a responsible agency are to be welcomed as they will protect well-conducted homes from vicious criticism as well as prevent ill-conducted institutions from their harmful activities. A report went the round of the Indian newspapers that one of the women inmates of the Om Mandli had her face blackened and was taken round the town on an ass as a punishment for her folly. Whatever might be the crime of the woman, punishment of this kind is a relic of medeival barbarism.

Home for Mahars :— We publish today an account of the movement which culminated in the opening of the first nine houses of the Konkanastha Mahar Co-operative Housing Society by the Prime Minister of Bombay on Monday. This like the Tanners' Colony on the East side of the Railway line, where a Tanning Institute was opened some months ago, owes its origin to Mr. Kher. After protracted correspondence at some stages of which even the most patient of its promoters, Mr. Vaikunt L. Mehta, felt inclined to give up the scheme, the advent of the Congress Government facilitated the accomplishment of both projects. In his speech at the opening ceremony, Mr. Kher feelingly appealed to the inmates of the new Homes to make them happy for their women and children by supporting the policy of Prohibition.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER
BOMBAY, May 27, 1939.

THE WORLD SITUATION.

The chief event of international significance this week is the signing of the Pact at Berlin by the Italian and German Foreign Ministers pledging their two countries to stand as one unit in international polity. "When the agreement with Germany is signed," said Signor Mussolini speaking at Cuneo on the 20th May, "it will form a bloc of 150 million people, against which nothing can prevail." The Pact was signed on Monday, the 22nd May with much ceremonial solemnity. On paper at least the Pact establishes the closest union possible short of amalgamation between the two States. The two Governments bind themselves together to retain contact permanently with one another in order to agree on all questions affecting their own interests or the European situation as a whole. If one of the two becomes involved in warlike complications with another Power or Powers, the other will come to the aid of its ally with all military forces of land, sea and air. The remarkable feature about this document is that everything about it is absolute. There are no "if's" or "but's" in it. Whenever there is trouble, both parties must stand together without debating the rights and wrongs of the quarrel. This looks impressive but Italy had a very similar Treaty with Germany and Austria before the last War, and that did not prevent her from going over to the side of the Allies when the latter promised her more than the Germans, in case they won the War. Italy is not the only country which has broken treaty obligations and we do not mention this as a point against her. We refer to it only as showing that, if there is not a complete identity of interests and sentiments between the two peoples, neither Germans nor Italians will find it difficult to find or invent excuses to justify their violation of the agreement much earlier than the ten years which is the duration stipulated for this "permanent" Pact. In a theatrical aside in her "Life of Stresseman," Antonina Vallentin grows dythyrambic over the Germans' love of Italy.

> One of the most persistent elements in the German outlook is the love of Italy. Side by side, indeed, with this yearning for the South, which is also strongly marked on the Slav soul, this passionate feeling for Italy penetrates the whole German character as the outward expression of a much more complicated aspiration. Every impulse of the northern peoples, these disinherited children of the sun, that is born of an ill-defined desire to escape from the dismal round of daily toil: every yearning for effortless fulfilment like the yearning for a past now haloed in a golden glow,—all our almost physical longing for warmth and light and placid loveliness, is embodied in what we mean by Italy.

This German love for Italy is not reciprocated by the Italians. They have not forgotten how their country fared under Austro-German rule, how ruthlessly every liberal movement was oppressed, the flogging of Italian women by order of the Austrian commander in the streets of Brescia. Mussolini's treatment of the Germans in Tyrol, whom Hitler has left out of his programme of bringing all Germans into the Reich, is symbolic of the Italian attitude towards Germans. The Berlin Pact is purely dictated by political exigencies. It will endure only so long as these exigencies endure.

In contrast to the promptitude of the Rome-Berlin Axis, British-French efforts to gather round them a non-descript group of European nations, have been making slow progress. The new group is not confined to democratic States. Its slogan is no longer Democracy versus Dictatorship. It will include dictatorships like Poland, and Turkey, Greece and Roumania. But these countries are situated far away from Britain. The vast German bloc lies between them and France. The only Power that can give them effective and timely help in a time of crisis is Soviet Russia. It is, therefore, necessary if the Peace Front, as it is now called, is to function, that Soviet Russia should be brought into this Front. Now, all the Balkan States fear the Bolsheviks and their propaganda while their feeling towards Germany is rather one of distrust than fear. They are afraid that once the Reds are admitted to defend their independence against Germany, they will have to invite German assistance to prevent the Sovietisation of their peoples. In Great Britain itself there is an influential body of opinion which does not like an alliance with Russia. Communism is still the bete noir of British officialdom. It has infected even the Provincial Governments in India. How is it possible to accept Soviet Russia as a main pillar of the Peace Front and continue to penalise communist propaganda? The British Premier, Mr. Neville Chamberlain, wants to bind Russia to come to the assistance of the Peace Front countries without claiming any reciprocal obligations on the part of Britain. This is possible only in the case of India. Russia naturally objects to this one-sided arrangement. She does not appreciate the privilege of helping the Democratic Empires without expecting anything from them in return, not even the relaxation of the measures against Communist propaganda.

It is interesting to note in this connection that while Japan, whom the Soviet Government least likes, has not agreed to join the Rome-Berlin Pact, she has reiterated her pledge to stand by the anti-Comintern Pact, and has been mentioned in the former, along with Hungary and Manchukuo, as "friends." Of the importance which must be attached to their joint relations, both the Fascist and Nazi Governments are "conscious." Japanese Ministers meanwhile have declared that the Japanese way is neither the democratic not the dictators' way but the Imperial way which has not so far been defined. They have further declared that the attitude of their country in the event of a

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

European war will be one of "sympathetic neutrality." More recently they have, it was reported, taken a decision as regards Japan's attitude to Europeans. It is evident that Japan is rapidly emerging out of the imitative stage of her evolution as a modern nation and is striking out a course of her own which, we earnestly trust, will be in accord with the spirit of the great Indian Teacher whose shrines are scattered all over Japan and who is worshipped by her millions in various sects.

BRITAIN IN PALESTINE.

Initiating the debate in the House of Commons on Palestine last Monday, the Colonial Secretary, Mr. Malcolm MacDonald, made a reference to the promises made to Jews and Arabs during the War, debts of honour, he said, which could not be paid in counterfeit currency. This was a prelude to the announcement that the reform proposals published last week, were a fulfilment of both promises, even though they had rejected the "claims" of both Jews and Arabs. Mr. MacDonald did not trouble overmuch, from the reports published here, to answer the Arab objections and his only mention of the MacMahon correspondence was to say that he was not referring to it. He took up the attitude that after the Balfour Declaration the British Government had explained to Hussain their determination to plant the Jews in Palestine, so far as it was compatible with the economic and political freedom of the Arabs. There is a difference in the interpretation placed by British imperialist and Arab nationalist on this message which was delivered by Commander Hogarth to Hussain. Mr. MacDonald interprets it as a reiteration of the Balfour Declaration; while the Arab view, as explained by Mr. Antonius in "The Arab Awakening," is that it was intended to satisfy the Arabs that not only their civic and religious rights were to be safeguarded as the Balfour Declaration had announced, but that the political independence of Palestine was not to be questioned and that the pace of economic progress would be a regulated one. Mr. Antonius cites a Foreign Office document called the "Declaration to the Seven" which is explicit on several points. The document was in reply to the doubts of seven leading Arabs who had communicated their disquiet at the Balfour Declaration to Britain. It would have been wiser for Mr. MacDonald to have avoided the pitfalls of Palestine post-war history and contented himself with considering the present situation. Such a course would have saved others, notably Lord Zetland, from attempts to interpret the MacMahon correspondence in the terms of British post-war policy. The Colonial Secretary denied the description of the Balfour Declaration as one which sought to give the people who had no country, a country which had no people, and said that it was a common belief at the time. We can understand it being a popular impression but surely the Foreign Office was better informed. The long and at times tortuous negotiations carried on with Arab chiefs could not altogether have escaped the British Government's attention. Not to let your right hand know what your left hand is doing is not usual in politics; nor is it advisable. Even more unhappy was Mr. MacDonald's veiled threat to Arabs. "No doubt," he said, 'physically we could force on the Arabs of Palestine any kind of Jewish National Home but we could not do it with any moral justification." Even before the rise of Nazism in Germany, Britain was not able to do this. Can she do so now that the Arabs have a powerful potential ally in any anti-Jewish policy they may choose to adopt? The suggestion of magnanimity and the implication that, if the proposed reforms are not accepted, there might be a less sympathetic attitude, might well cause Arab leaders in Palestine to think twice before they decide for the British connection.

If Mr. MacDonald glossed over the Arab case, he was particularly careful in explaining to the Jews that the Balfour Declaration did not mean all that they thought it did. His explanations on this issue are convincing in so far as they show that Britain had a back-door open to escape from if the promise proved impossible to fulfil. To any one who peruses the Declaration, this is obvious and the Jewish leaders themselves felt it was not adequate for their needs in Palestine. But the Colonial Secretary apparently forgot in his desire to persuade the Jews that the Government was still carrying out the old policy, that every statement he made reducing the promise of the Balfour Declaration was a concession to the Arab case and a confession that British policy in the last twenty years has been a misguided one. The offer of reforms which was made last week, was a statesmanlike attempt to reverse that policy and had it been supported by an equally well-considered speech in Parliament, it would not have been difficult to win Arab support and restore confidence in the Mandatory Power. Mr. MacDonald's speech, however, leaves the impression that though a new policy has been announced, the old mentality still persists and that the change has been dictated mainly by exigency.

If the Colonial Secretary's speech initiating the debate failed to carry any message of conciliation to the Arabs, the reason became soon apparent in the voting on the debate. The Government majority was reduced to a bare eighty nine from the usual 250. The opposition found a measure of support from the Conservative members of Parliament who denounced the new policy as a concession to threatened force. For more reasons than one, the idea of a national home for the Jews has grown more popular outside Palestine since the War. The obvious reason is the sympathy engendered by the persecution to which the Jews in Central Europe have been subjected. There is also a feeling in Conservative minds in many countries that the creation of national sentiments and loyalties in the Jews would clear international and internal politics of an influence which is supra-national and antagonistic to national traditions. There is also the imperial consideration which argues that there are not two interests in Palestine but three. All these combined to strengthen the opposition. One of the Labour members argued that the trouble in Palestine was the result of outside interference and that, left to themselves, there would be no dispute between Arab and Jew. This is a peculiarly facile method of avoiding discontent in a subject country and it is used even with reference to India. In Palestine a special humour attaches to this contention. Mr. Noel-Baker might be reminded that but for outside interference there would be no separate Palestine, kept apart from other Arab States; no British problem in Palastine; and no Jews in Palestine for the Arabs to live peacefully or to quarrel with.

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

CRIMES AGAINST WOMEN.

(By J. M. Ganguli, Calcutta.)

Commenting on the apathetic attitude of the Congress in the matter of increasing crimes on women in Bengal, a thoughtful writer has very rightly remarked that it is possible for a society to endure in a state of political dependence, but not if women are prevented from leading a chaste life. Indeed, a society, or for the matter of that a civilisation, in which the chastity of women is endangered, is bound to degenerate and crumble because the birth of sons and daughters capable of maintaining and furthering the progress of civilisation does necessarily depend on the mental and physical state of motherhood which must be inspired by pure and virtuous ideals and which should have an easy sense of security against attacks on the practice of those ideals. A few years back a painstaking English historian, giving a careful review of the rise and fall of different civilisations at different periods in the world in his book, showed that so long as woman's chastity was carefully upheld and safeguarded, a civilisation prospered and progressed, but as soon as slackness in public morality came degeneration followed.

My object today is rather to point out to those, who take a serious view of increasing crimes committed on womanhood, that in order effectively to prevent such crimes much more will have to be done than simply agitating for more watchfulness and for a more vigorous application of penal laws by the Government. Perhaps they lay much stress on Government action, because they do not realise the extent to which such crimes are committed even in the inner-most circles of society. And very often they are committed in such undetectable manner and under cover of possible conventions and fiduciary relationship that it is not possible for Government to take cognizance and action. In fact it is in such ways that more crimes are committed than by kidnappers and rapers, who provide news to newspapers. More and more youngmen are found to take out their cousin or friend's sister, or a neighbour's daughter in the evening, unaccompanied by others, to cinemas, or for outing in a rickshaw or a taxi or on foot; and how often are they not seen misbehaving. Maternity house reports also give an increasing number of illegitimate births. Suicides by young women disappointed in clandestine love or when caught in misdemeanor, or when under laws of nature such misdemeanor becomes unavoidably exposed, are becoming increasingly common. Doctors say that birth-control requisites are more in demand from these dispensaries by unmarried men and women.

Do not these things show how crimes against women are increasing within particularly the so-called educated and cultured society? And yet the actual number of such crimes committed must be much more than the number that comes within notice. And these crimes are committed not by ruffians and criminals of the stamped variety, but by educated people moving freely and uncensored in society and even receiving respect and admiration for their smartness and accomplishments and for the positions they may be holding in their circle. Are these people less or a thousand times more dangerous and beastly than the kidnappers and rapers, who goaded by uncontrolled impulses are foolishly enough to come under the operations of penal laws? Such impulsive offenders are more easily reformable and managable under deterrent penal provisions and otherwise than those whose faulty education has deadened conscientious scruples and whose mind under imaginative excitement dwells on some or other means of satisfaction of sex instincts. It is the latter who spread vice, who tempt others, who dishonour relationship of trust and confidence, who cleverly avoid cognizable infringement of state laws, and who in fact by their unpunished and even uncensored career of unlicensed sex-crime, give encouragement in vice to others.

I am referring to these people, whose number though unnoticed is greatly increasing, because unless they receive our watchful attention those thoughtful well-wishers of society who are rightly perturbed over increasing crimes against womanhood, can indeed do little. The futility of seeking state aid in the suppression of such dangerous social crime will also become all the more evident when it is realised who constitute the graver danger, the above people or the convicted criminals. But if Government action must be inadequate against such crime, what is to be done? The only answer to the question is that individual and social consciousness must be strongly developed against sex-crime and against influence and propaganda which cause excitement, encourage loose thinking and so distort and misinterpret evolutionary ethical and moral principles and traditional social taboos as to make people light-hearted in impulsive indulgences. But such influence and propaganda are so strong and wide-spread and so influentially backed that it is very difficult to make a move against them. If, for instance, one were to suggest the demolition of cinema houses, where thousands of young men and women are day in and day out excited by the sight of obscene pictures, one is sure to be howled out of modern society. Even the papers and journals which denounce crimes against women but which nevertheless print cinema advertisement-pictures of women lascivously posed for sex appeal, will at best remain indifferent if they would not actually ridicule the suggestion. And yet it does not require much abstruse thinking to understand that people thus excited constantly by sex-exciting pictures projected on the screen or printed on daily papers cannot be expected to remain safe from slips. There are also other advertisements of drugs, drinks, toilet articles and in fact even every little thing in which woman's figure is shamelessly utilised for sex-appeal and thereby for effective drawing of public attention. A hair oil, a soap, a tooth-paste, a lamp-stand and so on, not to speak of the birth control requisites, invigorating pills and drugs, or the quick-cures of bad diseases, are all advertised through the aid of brutally exposed woman's figure. And these advertisements are coveted and welcomed even by responsible papers, which avow interest in national welfare and social prosperity.

If, therefore, as a result of animal lust being thus constantly excited in men and women by such advertisments, and pictures, sex crime in society increases who must be held responsible? The advertisers and the advertising papers, or those out in the districts who are at times driven by lust to mad crimes against women, or the Government for slackness in bringing the latter to book? I am not defending Government inaction or slighting the crimes of brutes. I am only stressing the point that if lusts are constantly excited by immoral literature and obscene pictures and otherwise, sex-crimes are bound to increase, whether exposedly or, what is much worse, secretly. To every thoughtful editor I earnestly urge the immediate necessity of exerting his influence not so much in making the Government pursue some kidnappers, but in making papers and periodicals and publications cease and refuse to publish cinema advertisements, advertisements of drugs and medicines of sex-diseases and pictures of women used for such and other advertisements. Civilization, if it were worth anything, shall not crumble down if public exposition of women's physical form in pictures and statues for commercial purposes, be strictly banned. I invite them also to agitate as strongly as they can against the cinema evil, which whatever some national leaders may say of its possible educational value, is in actual effect demoralising the country's youth. It is only by comprehensive all round propaganda, by which bad and lust-provoking influences will be removed, bad-moraled men and flirting women will be ostracised from society, no matter what their social or official position be, and people's faith in pure ethical and moral principles is strengthened, that a result-giving fight against crimes on women can be conducted, and not otherwise. And in such propaganda newspapers and journals can render inestimable service only if they would be inspired by high ideals of human service and not actuated by mere considerations of monetary gain. If I were, therefore, to remind the newspaper conductors of such service, must I only look for disappointment and indifferent comments, and not for any earnest response from any quarter?

THE KONKANASTHA MAHARS CO-OPERATIVE COLONY, BANDRA.

The difficulty experienced by Harijans in obtaining liveable housing accommodation in urban areas is well-known. The Harijan Sevak Sangh, Bombay, has arranged for the leasing out of chawls to be rented to Harijans. This is one method of solving the problem. Several Harijan families, who are unable to secure housing accommodation in Bombay, live in thatched cottages in the suburbs, but this form of housing is, by no means, satisfactory. Groups of Harijans settle down for a time in some areas, but are shifted occasionally from place to place. One of such colonies is at the foot of the Pali Hill, on the road from Bandra to Danda. The colony comprises nearly 100 families of Mahars from the Konkan who have put up thatched huts on land, the use of which was temporarily allowed to them by Government. Most of the persons in this colony are employed in the railway workshops and other factories in Bombay suburbs, their earnings varying from Rs. 20/- to Rs. 40/- per month. Some ten years ago, the present Prime Minister of Bombay, the Hon'ble Mr. B. G. Kher, formed contacts with the residents of this colony and conducted some educational and social work in their midst, which, however, was interrupted when he participated in the Civil Disobedience Movement.

The contact which the residents had establishd with public workers in the suburbs was renewed when a branch of the Harijan Sevak Sangh was started in 1938. One of the earliest proposals before the Sangh was for the provision of housing accommodation for the Mahars who comprised this colony. It so happened that while inquiries were being made into the proposal received from the Mahar members of the Bombay Branch of the Harijan Sevak Sangh, Mr. E. W. Perry, I. C. S., who had originally settled then on the site in 1918, happened to be posted as Collector of the Bombay Suburban District. The colonists again got into touch with the Collector through Mr. K. Natarajan, and after some discussion, the Collector suggested that it might be possible for Government to consider the question of allotting the site permanently to the Mahar families, provided they undertook to have a co-operative housing scheme and put up pukka buildings. The idea was enthusiastically taken up by the Mahar workers in the area, and a small amount as initial share capital was collected. Negotiations were also opened for the grant of the site, and a scheme drawn up for a co-operative housing society. The facilities and concessions that would be required from Government were also discussed with Mr. Perry, who was, however, shortly thereafter transferred.

Certain difficulties were raised subsequently about the allotment of the site. Part of the site represents valuable building plots in the Khar Development Scheme, and the colonists were asked whether it would be possible for them to pay for the plots at the land values prevailing in the neighbouring suburb of Khar. The question of the housing of those who, owing to their poor circumstances, could not join the proposed society, was also considered. Another difficulty was the paucity of the initial capital that could be subscribed by the promoters. Nevertheless, a scheme was drawn up which was signed by 30 persons, and a proposal for the registration of the society was submitted to the Registrar of Co-operative Societies. An application was also addressed to Government through the Collector of Bombay Suburban District for the grant of the site at the concessional rate of Re. 1/- per sq. yd. A request was made that both for the land and the buildings, Government might sanction a loan to the extent of three-fourths the value, making the loan repayable in 40 years and reducing the rate of interest to 5 per cent.

The Society was registered on 10th July 1936 and at the advice of Rao Bahadur S. S. Talmaki, the founder of the co-operative housing movement in India, the bye-laws for co-partnership housing societies were adopted. Provision is kept in the bye-laws for co-opting on the Board of Management 3 persons who might not be members of the Konkanastha Mahar community and would be non-residents of the colony. Several further discussions took place with the Collector of the Bombay Suburban District and other officers regarding the allotment of the site and the grant of the other concessions asked for, but a considerable delay occurred in the disposal of the Society's application. A representation was addressed to the Hon'ble the Revenue Minister on the present Ministry assuming office in July 1937. After detailed examination of the proposals, the Collector decided to recommend to Government the allotment of the site. The promoters thereupon decided to hold the first general meeting of the Society and to appoint a committee and to start work. The first general meeting was accordingly held on 6th January 1938 under the presidentship of the Hon'ble Mr. Morarji R. Desai, Revenue Minister, Government of Bombay, at which meeting, the bye-laws were adopted and a committee of management appointed. In his address at the meeting, the Hon'ble Mr. Morarji Desai advised the members to be loyal to the Society and to meet their liabilities regularly and punctually and to build up a harmonious colony in which they should live in peace and omity. He congratulated the promoters on the tenacity and solidarity shown by them. Six months more elapsed before orders were received from Government regarding the allotment of the site. Land admeasuring 12,766 sq. yds. in plots Nos. 614—621, 621A, 622, 622A & 623 in the Suburban Scheme No. 7 (Khar) were allotted to the Society at the concessional rate of Re. 1/- per sq. yd. subject to payment of a fourth the price by the Society, the remaining money being treated as a loan by Government. The Society was called upon to divide the area into plots not less than 200 sq. yds., of which not more than a third could be built upon. For the construction of buildings, Government sanctioned a loan to the extent of half the value of the buildings, carrying interest at 6 per cent. and repayable in 25 years. The members of the Society conveyed their sense of gratitude to Government for the allotment of the site and the other facilities granted, but represented that in view of their poverty it would not be possible for them to raise capital initially to the extent of half of the value of the buildings. They also represented that the rate of interest sanctioned, namely, 6 per cent. might be reduced to 5 per cent. and the amount of the loan increased to three-fourths of the value of the buildings. At the same time, negotiations were opened with the Harijan Sevak Sangh with a view to securing initial capital in case Government did not accede to the Society's request. Thanks to the interest shown in the scheme by the Hon'ble the Revenue Minister and his colleagues, the Society's request for a loan equal to three-fouth of the value of the buildings was acceded to, and the rate of interest was reduced from 6 per cent. to 5 per cent. This showed the keen desire of the Ministry to provide housing for this backward section of the low-paid industrial workers in the City and Suburbs of Bombay.

After receipt of these orders and the transfer of the site to the Society, steps were immediately taken to prepare and submit plans to the Executive Engineer and the Collector for the construction of the cottages which were to be put up according to the original discussion between the promoters and the then Collector, Mr. Perry. The initial capital raised by the members of the Society amounts to Rs. 5,928-8-0 and as only 9 of the members have agreed to complete during the current year their quota of capital representing a fourth of the total cost of land and buildings, building operations have been undertaken only for these persons. It is expected that the construction work for a majority of the remaining members will be taken in hand after the close of the monsoon.

Three types of cottages were decided upon according to the means of the members, details of these being as under:—

Particulars.	Type A.	Type B.	Type C.
Cost of Land	Rs. 400/-	Rs. 300/-	Rs. 250/-
Cost of Buildings	„ 2200/-	„ 1300/-	„ 850/-
Total Cost	Rs. 2,600/-	Rs. 1,600/-	Rs. 1,100/-

The monthly instalments payable are Rs. 15/-, Rs. 10/- and Rs. 7/-, for the three types of cottages. The plans and estimates were prepared by Messrs. Kora & Bhat, and tenders were invited by the Committee. The lowest tender received from Messrs. Premji Madhaji & Velji Purshottam was accepted and the foundation stone of the buildings was laid by Mr. K. Natarajan, who was one of the original promoters of the scheme, on 28th January 1939. In this address at the ceremony, Mr. Natarajan congratulated the colonists on their enthusiasm and energy and paid a tribute to the earlier efforts of the Hon'ble Mr. B. G. Kher, which had led to the growth of a conscious desire for better living in the minds of the colonists. He also expressed the hope that the foundation of the colony would lead to the spread of education among the Mahar population in Bandra and that a library and reading room would be opened in the colony. He presented a book of Hymns for the proposed library, and it is very gratifying to find that Mr. Natarajan's appeal evoked an immediate response. Mr. Madhavlal M. Bhat, a prominent resident of Khar, has kindly consented to give an endowment of Rs. 1,000/- for the construction of a building for the library. The contractors have been assiduous in carrying out the building operations in view the keen desire of the members of the Society to occupy their new habitations before the monsoon. The cottages have now been completed and an application has been made to the Bandra Municipality for the provision of the necessary amenities in the shape of water taps, roads and lighting arrangements.

In view of the Hon'ble Mr. B. G. Kher's association with the colonists since 1929, the promoters waited on him in deputation to request him to perform the opening ceremony of the Colony. This he did at 8 a. m. on the morning of Monday, 22nd May 1939.

THE WAR IN CHINA.

(Contributed.)

The criminal misery of Nanking has at last become general knowledge, though there are few who grasp its despairing total. Temperley's book, "What War Means: The Japanese Terror in China," is straight stuff. Unfortunately there are some people who shrink from confronting the evil of the present world, by refusing to believe what they term "atrocity stories." The first necessity of work for peace or for any other improvement, is to face the facts honestly. Then the interpretation of the facts, the formulation of programme, and the going forth to action, are further steps—all subject to modification as new facts require. Certain friends take a position, and then dismiss or arrange facts in defence of the position which puts them in illusory ether.

Our final estimate of the number of civilians killed in Nanking was 12,000, nine-tenths of them apart from military operations, and including many women, children, and aged men. That figure is in the ratio of one to every four families, then in the city. We have specific reports from resident families, given with some reluctance and concealment because retaliation was feared, of one member in every five families killed, injured, or taken away not to return. More than 30,000 military prisoners who had abandoned their arms, were mercilessly butchered, most of them tied in long lines and machine-gunned on the river-bank. Many thousands of women were raped (8,000 was a careful figure set early in the process, and the most conservative given by any observer).

Immediately outside the wall, there was extensive burning by the Chinese army in preparing its own defence. Within the wall, the buildings and their contents were practically intact at the time of transfer; but during a period of six weeks, beginning one week after entry, the Japanese military burned several thousand buildings (over 4,000 street numbers). These all belonged to the ordinary citizens whom they have come to "liberate," and none to the Government or Party whom they execrate. For the whole city, 24 per cent of the buildings were burned. An additional 63 per cent suffered serious looting, primarily by soldiers, which stripped almost all the people of their unburned tools, stocks, clothing, even food. The foregoing figures are from the Nanking International Relief Committee's survey (printed as "War Damage in the Nanking Area,") which inspected every one of the 40,000 house members in the city and investigated in detail every tenth one. The losses were the more shameful because less than two per cent were incurred by actual military operations.

Nor was the fearful injury limited to Nanking. The investigations directed by our trained sociologist, Dr. Lewis Smythe, to estimate the remaining resources and the relative needs for various types of relief, found that in a wide area of country 40 per cent of farm buildings had been burned, nearly half the implements and animals lost, and one resident in every seven families killed. The brutal destruction of villages still continues spasmodically but on a considerable scale, often because infuriated farmers have attacked a small patrol that seized their women, or because local people have been caught between the conflicting demands of querillas and Japanese for supplies and labour.

Can you think what life was like among defenceless people in long periods of such terror and danger, when the appearance of a soldier in the street, or a rap at the door, or a false report by disreputable police hirelings, meant immediate risk to person and almost certain loss of humble possessions? Three weeks were intensely bad, and not until June did gradual easing off end in reasonable security of life and limb. There is still confiscation of land and buildings at will; more than 20 per cent of the real property in Nanking has been taken by the military, by their Chinese servants of varying titles and by the 3,000 Japanese civilians and 302 Japanese shops now set up in the city in the best buildings that escaped burning. I do not know of one case of free commercial transfer; and among scores of instances with which I am familiar, the only actual compensation was $ 5 per family given to some thousands of persons in a large area seized entire. That is "economic co-operation," about which diplomats make after-dinner speeches. One side provides the property and labour; the other, gun in hand, takes control and profits with only nominal investment aside from the gun. In our experience it works just the same from electric power plant to corner-store and private residence. Attila was a simple greenhorn.

The International Committee in December of last year provided 250,000 people with housing (in highly relative security), including 70,000 in 25 refugee camps. It was necessary to supply food for many of the latter, even until May, though numbers had gradually dwindled with partial restoration of order. Some $ 815,000 in Chinese currency has been expended to date, mainly in food (exchange was $ 3·40 to the American dollar until spring but now is more than six to one). Cash relief, conduct of the camps, work relief projects, clothing, sanitary and health work, and small loans for starting trade or production, have been the other chief forms of aid.

The romance of the local struggle to carry on relief, which has literally cost life and blood and imprisonment and tears; the story of the co-operation of German Nazis and British businessmen with us American missionaries who have had to do more than our national share; the part of Mohammedans, Buddhists, and Catholics in our inner groups; the remarkable qualities shown by many of our hastily gathered Chinese staff; the actual achievement in the face of guns and of a still potent distrust expressed in repeated "dissolutions" and orders to Chinese to have nothing to do with us: All these require more space and skill than are now at your service.

Nanking's population has now come up to practically 400,000 (as compared with 250,000 in the Safety Zone period and just 1,000,000 before the war). Recent additions are largely refugees from the country, some of whom went there from the city in search of safety, but have now used or been deprived of all their money (and often of their clothes) in the precarious hinterland of guerillas and punitive raids. There has been a remarkable effort by farmers, small merchants, and some makers of household necessities to reestablish themselves. Yet even now we can scarcely tell how half the people keep alive, and are undertaking a specific investigation of occupation and income in order to find out.

There is a good deal of common labour in the military supply and transport services, and a socially unhealthy provision for soldiers' requirements of all sorts. But I am long past blaming a coolie for serving his country's enemy in order to feed his crying children, or a girl from doing anything to avoid starvation, if they don't bring too much direct injury to others (such as joining in armed extortion rackets, or spreading heroin and opium). For a good deal of comfortable morality can hardly stand against the basic needs of life itself, and the war has already brought down scores of millions of us in economic and social ruin. Incidentally, we now have large open brothels, advertising in the official newspaper; and an entire new class of brazen girls as waitresses in restaurants, a complete revolution in manners for Nanking.

One of the grim features of life for an American pacifist in Nanking is the experience of seeing squadrons of bombing planes through hundreds of successive days, some with American equipment and almost all fed with American gasoline. In the river an extensive navy propelled with American oil; on the roads hundreds of military trucks from General Motors and other American makers. Plus the realization that many of his pacifist friends in America are condemning the weaker nations of the world to destruction by resolutely opposing international co-operation in the first weak steps toward world government, and by opposing withdrawal from economic partnership with aggressors, lest Al-Capone nations should be displeased.

The past year and a half does not leave to an analytical mind much remainder from certain conventional beliefs in a benign providence, and I can see little indication of God in the tremendous wave of cruelty and greed that has engulfed a big piece of our world. Yet the worth of human character, and the need of men for the life and vision that Jesus gave, have never loomed so great. The invigoration of fighting unarmed for the lives of persons in pressing danger, and the thrill of standing for truth and humanity when you know that any moment you may be wiped out by unregarding force—may be that's life eternal, if we lose our slavery to time. There is a new sense of freedom to go ahead according to the light that's given, take whatever comes. If life stopped now, it still would have been worth while, and the investment of others in nurture and opportunity, which used to weigh heavily, would not have been lost. So far an open procedure in the immediate struggle, and an attempt to keep clear of narrow partisanship, have been rewarded by continuance. But one vindictive military policeman, one narrow reader of suspicious clippings, can radically tear out a lifetime's work.

THE KINGDOM AND THE CHURCH.

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

The article under this heading in the issue of April 8th apparently has two objects. First, a denunciation of the Churches, by which term no doubt is meant what is now called organised Christianity, by showing up their failure to carry out the commands of Jesus Christ towards the establishing of a kingdom of God upon earth, and secondly, to make out a case for the Communist creed from the teachings of Jesus Christ. Let us touch on the first object, beginning with the writer's words, "The Soviet decrees banishing Christianity from Russia, and the Indian attitude of approving Christ and rejecting Christianity." The reference to the Soviet decrees is a gross understatement. One of the principles laid down by Lenin for his State is the rejection of religions in toto as "dope for the masses," and the very definite anti-God dogma to be taught to children in all the schools. The attitude, "approving Christ and rejecting Christianity" is not peculiar to Indian quarters, though the unusual venomousness of its presentation there, justifies one in looking for the "cloven hoof" of primitive race hatred. Lacking this in other quarters we nevertheless find the same attitude common to neo-pagan, unitarian and so on. The objection of these cultists to dogma and organization is very hard to understand, and their mystic conceptions seem to be as sane and reasonable as the concept of a house without foundations, walls or roof. In fact, there is no getting away from dogma or organisation, anywhere and in everything. The man who says, I believe that Jesus Christ is not God, gives forth a dogma as fully as the one who states, I believe that Jesus Christ is God. Dogma is the assertion of a belief or opinion.

To belabour the Churches for all their sins of commission and omission makes a feeble argument against them. Inspiration from Heaven has no medium to work through but faulty human nature. But because we believe in that nature as made in the "image of God," we can understand how the Divine spark can light up a response in the human soul, however much this is clogged and shrouded with error, and never can attain to any height but by repeated struggle and failure.

Now we may come to the second object, that of making out a case for the Communist creed from the teachings of Jesus Christ. The writer may protest that he uses the term "Socialism" and not "Communism." But it is evident that there is no difference between the two, as he understands them. Here we find a desire of great intensity to present Jesus Christ as a figurehead for the Communist creed, and the expression of certainty that no one could fail to find in the Gospels a support of the same. The writer is pitifully hag-ridden by the spectre of Imperialism, Capitalism, exploiters and oppressors of the disinherited. His grievance against the Church seems to be that its adherents are "dupes of Imperialism" and permeated with the ogrish and malevolent qualities of the abovesaid spectres. This is sad indeed. But I think if these bogies are boldly seized, set up, and faced, they will be found mild and harmless if they do not altogether crumble away in our hands.

Let us start with this terrible imperialism. What is it? Where is it? What are the facts? It can be proved that the old imperialism which is in the minds of its denouncers, has in modern times no connection with Christianity nor has it any more affinity with the West than with the East. In fact the chief exponent of the worst type of the old imperialism now discredited by all truly civilized Powers, is Eastern Buddhistic Japan.

In Europe this devilish imperialism exists in the heated brains of two men only, the Dictators. Whatever their religious professions may be, they have little and in one case no resemblance to Christianity, and but for them this evil would have died a natural death in their countries as elsewhere.

As for the much vilified British Imperialism, it resolves itself into no more than the ceaseless endeavour to administer with impartiality, good government and justice to each and every country of a greater variety of clime, race and culture than has been possessed by any other empire. Her government is steadily pursuing a continuity of policy, having become inured to the "fiery darts of the enemy," who assail with wilful misunderstanding, distortions of truth, imputation of unworthy and base motives, suspicion, distrust, seizing upon and exploiting the failures inevitable in all human institutions, and making no allowance for the stupendous difficulties which beset her administration.

Now I come to the bogy capitalist. He is indeed very black and hideous. Almost every evil under the sun is attributed to him. Let us look at one out of the various specimens in the real. Born under no better conditions of life than that of the artisans he afterward employs, he works his way up by tireless industry and business ability to the amassing of a large fortune, by means of which he is enabled to provide a good living for thousands who are not fitted for any kind of work but the simplest and for thousands who are gifted and able to rise, in competence or affluence. The unchecked freedom of the individual to develop great enterprises seems also to be a necessary factor in the democratic system.

"Exploiters and "oppressors" can be classed together, and examined. What is the meaning of the word exploitation? It is now-a-days almost always used wrongly, that is in a sinister sense. An employer cannot get his work done without labour. Poor people wanting work, entirely dependent on their earnings, neither fit for, nor in the least desiring work of an intellectual kind, are provided with manual work—what they want—good living conditions, and suitable wages. Here the advantage is on both sides. This is exploitation of labour, the term used in its original sense. But if the employer, taking advantage of the helplessness of the employed underpays them, neglects their interests, makes profit only for his own, that is exploitation in its sinister sense. By those using the term now-a-days so constantly, every kind of relation of employer and employed, good, bad and indifferent, are lumped together indiscriminately under the approbrious term "exploitation." This is all wrong.

One is struck by the curious attitude of the writer of the article towards the Life and Death of Jesus Christ, as if it were no more than a political murder of "the noblest purest, loveliest man that ever breathed." Needless to say, this is not the Christian attitude, nor will his claims for Jesus Christ as a revolutionary be made good by a dispassionate study of the Gospels, as he avers. From the time when "the word was made flesh, and dwelt among us," this Divine Figure has been exploited as a figurehead for one ideology after another. Interpretations upon words and phrases are made to fit in with the respective ideologies, while those on the contrary are omitted. In the present case, for instance, such sayings of Jesus Christ as "render unto Caesar the things which are Caesar's," "the poor ye have always with you" and His honouring of Zacchias, the wealthy tax-gatherer, by calling him and going as a guest to his house, are not noticed; further one of the greatest of the apostles and martyrs and the constant companion of Jesus, St. Peter, so understood His teaching that he could write in I St. Peter II. 11, "dearly beloved..... submit yourselves to every ordinance of man for the Lord's sake; whether it be to the King as supreme; or unto governors as unto them that are sent by him, for the punishment of evildoers, and for the praise of them that do well. For so is the will of God, that with well doing ye may put to silence the ignorance of foolish men: as free, and not using your liberty as a cloak of maliciousness: but as the servants of God. Honour all men. Love the brotherhood. Fear God. Honour the King." (Incidentally we have here the foundations of monarchical democracy).

But a really dispassionate study of the whole New Testament will prove that Jesus Christ over and over again emphasizes the fact that His Kingdom was not of this world. He laid down principles for life that were completely new. Truly, these did revolutionise the world. But He, Himself, had no concern, in the three short years of His ministry, with their practical application. This was left to His Church.

The writer bases his assumption of a renegade Church upon such flimsy and crooked premises, that it is evident he has made neither a dispassionate nor serious study of the New Testament. I would beg of him to lose no time in making such a study, and concurrently, an intensive study of Communism (let it here be said that Communism is undoubtedly an idealism, and its inaugurators have been great in selflessness), not so much its theories, but how it has worked out and is working out in real life. If he can truly do this without bias, he will not so appalingly dishonour Jesus Christ as to connect Him with that creed, the stark antithesis of His manifestation of "God in Love." We know well that a burning and passionate compassion and longing for justice for the weak, helpless and downtrodden is at the root of that attraction of Communism, but its lure is that of the will'o-the-wisp over the quaking bogs. Founded and grounded upon hatred, and blank crass materialism, its fundamental tends to the subserving of the individual to the State, the government of the community as a herd. The State is everything, the individual, as individual, is nothing. This is a denial of the God Who came into the world to seek, and died to save, every individual "lost sheep." Reckoning only with the material world it leaves out of count that which alone makes live worth living, man's immortal spirit. "Man doth not live by bread alone, but by every word which proceedeth from the mouth of God." The bread of this world, it is feverishly eager in providing, but denies, what to many is more precious than life, freedom of the soul.

Yours etc.,
I. J. PITT.

[Mrs. Pitt takes up cudgels on behalf of Christianity, imperialism and capitalism. We are not concerned with the details of her argument but in broad outline she seems to have entirely missed the point of the Indian attitude of "accepting Christ and rejecting Christianity." If this, as she believes, had been the result of primitive race hatred, surely it would have diminished with increasing familiarity. If one wants a reason for the Indian attitude it must be sought in the vigour of proselyting missions. We must confess we are a little tired of hearing smug European accusations of race hatred against other peoples. We agree with Mrs. Pitt that too many people try to obtain the sanction of Christ's teachings for their theories. It is all the more surprising that she should have sought later in her article to use a quotation from Peter to support monarchic democracy. Mrs. Pitt's sympathy for British Imperialism is understandable. To others, however, it is more difficult to reconcile Britain's ceaseless endeavour for justice, etc., etc., with what she is carrying out in Palestine, for instance. Mrs. Pitt's naive assumptions for British Imperialism remind one of Mr. S. Fowler Wright's argument in "Should We Surrender Colonies?" Chevron 6d. Special, that whilst Germany took her old Colonial empire by force, "some of the most extensive and valuable parts of our Empire were the fruits of hardy pioneering in empty lands, or of discoveries in uncharted seas. A virile island race sent out cargoes of living men to populate these distant desolate lands." Mrs. Pitt sets great store on the "unchecked liberties of the individual" in the economic sphere. This has been the fatal error of democracy. For historical reasons, the men who distrusted political power, the power of the State, so much that they fought for civil liberties, were prepared to depend on the good nature of big business, economic power. The failure to secure a minimum of economic rights for the individual has weakened the foundations of democracy.—Ed., I. S. R.]

PROHIBITION IN MYSORE.

One of the representations made to the Dewan on 4th April by the Mysore State Temperance Federation was that, with a view to helping the labouring classes from the immediate temptation of drink and wasting their hard-earned wages of the whole month on the pay days, "Government may be pleased, as a first step, to close the drink shops in urban areas like Bangalore City, Kolar Gold Fields, Mysore, Bhadravati, Davangere and Mandya during pay days."

The Government took up the suggestion. It was found that, according to existing rules, special discretion is given to the Deputy Commissioners to reduce the hours of sale in industrial areas by closing the shops on week days from 11-30 to 1-30 p. m. and on the afternoon of the pay days and by directing the shops to keep open on Sundays only between 11-30 a. m. to 4 p. m.

If this discretion is exercised rigorously, it would be possible to reduce drinking on pay days. The Government have instructed that Deputy Commissioners should exercise their discretion in favour of closing the shops. The Deputy Commissioners will consult employers of labour in large industrial concerns and specify the day in the month for the disbursement of wages, and on this day the shops will remain closed.

The Deputy Commissioners of Kolar, Mysore, Chitaldrug and Shimoga will exercise this discretion of closing shops on pay days in relation to Kolar Gold Fields, Mysore City, Davangere and Bhadravati. Bangalore City had to be excluded as the Civil and Military Station authorities could find no necessity for such a measure in their area. It would be easy for the workmen in Bangalore City to run to the open shops in the Civil and Military Station.

In this connection, it may be noted that the existing rules provide for effective control of sale and that the rules are worked in the proper spirit. The Deputy Commissioner has power to notify at the time of the auction sales that specified shops will be closed on the occasion of specified festivals. If a jatra is considered a festival, this rule empowers the Deputy Commissioners to close the shops located in jatra areas during the time of such jatras.

Another rule prohibits the issue of occasional licences for the sale of liquor during jatras; and even existing shops, except in Municipal towns, have to be removed to a distance of one mile from the place of jatra during the duration of the jatra. Deputy Commissioners, Revenue Assistant Commissioners and District Excise Officers have power to close any shop temporarily in times of religious excitement. Again, the Deputy Commissioner may order the transfer of shops from one locality to another within the limits of the same town or village, or the closure.

In short, the existing rules provide sufficient scope for issue of any general subsidiary instructions on the basis of which the Deputy Commissioners can take action about prohibiting sale of liquor during jatras.

With reference to the request of the Temperance Federation that the Government of Mysore, in view of their sympathy towards attempts at Prohibiton by the neighbouring provincial Government, "may be pleased to declare a dry area belt on the border of the Prohibition districts, and close the liquor shops situated within about 10 miles in the border all round," it was found that even in the Madras Presidency they do not seem to have removed or closed the shop in any adjoining belt area. They are satisfied with the rationing and some restrictions on sale.

The Government of Mysore have already done this.

In the meanwhile, Prohibition work in Closepet is carried on. Figures showing the comparative consumption of excisable articles and the number of toddy yielding trees in Closepet in March indicate that there has been a fall of 142 gallons and 13 gallons of arrack in the Taluks of Closepet and Channapatna, respectively. While the consumption of ganja and opium in the Channapatna Taluk shows no large variation, there has been a fall of 47 seers of ganja and 2½ seers of opium in the Closepet Taluk. Under toddy, there is a decrease of 331 date trees and 62 coconut trees in the Closepet Taluk and of 144 coconut trees in Channapatna Taluk.

BARODA CO-OPERATES WITH BOMBAY PROHIBITION.

As the Government of Bombay have introduced prohibition in the Valod Mahal, and as the liquor and toddy shops of the Mahua and Vyara taluka of the Baroda State are situated on the border of the Valod Mahal, the Government of Bombay, in order to avoid smuggling of Baroda liquor and toddy into the prohibited area and also to prevent people of this prohibited area going to drink at the Baroda State shops, asked for the co-operation of the Baroda Government.

Upon this the Commissioner of Excise, Bombay and the State Excise Commissioner met on the 28th February 1939 at the Baroda Residency and after discussion decided that the Baroda Government should co-operate with the Bombay Government as shown below. The Baroda Government have accepted this.

(1) Sixteen liquor shops lying within 2 miles of the Valod Mahal border will be closed.

(2) Nineteen liquor shops which lie within 5 miles of the Valod Mahal border will be rationed.

(3) Eighteen toddy shops situated within 2 miles of the Valod Mahal border will be closed and the number of toddy shops and booths existing at present within 5 miles of the Valod Mahal border will not be increased.

(4) No new liquor or toddy shops will be opened within ten miles from the Valod Mahal border and no shops situated beyond will be moved into that area.

In case of smuggling of Baroda State liquor into the prohibited area being proved, the Baroda Government will take action to blacklist the licensees concerned.

As decided the liquor shops have been either closed or rationed from April 139, while in case of toddy shops the changes will take place from August 139.

By the above arrangement including 32 shops already agreed to be closed and 51 shops to be rationed, in all 66 shops will be closed and 70 shops rationed.

DID PROHIBITION FAIL?*

After suffering long in silence I now lift my voice to say that I am thoroughly tired of, and disgusted with, the of-repeated statement that "Prohibition failed," particularly when this statement is made by leaders, and spread over printed pages for the unthinking world to read.

If the matter is properly analyzed a different aspect is given to the whole matter.

Prohibition eliminated the saloon during its reign. It made impossible a place bearing the mark of respectability into which women could go and illustrate how some women can degrade their sex, cheapen themselves in the eyes of thinking people and lower the ideals which have been builded around womanhood during centuries. It made impossible a place where parents—they are not fathers and mothers, just parents—could take innocent and unsuspecting children and create an appetite which in later years will completely destroy thousands of them.

Prohibition eliminated all things which pertain to decency and respectability in connection with alcoholic beverages, and placed upon them the rightful stigma as a disgrace and enemy of the human race. Prohibition proclaimed alcohol as a poison, not a food.

Prohibition made it possible to attend public functions without being made conspicuous by declining to participate in the general drinking of alcoholic beverages so commonly followed today, and gave parents a feeling of security in the knowledge that instead of drinking being made easy and honourable, it was held up as law-breaking and disgraceful.

Prohibition made liquor an outlaw; classified the bootlegger and saloon keeper as law-breakers; made it unpopular among thinking people to sidestep responsibility; eliminated the guise of respectability on whole liquor business, and placed upon the whole picture the light which brought out all of its points.

On and on one could go reciting what prohibition did without exhausting the supply of material, but these things illustrate and perhaps will stir thinking.

No one who can think two thoughts the same day will suggest that prohibition did all expected of it, but why point out its failures in that which is supposedly a suggestive and educational article or speech? Let's stop thinking and speaking negatively, and direct all minds into constructive channels by pointing out the helpful features of prohibition, and outline plans which will ultimately lead to total elimination of alcoholic beverages of every kind, under every circumstance, for every person, under every condition, at all times, and in all places. Liquor cannot be controlled, guided, socialized, respectabilized, or minimized. It must be eliminated.

Prof. L. Rushbrook Williams writes in The Asiatic Review

"He adds to a lively, and occasionally malicious, pen a keen sense of humour and a certain confidence in his own judgment, which is the habitual prerogative of youth. The result is an engaging book, which tells us almost as much about Mr. Natarajan as about the places he visited and the persons he encountered."

"May well prove invaluable to other young Indians addicted with Western Wanderlust. For here they will read of the hotels he patronised, the tips he gave the porters he employed, where and what food he found, and the conclusions he sedately drew." The Times of India, Bombay.

"A pleasant souvenir of a six-months holiday which Mr. S. Natarajan spent in Europe last year. Mr. Natarajan left the shores of India on February 12, 1937 and when he set foot in Europe he found the whole Continent in a State of frenzy. The Civil war was in full swing in Spain, nervousness had gripped Naziland, Paris was getting the Exposition ready and England was all agog with excitement in view of the (then impending) Coronation of King George VI. Mr. Natarajan had plenty to see and hear during his sojourn. And he did well in taking his typewriter with him." The Hindu, Madras.

THE TRADITIONAL HOME OF THE SANDALWOOD TREE.

It is in perfumery that the greater proportion of Sandalwood Oil is employed at the present day and to discriminating buyers, such as perfumers and soap manufacturers must of necessity be, it is hardly necessary to extol the virtues of the East Indian Oil which is without equal, both as a fine perfume base and a fixative for the increasingly popular bouquets of the Oriental type. In addition it is now being used extensively, and with marked success, in the creation of some of the more delicate perfumes in which the Sandalwood odour is not required as a predominant character.

A few trials will convince the perfumer who has not taken full advantage of the odour-value of this oil, that is of the greatest use to him, not only for predominant Sandalwood odour where required, but also a modifier and a fixative for other odours. This is true for liquid perfumes, soaps, creams, powders and all other cosmetic preparations. It will be found invaluable to those up-to-date perfumers who pride themselves on their own "creations."

NOTES.

Sir S. Radhakrishnan in South Africa:—We reprint from Indian Opinion the address which Sir S. Radhakrishnan broadcasted from Natal on the eve of his departure from South Africa where he spent three weeks on a lecture tour. The address breathes the right spirit in which the problem of Indians in South Africa and other countries where they are not as yet treated as full citizens, should be approached. Sir Sarvapalli met the leading public men, Ministers, Professors, publicists, and he bears testimony to their goodwill and broadmindedness. He was welcomed wherever he went and there was not a trace of race arrogance in the reception accorded to him throughout the country. Indian Opinion, which is generally more discriminating in its praise than its blame, writes in terms of warm appreciation of the impressions left by Sir Sarvapalli. What is more, it pledges itself and the Indian community to make an effort "to imbibe the spirit which he has tried to infuse into us." What is that spirit? It is, as we understand it, that Indians, while not relaxing their efforts to secure citizenship rights, should in every way possible avoid hurting the susceptibilities of the White men among whom Sir Radhakrishnan found many who have a vivid sense of their duty to bring about a radical change of policy in race relations. Much misunderstanding and prejudice is the consequence of the careless use of words. The strongest differences of opinion may be expressed in words which do not leave a sting behind. Sir Radhakrishnan himself is a master of this art. He has never concealed or minimised wrongs wherever he found them but his words have always been carefully chosen so as to convince without irritating. Even in India where language has been cherished as a divine gift—the misuse of a single word was censured as a heinous sin—our leaders have not all learnt the art of persuasive speech. In South Africa there are perhaps less opportunities of cultivating this gift, though Indians there have had the benefit of the example of such supreme exponents of it as Gokhale, Gandhiji, Srinivasa Sastry and, now, Sir Sarvapalli Radhakrishnan. We lay stress on this point as we have felt that the unguarded words of leaders from overseas, have sometimes needlessly aggravated the task of conciliation.

Palestine:—The British Government's proposals on Palestine which were made known through a White Paper on Wednesday evening, are the surest indication that the possibilities of war breaking out are exceedingly remote. The reform scheme is one calculated to antagonise both Jews and Arabs. The Government have at last made up their minds to break openly their promises to both the Jews and the Arabs and this is made clear in a sentence which phrases it as the rejection of claims. Palestine is promised independence in ten years, unless circumstances require a postponement. In that event a conference between Palestinians, the League of Nations, the neighbouring Arab States and the British Government will first consider the position. In the meantime, the British Government will administer the country associating in its work both Jew and Arab so as to ensure the safeguarding of all sections of Palestinians. Jewish immigration will be allowed for the next five years at a rate which will limit its population to a third of the total. A quota of 10,000 a year has been fixed, with an extra 25,000 allowed as a contribution to the Jewish refugee problem. After five years, further Jewish immigration will only be with the consent of the Arabs. If one considers the fact that between 1933 and 1936, 1,75,000 Jews came into Palestine, the quota fixed by the British Government seems reasonable. These figures, however, have never been equalled in the past and they were the result of Europe's intolerance. It is hard that the Arabs should be asked to pay for this. If there can be any assurance that the British will regard the present ten-year transition as more binding than the other promises she has made in Palestine, and that she will not manipulate the "circumstances," the Arabs might well accept the scheme. At any rate it offers for the first time a basis of negotiation in which the future of Palestine as an Independent State is the accepted centre. This is a gain to the Arabs.

Widows' Homes in the U. P. :—The Government of the United Provinces have published the text of a Bill to provide for the control of Hindu Widows' Homes in the U. P. The control of institutions intended for the education and protection of Hindu widows, is a very necessary measure not only in the United Provinces but all over India; and we welcome this essential piece of legislation. The Bill provides both for the registration of all such homes and for its regulation through advisory committees with a one-third personnel of women on them and through Inspectors, "as far as possible women," set up by the provincial Government. In certain respects, however, the Bill might well be improved. We would like to see a wider application of the principles of the Bill. All women's institutions—as, for instance, rescue homes and orphanages—suffer from the same dangers as the ones which the Government seeks to mitigate and all are entitled to the same protection. The Government should frame its Bill for all widows' homes not only Hindu. In such a measure it is advisable for all communities to be brought into its operation, both in the penalties for infringement and in enforcing the beneficient proposals. The last clause in the section defining the power of the Provincial Government to regulate the institutions, has apparently crept in by mistake: "Rules regarding the standard of moral purity required of the inmates of the Widows' Home." The evil against which legislation is sought, is not the bad morals of the inmates but the frequent laxity of the staff. The Bill itself carries the mark of this intention.

Liberals and Prohibition :—The attitude of the Liberal Party towards the Prohibition measures adopted by the several Congress Governments is aptly described by the phrase "willing to wound yet afraid to strike." At the meeting of the Committee of the Liberal Federation held in Bombay on the 30th April, more than one speaker attacked these measures but in the resolutions passed no reference is made to Prohibition. Congress Governments were blamed for sacrificing revenue which might be spent on social reforms. Prohibition is the greatest of social reforms and money spent on it, which is the same as the revenue sacrificed by it, is social reform expenditure. The argument that the introduction of Prohibition should be spread over a number of years, comes with ill grace from Liberals. When Excise was a Transferred Department, Sir Chunilal Mehta whose colleagues were hard-boiled Liberals, initiated a scheme for the introduction of Prohibition in twenty years. The Rev. J. F. Edwards in his valuable contribution published in the Reformer of April 1, referred to it in terms of high appreciation. In the few years that it was in force it produced remarkable results. But the next Ministers reversed the policy. A scheme which does not provide for the introduction of Prohibition outright, stands in danger of being scrapped by a new Ministry. In the present condition a plea for delay is a plea for abandonment. The Liberals have done themselves no service by taking up an attitude of obstruction to such a vital social reform. The concern for financial prudence professed by them in regard to Prohibition, might have saved the Bombay Presidency several crores of wasteful expenditure which still hangs like a deadweight upon it, if it had been exhibited by the Liberals who, as Members of the Executive Councils and Ministers, controlled the administration which conceived and carried out the Back Bay Reclamation scheme, the Worli scheme of "warehousing" workers, as Patrick Geddes called it, and the Sukkur Barrage. The money spent on these schemes is as good as lost, while Prohibition fits perfectly the Gladstonian maxim that wealth best fructifies when left in the pockets of the people.

Claims of Nira:—Inspirational politics by its very nature swings from one extreme to another. Some years ago the cutting down of toddy trees suggested itself to Gandhiji as the quickest and most direct way of stopping drink. Hundreds of khadi clad volunteers fared forth axe on shoulder, to cut down the unoffending trees. The Reformer protested against the vandalism among other reasons as fostering the instinct of destruction which is a part of our animal heritage exemplified in the impulse of children to pull to pieces anything which comes to their hands, a flower, a butterfly. We do not know when this programme was given up. Anyhow Gandhiji now advocates not the cutting down of toddy trees but the extraction from them of nira, the juice of the tree before it ripens into fruit. The drinking of nira is recommended not as a concession to those habituated to toddy. It is advocated as a sort of panacea for various ills, as the result of the experience of several people living in the hothouse atmosphere of Shegaon. When Prohibition began to be discussed as within the range of practical politics, the late Dr. D'Monte, in order to demonstrate the virtues of nira, sent this writer a foaming glass of it one early morning, along with a sprouting coconut, both delicacies which he recommended as nira. Within a few minutes of its arrival the nira announced its presence by filling the room with its foul odour and it had to be returned to the kindly donor with apologies. In the light of this experience, there is no need to advise any one who has not acquired a nose for the fluid, not to take to it even as a medicine. As a matter of fact, we have heard the virtues claimed for nira, claimed with equal conviction for ass's milk. The administrative difficulties in the way of Prohibition will be immeasurably enhanced by the spread of the nira cult, which is sure to result if trees are allowed to be tapped.

In their efforts to this end they do not mind adopting methods which kill what they want to save, the Soul of India. Gandhiji has a true view of the end but his methods are virtually those of the politicians. Only he calls them non-violent but in essence they are the same. India's most constraining need today is to secure free access to the International Round Table. With all her great spiritual and cultural heritage, she counts for nothing in international affairs while the independence of little Lithuania and even less Albania seem just now to be of deep concern to the great Democratic and Dictator Powers. This on the face of it is an anomaly which can not last. Whoever may hold the carcase of India, her soul will find fulfilment in helping its world in the quest of Peace. There is talk of Asiatic movements to counter the European. Gandhiji has rightly expressed the Indian mind when he told a correspondent some days ago that India can not view world problems, as questions of geography. The Indian soul can find repose only when the unity behind the diverse races, creeds, countries and continents, becomes the basis of world polity. Dreamer? Yes, but the dreamer of today is the prophet of tomorrow. India may adopt for herself Francis Thompson's lines in his "Poppy:"

I hang 'mid men my needless head,
And my fruit is dreams, as theirs is bread;
The goodly men and the sun-hazed sleeper
Time shall reap, but after the reaper
The world shall glean of me, me the sleeper.

The Arya Samaj:—The Additional City Magistrate of Lucknow passed orders on the 11th May on a case which has been occupying him several months. In it a Zemindar of the United Provinces was prosecuted by a Mr. Tewari for seducing his wife. The woman was Christian by birth. Her name was Blanche Edwards. She, it was alleged, was converted and married to Tewari under the Arya Marriage Act. The Magistrate said he felt great doubts as to the validity of the marriage.

"I further hold," he added, "that the lady was not induced by Tewari for the sake of having her as his 'sahagini' (inseparable portion of the body) but was induced for dishonourable objects. She was encouraged to defriend others."

The Magistrate based his order of acquittal on the ground that Tewari and the woman were trying to blackmail the Zamindar. He added that the conduct and the life which the evidence on record had proved to have been led by Tewari and the woman, was despicable and dishonourable. We have called attention in these columns to other anomalies to which the Arya Marriage has given rise. No authoritative statement has been issued as to the exact views held and enforced at the present day by the Arya Samaj. Apart from this, we should like to know what the Arya Samaj stands for today, whether and how far it retains its original character of a religious movement or whether it is now only a secular movement carrying on political propaganda in the name of Hinduism.

THE GANDHI-BOSE LETTERS.

To appreciate the implications of the recently released correspondence between Mr. Subhas Bose and Gandhiji, one has to go back to the Congress session at Tripuri out of which the necessity for these negotiations arose. The Congress at Tripuri adopted a resolution directing its then President, Mr. Bose, to form his Working Committee on the advice of Gandhiji. It definitely laid down that the Committee should have the confidence of Gandhiji. Pandit Govind Vallabh Pant in moving the resolution, declared that, unless the Congress adopted it, Gandhiji would not give his guidance and support to the Congress. Nor was this all. A United Press message from Tripuri, hitherto uncontradicted, ran as follows:

> Mr. C. Rajagopalachariar had telephonic talks with Gandhiji and secured his approval to the text of Pandit G. B. Pant's resolution. Accordingly it has been decided not to accept any amendments.

Mr. Rajagopalachariar's own speech on March 10, the day of this message, ended with a solemn appeal to the session to adopt the resolution. He said:

> .....Mr. Bose will get the fullest co-operation from Mahatma Gandhi which is at the moment lacking. I, therefore, advise you to reject all amendments except verbal ones and pass the original resolution.

Reports of messages arriving by special messenger from Rajkot where Gandhiji was at the time, to Right-wing leaders at Tripuri also supported the belief that the sponsors of the resolution were in close touch with Gandhiji. The first surprise, therefore, in the present correspondence is Gandhiji's definite statement that he had nothing to do with it, that he had only seen it first at Allahabad a week after the Congress and more emphatic still, "Pandit Pant's resolution I cannot interpret. The more I study it, the more I dislike it." The full meaning of this revelation in the letters has been grasped by few. It means nothing less than this, that Gandhiji has found out a gulf between himself and the Right-wing itself.

The realisation of the failure of those nearest to him to understand his point of view, it can be well imagined, is the cause of Gandhiji's depressed tone in this entire correspondence. There are few exchanges of letters between public men which could yield as little result as the correspondence between Mr. Subhas Chandra Bose and Gandhiji. Mr. Bose was directed by the Pant resolution at Tripuri to name his Working Committee in consultation with Gandhiji. Naturally, therefore, his letters are devoted to the purpose of getting the nominations from Gandhiji and also at a later stage to recommend his pet scheme of a national ultimatum to Britain. Gandhiji, however, has other things in his mind and he invariably answers the most pressing entreaties with his conclusions on the prevalence of corruption and violence within the Congress. In fact, in view of his repeated stress on corruption, it is well to bear in mind what Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru has recently pointed out, that Gandhiji means something quite different to what is usually understood by corruption. "I see no atmosphere," writes Gandhiji in one of his letters, "of non-violent mass action... I have the firm belief that the Congress as it is today, cannot deliver the goods, cannot offer civil disobedience worth the name." Gandhiji does not state his reasons for this belief but on the strength of it alone, he justifies his call to satyagrahis in the States to cease the struggle as well as his rejection of Mr. Bose's own appeal to Gandhiji to launch a movement against Britain after delivering the British Government an ultimatum. It is not unlikely that Mr. Bose felt himself in the position of the young Chinese Communist Marshal who held General Chiang Kai-shek prisoner and persuaded him to fight the Japanese. But the differences in the position are greater than the similarities. For one thing both Gandhiji and Mr. Bose operate in much the same territory and for another the British are already in the saddle. Gandhiji has declared in these letters categorically that he will not take the responsibility of plunging the country into civil disobedience. The weapon of violence was laid aside from the outset; now the supreme weapon of non-violence is deliberately rejected. The meaning of this is plain and we can appreciate Mr. Bose's distress as he realises that nothing is left except constitutionalism. The Parliamentary mentality, said Gandhiji two years ago, has come to stay, and Gandhiji has no intention of throwing his weight on the side of those who wish to disturb it.

Mr. Bose is in the awkward position of a revolutionary who finds that one whom he regards as his master, is not prepared to accept the logical extreme of his own theories. As he rightly remarks in his letters he sees no difference between his cherished ultimatum to Britain and the many other ultimata delivered by Gandhiji in the past. He also fails to see how British Indians with the experience they have gained from past struggles could be declared unfit for mass action while inexperienced satyagrahis like Rajkot agitators launch on civil disobedience. We would have expected the obvious rejoinder to this that inexperience is a valued asset in satyagraha but Gandhiji takes another line. He reminds Mr. Bose that he has already called off civil disobedience in all Indian States. Mr. Bose has obviously been bewildered by the sudden depression of Gandhiji and, considering the circumstances, he is to be congratulated on the firmness he has shown in enunciating his point of view. He regards every action of Gandhiji's which is not connected with the Congress as a waste of time, a digression from the main issue of winning independence. Not so long ago the Right-wing and even Gandhiji himself were convinced, that if they sought Independence first all else would be added unto them. Now it is difficult to say whether they wish to extend their activities further afield—in the States for example; or to intensify their work within the party by eradicating corruption. Both these ideals are regarded by Mr. Bose today as they were by the others recently, as so many distractions. Start the anti-imperialist war, he says, and it will be the best antidote to corruption. "Our only sanction," he proceeds, "is non-violent mass action and deprived of it we have to fall back on a purely moderate policy or your vicarious self-sacrifice." But can Congress fall back on a moderate policy?

For, if Gandhiji has left the revolutionaries in despair, he does not lighten the burden of the Right-wing leaders who are now in control of the organisation with any great hope. On the contrary, if, as he says, the Congress cannot deliver the goods by civil disobedience which is their own perfected weapon, can the public expect them to do so by constitutionalism which they accept, when they do, but half-heartedly? If Gandhiji thinks that the Congress cannot "deliver the goods" unless it is first purified of corruption, the sooner he indicates the lines on which it should be reformed the earlier the country can settle down to something. For our part, we fail to see how the Congress has grown worse than it was in the past or in what way, except as a consequence of civil disobedience, it has acquired new evils. The Congress is like all political parties a combination of good and evil. It does not inure to political stability to praise its good points one day inordinately and to run down the whole organisation later as a hotbed of corruption. The present confessional mood is a reaction and, though it has resulted in the discomfiture of a leader of the calibre of Mr. Subhas Chandra Bose, it might well mark the conclusion of an eventful chapter in Indian politics. If Gandhiji's statements are to be taken literally, they would mean that the Right-wing Congress is prepared to recede far behind what the Liberals have laid down as the limits of constitutional reform. It would mean nothing less than complete surrender.

More Paradox :—In a leading article last week we referred to the paradox of the great increase in the wealth of Great Britain—the nation is richer than it was twenty years ago, said Sir John Simon—and the post-war depression symbolised by the steady stream of unemployment and the phenomenal growth of national expenditure, necessitating the abandonment of the gold standard and default on the War debt to the United States. Lord Baldwin, lecturing at Toronto some days ago, has further deepened the paradox. "There is proceeding in England today," he said, "a material rearmament and a spiritual rearmament. We are looking to the defence of body and soul. The multiplication of ships and guns you can tabulate; what cannot be scheduled is the searching of heart which is going on among our people. Once more they are going over the fundamentals of their faith and asking questions which go to the root of the matter."

policies. Healthy and informed legislation should be preceded by factual knowledge as a result of careful enquiry, but this normal procedure has been conspicuously absent in Madras though, of course, there are exceptions.

The inference is irresistible from certain facts which are known to the public here that the Ministry is unwilling to consider those engaged in the teaching profession as full-blown citizens entitled to the exercise of their rights. One can understand restrictions being placed on government servants in regard to taking active part in politics and in joining associations. Any such conscious diminution of liberty of teachers in private employ is indefensible and improper, but attempts have been made to impose restrictive conditions which cannot possibly advance the true interest of education. Teachers are not more automata serving an authoritarian regime. Their usefulness in their own sphere would very much depend upon the extent to which they take part in social and political activities around them under suitable safeguards such as those which are in existence and which are recognised to be necessary in Western Democracies. Recently, there has been quite a stir among the teaching profession in regard to certain orders passed by the Government upon these and other allied subjects.

Under Dr. Subbaroyan's administration, however, there was no positive act of discourtesy towards teachers which called for protest on their part except that as mentioned above, the general policy was defective in many particulars. Under the present regime however, things are happening which are bound to create grave misunderstanding between the teachers and the Government with the inevitable sequel that progress in this important field of public activity is likely to be jeopardised. Not many months ago, Mr. C. J. Varkey, the Minister for Education, indulged at the Provincial Educational Conference in the capital of the Presidency in very objectionable language threatening teachers with condign punishment they did this or if they did that and deprecating their resort to newspapers. He seemed to think that so far as education is concerned, he was Lord of all he surveyed and none should dispute his decision. For a wonder, he mentioned a particular teacher who wrote in the leading Indian newspaper and said in language which is unprintable that he would not be influenced by such tactics. The newspaper concerned out of magnanimity to the erring Minister did not publish the offensive remarks, but the whole audience heard him utter this stuff and at a later meeting the Conference placed on record its regret that the Minister should have referred to the particular teacher and to the particular newspaper.

There is some apprehension that the Ministry's attitude towards higher education in the universities is not altogether friendly. Not many months ago, it would appear, the Government seriously considered the desirability of persuading the universities to prescribe a rule prohibiting their staff from criticising the acts or policies of the Government in such a manner as was likely to make the relation with the public difficult. One does not know the subsequent developments of this dangerous move. Perhaps the idea has been abandoned, but it shows the trend of ideas entertained by the Government as regards the place of teachers in the body politic. If this had been all alone, no positive harm would have resulted, but the part taken by the present Education Minister in regard to the affairs of the Annamalai University has given rise to serious trouble. Mr. Varkey, desiring to know at first hand what was happening in Annamalainagar, went to the place and delivered a lecture to the students and the staff at the end of which, in his peroration, he told the audience that if a settlement was not arrived at dirty linen would have to be washed in public and if the matter happened to be discussed on the floor of the Assembly, then as he was Minister for Education, he would have to play a different role. What was this but an improper and utterly disgusting interference with an autonomous body. The trouble by the students had just previous to the visit shown indications of abating, but, Mr. Varkey's admonition, ill-timed and ill-considered, revived the hopes of the erring students and created the impression that the University was being compelled by the Minister to admit all the students who had been punished in some form or another. It is unnecessary and undesirable to relate at great length the history of subsequent events. Suffice it to say that immediately after a communique press was issued calculated to remove the misapprehensions that might have been caused in the public mind by this unwise and mischievous utterance. The University authorities, be it said to the credit of the Government, were left unmolested and free to arrive at their own decision. But the Minister's advent to Annamalainagar had a sequel. That part of his speech at the University extending a threat to the authorities was not published in the newspapers, but the audience heard it and the staff was naturally greatly perturbed by the tone and contents of the utterance. The Professors and teachers met at a formal meeting and adopted a resolution regretting that the Minister should have behaved in the manner he did and indulged in language which cannot but prejudicially effect the prestige of the teachers and the University and render the maintenance of discipline extremely difficult. The other day, the Minister announced that one of the reforms which the Government had in contemplation was the revision of the Acts governing the work of the universities. No details as to the changes were given, but one can only hope that the autonomy and the independence of the universities would not be affected, that the universities would be previously invited to express their views as regard the proposed changes and that nothing would be done to affect the wishes of the founders so long as proper steps are taken to run the institutions on efficient lines. It is good to have a giant's strength but that strength should be utilised for beneficial purposes.

THE MISSION TO LEPERS.

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

Together with many another College young man, I have for long been influenced by what you write about, and infer to be the correct attitude to the Britisher, Christian Missions, Rajahs, etc.

Several years ago, something however happened that began to change my mind with regard to the correctness of your reasoning and information in some instances.

This is what happened. While practising at the court house one evening, a doctor friend began looking me over rather closely and said that I looked as though I had leprosy and should be examined. This I did, and his diagnosis was found to be correct. For a long time no one seemed to realize that anything was wrong, or at least said nothing about it. Then my patches rather suddenly began to grow, and the first thing I knew I was looked at askance by my friends and practically put out of the house by my relatives.

Upon inquiry I was told that the best Leper Asylums were in the hands of Christian Missions. To go to one of these prosyletizing factories, however, did not appeal to me at all after all that you had written about Missions. Not having any other place to go to, I was almost forced to take refuge there however.

Entering this leper settlement out in the district was a feeling that I will never be able to forget. I was given a neat little house with two rooms. There was running water, septic tank, a garden, and everything else that was necessary. The very day I arrived, the doctor came to see me. Quite contrary to my expectation he did not say anything about being a Christian, nor did he ever after during the whole time I was there. The effect of his visit will ever remain. He was a young European that reminded me of an incarnation. His English was faultless. For an hour he took time to talk to me about everything under the sun. His kindliness, his sympathy, his understanding, his humility, his joy and his clear cut answers to all my anxious questions, left no doubt in my mind but that this was a man that knew what he was talking about. And he was. During my stay there I was to see that Governments from different parts of the world were sending their experts to this young man in order to learn from him. He received enough offers for big jobs during the course of the year to make any plain human being envious, and yet in spite of it all, he remained here with us lepers where he was getting a mere pittance, even feeding us at times from his own kitchen.

I had heard that there was also a European nurse in the settlement, but some days passed before I had my first interview with her. And the way that happened was funny. One morning quite early a young lady came in, talked to me for a short time, and then put her hand on my shoulder saying "Don't worry, you will be all right in two years." Then when I complained about a sore she opened the bandage with her own hands, and had a look. I realized that she was no ordinary nurse, but it was not until that evening that I found out that it was the European nurse that had been to see me that morning. When I realized that this young lady had done what none of my relatives would do, tears came unbidden to my eyes.

There was a beautiful church within the settlement, but I had decided to keep my distance. Many a Sunday morning I had stood at the door listening to the singing and other music, but had vowed never to be caught in this proselyting net. Yet one beautiful morning I assured myself that there would be nothing wrong in going in and having a look. I went and in some ways was conquered. Everyone was so reverent, the church so beautiful, and the service positively touching. The speaker spoke about finding your life by loosing it. If any one ever had a right to speak about this aspect of life I was sure that they had. I wandered off in mind and thought of what had happened to that little laughing nurse. When I first knew her she was a plump little thing, but before the hot season was over, she looked like a faded rose. Looking at all these maggot infected leprous sores, had turned her stomach. For weeks she could not eat. At times she sank down while at work for sheer faintness. We asked her what was wrong and she smiled and said "Nothing." Many a time her leper friends united to pray to God for her. She stuck to her post, and finally conquered, but only after a terrible struggle.

And now I am back home again well and hearty. Just by looking at me no one would suspect what happened to me, but the experiences at this Christian Leper Asylum will ever remain a blessed memory. At heart of course I am a Christian. I do not suppose it would be possible to be anything else after the experience I have had.

You will now understand why it is that I can no more so joyfully assent when you go to such pains to throw mud at Christian movements, in fact it pains me, and I cannot help but offering a silent prayer for you whenever I find these bitter remarks so often made in ignorance. Purity and sacrifice and kindness just cannot be eradicated by covering them with impurity, unkindness and unloviness.

I realize that this is quite contrary to the kind of thing you are in the habit of printing in your paper, and for that reason I have waited for a long time before sending it in. I trust that you will, however, publish it, if for no other reason than to give the experiences of one of your fellow men who has come to different conclusions than you have.

Calcutta,
May 8, 1939. } Yours etc.
P. GHOSE.

[We were no more responsible for Mr. Ghose's old undiscriminating prejudice against all Christian movements in general including the Mission to Lepers whose excellent work we have always recognised, than we are now for his equally undiscriminating enthusiasm for all Christian movements. For instance, The Reformer of December 18, 1937, in the first few lines of a note on "The Mission to Lepers" wrote: "The Reformer has felt obliged to criticise the proselyting activities of foreign Christian Missions as they aim at destroying the spiritual heritage of the people in which alone their religious life can find root and sustenance. The Mission to Lepers, however, is an expression of pure humanitarianism untainted by any ulterior motive. Neither Hinduism nor Islam has anything comparable to show and, so long as this is the case, Christianity must be allowed precedence from a purely humanitarian point of view."—Ed., I. S. R.].

NOTES.

Satyagraha and the British Government :—In the course of an article "If War Came" in the Indian Review, Sir P. Sivaswami Aiyar incidentally remarks: "It is not realised that such success as may be ascribed to the policy (satyagraha) is due to the fact that he (Mr. Gandhi) had to deal with the British Government which, of all European nations, is the most sensitive to the public opinion of the world and to the nobler instincts of humanity." Although Gandhiji advocates it as of universal application, neither he nor any one else has tried it in any other country. The instances given by Mr. De Ligt and Mr. Gregg have no analogy to the Gandhian creed. Even in India, when undertaking a fast in an Indian State, Gandhiji took care to see that the Governor-General was previously informed and kept informed of it from day to day. He did not trust the Thakore Saheb or Mr. Viravala to respond to the appeal of his satyagraha. As for others, no one, so far as we know, has succeeded in achieving anything by satyagraha outside British India. Even in British India, Gandhiji is about the only person whose satyagraha evokes public concern. A Congress Minister is reported to have observed, when it was brought to his notice that a person who had a grievance had undertaken a fast unto death at his door, that he could not think of interfering with the latter's civil right in the matter of eating and that, if he chose to keep it up to the end, it was his own business. Gandhiji himself left the misguided satyagrahis to their own devices at Wardha and left on his tour in Northern India. There was less excitement about his Rajkot fast in the country than about his fast on the Communal Award, due partly to the belief that as in this as on previous occasions the fast will not be prolonged to the bitter end. Sir Sivaswami Aiyar's observation needs to be qualified. It is not in every case that the British Government out of regard for world opinion and their own instinctive humanity respond to satyagraha. The case of Terence McSweeney, Mayor of Cork who died by fasting in a British prison, will readily occur to students of contemporary history. They have also an interest in intervening in Gandhiji's case. They fear that, if Gandhiji goes, the Indian national movement would be difficult to control and that with the present international complications the means of control available to them may prove inadequate.

Sense of Proportion :—Speaking at the Gandhi Seva Sangh at Brindaban (Bihar), Gandhiji is reported to have declared that "those who do not wear or did not encourage it (khadi), did not deserve to live in India." These at present would mean three-fourths of the population. In what non-violent manner they are to be expatriated, if not exterminated, will no doubt be revealed in due course. The Madras Prime Minister, according to the Associated Press, said in the course of a speech on his return from Calcutta that so long as Mahatma Gandhi was alive, no party other than the Congress could function successfully and be of material benefit to the country. The Hindu report substitutes "at the helm" for the word "alive." This does not make much difference because so long as Gandhiji is alive he will be at the helm of the Congress, though the helm itself might fail to respond to the helmsman or the helmsman's hand might lose its cunning. The other day Mr. K. M. Munshi thought it necessary to proclaim that Gandhiji was not a spent force. Mr. Rajagopala Charya does the same in more strident language in Madras. Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel is no less eager to asseverate that Gandhiji's leadership will endure. Do they understand that their overzeal has an effect exactly opposite to that which they seek to produce? If Gandhiji's authority is as unquestioned as it was, where is the need for these trumpetings? Are they afraid that recent happenings may lead Whitehall to believe that their group is no longer able to deliver the goods and to turn for co-operation to some other group?

Devadasis and Dancing :—The Cochin correspondent of the Indian Express (Madras) reports that an agitation is carried on by two sections of the Devadasi community in the State for restoring the practice of their dancing during the festivals in the Mattencheri Tirumala Devaswom Temple. This custom was discontinued a year ago on the recommendation of an Advisory Temple Committee. The correspondent says that the two sections of Devadasis contend that dancing is the birthright of their community and that it is their duty by virtue of their dedication to render such service in conformity with time-honoured usage. The opponents and supporters of this claim, it is added, intend to place their respective viewpoints before the authorities. Some time back the Hindu reported that at a meeting of the leaders of the Devadasi caste in the East Coast, it was urged that, now that Indian dancing as a fine art has obtained world-wide recognition and that amateurs are flocking to the South to learn it at first hand, their girls who have inherited the physical and psychological aptitudes for the Art, should themselves take the lead in the movement. The girls should marry in their community and thus get rid of the incident of promiscuity which had become associated with their profession. There was unanimity on both these points at the meeting. The anti-nautch movement was started fifty years ago because there was then no way of separating the practice of music and dancing from that of leading the life of a courtesan. Things have greatly changed. It is quite possible now to effect the separation. The Cochin Devadasis' demand may be conceded on condition that they abandoned the role of courtesans.

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

A Pledge for Prohibition Volunteers :—An old temperance verse runs somewhat as follows,

> There is a little public house
> That everyone can close;
> It is the little public house
> That lies beneath your nose.

This has a useful suggestion for all Governments which work for Prohibition. In spite of the legislative zeal shown by Congress Governments for Prohibition, the party seems extremely reluctant to enforce on its members an abstinence pledge. This omission is particularly glaring in the pledge drawn up for volunteers of the Prohibition Guards of Bombay City. The pledge requires the volunteer to believe in absolute Prohibition as essential for the moral, social and economic uplift of the nation; non-violence, obedience to competent authorities; readiness to resign at the request of the Prohibition Board—all relating to opinion rather than conduct. But surely a volunteer who believes in total Prohibition as good for the nation, might regard it as an intolerable restraint on himself. We can understand someone adopting the attitude that pledges do not in any way improve the position. But it is difficult to see why when there is a pledge for volunteers, it should studiously evade any mention of abstinence. What the volunteer believes is unimportant. What he does is a public concern. We trust the Board will repair this omission.

Hooliganism at Public Meetings :— Somewhat like the man who after arguing the innocuousness of "one little drink" ends up drunk at a cocktail party, were the ugly scenes which the anti-Prohibitionists staged at the Cowasji Jehangir Hall on Monday and Tuesday when Col. Ghadiali, who has just returned from the U. S. A. tried to address a Prohibition meeting. It is a long journey from the Jame Jamshed's appeal to us in the name of temperance to give up Prohibition, to the war-cries raised by some Parsi youngmen at the meeting, "Long live toddy," and so on. But that is the length the anti-Prohibitionists have travelled. Few who oppose Prohibition as an unwarranted interference with personal liberty can support the tactics of the demonstrators. The cause of the trouble, we believe, was the simple fact that a member of their community should have dared to support Prohibition. We congratulate Col. Ghadiali on the courage he has shown. On both occasions the two Ministers who presided showed almost exemplary patience in handling the situation. It is unfortunate that some distinguished citizens of Bombay have sought to divert the agitation against Prohibition into communal channels. Every effort should be made on the other side to keep the issues clear and unclouded by prejudice.

Foreign Money :—Referring to Mr. Subhas Bose's supporters as a "frustrated party of violence," the Statesman of Calcutta hints at things which it lacks the courage evidently to say directly. It writes:

> As things stand today, such a party is principally an object of hope and interest to the agents of those in Berlin and Rome who have their own plans for India's future. The comments of the Berlin press make no secret of Nazi hopes and backing for the Bengal dissentients, and that money is passing to promote propaganda for the cause of the enemies of Britain in time of war is known.

The Statesman's rather general knowledge is not very profound seeing that creating trouble among the territories of a possible enemy country is not a new thing nor is it known only to Nazis. What we would like to hear it say definitely is if it knows for certain that Nazi money has been paid to Indian politicians and whether they are Bengal dissentients or not. If it does, it owes a duty to the public to print the facts. The public knows what value to attach to innuendoes of this kind.

Indian Troops Abroad :—In the article by Mr. J. M. Ganguli which we published last week, some questions relating to the propriety of Indian troops being used in protecting the interests of the Empire in China or in Africa, are discussed. Mr. Ganguli, strange to say, has missed one important point: That the use of Indian troops in this manner earns Indians as a people a bad name abroad. Some of the anti-Indian feeling in Burma is due to the part played by Indian troops in putting down the Burmese. The line dividing defence and insidious furtherance of imperial interests is vague at all times. In troubled days it almost completely disappears. That Indian troops have been the spearhead of imperialist encroachment does no good to India.

Child Welfare :—The League of Nations has justified as an institution for preserving world peace. It has, however, done creditable service in promoting social welfare. One of its recent publications is a pamphlet giving summaries of the work, legislative and administrative, in several countries on behalf of Child Welfare. India, sad to say, is not one of them. Of recent years there has been much talk of Child Welfare in this country and some work too is being done. Several laws have been passed in the provinces to advance the health and well-being of children. But having regard to the vast population of India, what has been done so far is but a drop in the ocean. If provincial Governments do not dissipate their strength in a dozen directions without any attempt at co-ordination, and if they concentrated them on social welfare much more can be achieved. In no civilised country are children so ill-fed, ill-clad and ill-cared for as in India, notwithstanding that in no country are people so fond of children as in this.

Scandinavia :—The Scandinavian countries, Norway, Sweden and Denmark, where European civilisation has survived uninfected by the predatory, grasping spirit which has blasted it elsewhere, have decided not to take sides in the quarrel between the so-called democratic and totalitarian groups. They will adopt precautions to safeguard their independence, without entangling alliances with any others. Experience shows that if a country can not defend herself unaided, she has to go under the domination of a stronger power, either express or implicit. The Scandinavians have declined the offers of Britain and the United States to guarantee their independence. They say that they have no designs on other countries and they do not expect any country to have designs on them. A guarantee means that there is some one round the corner ready to rob them. To entertain the suspicion is to invite the certainty. Then, again who will guarantee the guarantors? Avowedly, the guarantors are themselves in fear of aggression and by guaranteeing others' independence they are seeking to secure their own. By the way, Great Britain has been profuse in her guarantees in Europe. How is she going to carry them out if there is a War? The Dominions will not send their men and they have not many men to send. Great Britain will need all the men she can recruit even under conscription. She will have hardly enough men to spare even for India which is a vital link in the Empire highway. Japan which patrolled the Indian Ocean in the last war, may not undertake the job again. The denunciation of the Anglo-Japanese Treaty under pressure of the United States, must have taught her a useful lesson. Mr. Chamberlain may advise the countries which he has guaranteed, as he advised Czechoslovakia, to make terms directly with the aggressor. If the guarantees mean anything more, it is difficult to see how they are to be implemented.

Japan Stands Back:—In our leading article last week we pointed out that Japan's position with the Rome-Berlin Axis is a precarious one and that at any moment she might be let down by the two European Powers if they can make a good bargain with another European Power or with the United States. This possibility seems to have struck the shrewd Japanese statesmen and they have evidently been considering for some time past, what their attitude should be towards the European rival groups in the best interests of their own country. A Reuter's message from Tokyo dated the 5th May says that a Japanese Foreign Office Spokesman declined to comment on the rumour regarding a military alliance between Japan, Germany and Italy. He said, however,

> Japan has its own independent foreign policy which, as enunciated by the Premier and Foreign Minister from time to time antagonises neither the democratic camp nor the totalitarian bloc. It aims at the maintenance and promotion of friendly relations with all foreign powers.

This is the sane and sensible attitude for an Asiatic Power to take at the present time. The antagonism between the democratic group and the totalitarian bloc is a wholly European affair. Japan is neither a democratic nor a totalitarian State. Force of circumstances alone has made her put on the armour of militarism. We expect that Japanese statesmen will soon adopt measures to establish a good understanding with China and help the latter in a disinterested spirit to rebuild her social and political life on the firm foundation of her national genius and culture. A day or two later the Japanese Foreign Minister named the Japanese way as "the Imperial way." What this precisely is, we shall know in time.

Mr. Chamberlain and Russia :—Mr. Chamberlain has peculiar ideas of negotiating a pact. In the House of Commons on Friday replying to a suggestion that he should make personal contact with Russian leaders, Mr. Chamberlain peevishly exclaimed, "Perhaps Mr. Gallacher will suggest with whom I should make personal contact. Personalities change rather rapidly." The reference to M. Litvinoff was as inappropriate as it was in bad taste, since he has been handling Soviet foreign policy for over ten years. If, as the British press assures us, the Soviet policy is not going to change with the change of ministers, M. Stalin might well retort to Mr. Chamberlain that it is better to have one policy and several ministers than to have one minister and several policies ranging from appeasement to collective security. A Polish view of the present European situation is that it is a trial of nerves; whoever stands the tension longest is likely to win. It is easy to see that the British Premier has begun to feel the strain. Otherwise he would have hesitated to indulge in cheap gibes at a time when, as he himself tells his Parliament twice a week, delicate negotiations are on hand.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER
BOMBAY, May 13, 1939.

THE BRITISH PARADOX.

Sir John Simon, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, speaking at the Bankers' Association on May 8, declared that Britain was undoubtedly richer than it was 20 years ago. This is, indeed, a paradox. Great Britain spent hundreds of millions on the last war. She spent and is still spending millions on measures necessitated by the War. The last thing which one would expect in the circumstances is to see the national income swelling enormously. The Economist in an illuminating analysis of the British Budget, brings together valuable statistics bearing on British national income and expenditure. In one table it gives figures of the national income for a series of years. The series begins with 1860–69 when the average annual net national income was £ 899 millions. During 1870–76 the annual average had arisen to £ 1,177 millions. In 1911–13, the years before the War, it was £ 2,241 millions. Then came the War. No figures are given for the War years and for six years thereafter. For 1924 the net income was £ 4,035 millions; in 1936, £ 4,850 millions; since 1937 it has stood at £ 5,000 millions. The net national income of Great Britain now is £ 5,000 millions, or two and a quarter times as much as in the year before the War. Contrary to popular belief, the War and its aftermath would seem to have helped greatly to augment the national income. True the national expenditure has also increased. In the year before the War it was 7·4 per cent of the national income. In the current year it is estimated to be above 25 per cent of it. But even after providing the higher expenditure, the national income would be about the same as in 1913 after allowing for the expenditure that year. The expenditure on Defence in the current year will be five times that in 1924. For the first time in the annals of British Finance the proportion of the income to be spent on Defence, 11·6, will exceed the proportion on all other services, 9·2 per cent. This does not mean any diminution of the other services which, in every case, is in excess of the amount spent in previous years. There has been no retrenchment. On the other hand, there are increases under almost every head. The cost per pupil in elementary schools was in 1932–33 £ 12–2–; last year it was £ 16–7–, in the current year it will be £ 16–17–.

There was a small increase under secondary education and a small decrease on University education. The expenditure on social services, Health, Labour, Insurance, increased by 10 millions during the last four years. The expenditure on Trade and Industry increased by 31 millions since 1936–37, the largest item under this head being Roads. The expenditure on Braodcasting in the current year is estimated to amount to £ $3\frac{3}{4}$ millions as against less than £ 3 millions four years ago. It is double the expenditure in 1934–35. Broadcasting is now an important factor in international propaganda.

Side by side with this phenomenal increase in the national income and expenditure which in the case of Great Britain is merely a transfer of money from one pocket to another, there has been a steady volume of unemployment. According to the Economist, the number of persons on the unemployment register is 1,727,000 last month. How is this enormous increase in the national income to be co-ordinated with the standing army of about two million unemployed? It is obvious that the trade and industry which brought the increased income made larger profits without a corresponding expansion of employment in the country. The only one which can be thought of as a source of such increase is the trade in armaments. A part of the increase of income was also locked up in loans to Government. The national debt at the end of the current year will amount to nearly £ 9,000 millions. The interest on this is an addition to the national income. But the largest part has certainly come from some source such as the trade in armaments. The increase of expenditure on armaments for the defence of the country itself, has now supervened to help the flow of expenditure. But one thing is clear. The cost of acquiring and maintaining against possible aggressors Britain's national income, is becoming progressively higher. Britain has to spend a fourth of its national income now for this purpose while before the war she spent only 7 per cent. There is apparently a Law of Diminishing Returns in economic Imperialism, which is asserting itself. In a few years the business will yield less than it costs. Economic Imperialism will cease to be a paying proposition. One of the many erudite reasons advanced for the fall of the Roman Empire, was shortage of currency. The dictator countries have shown that shortage of currency can be met by adopting a barter system. Great Britain and the United States, the two great capitalistic countries, it is reported, are planning to adopt this system between themselves. When this system expands and is adopted by all countries, national income in terms of currency will lose its present significance.

WORLD AFFAIRS.

The European situation after Herr Hitler's Reichstag speech seems to have quietened down considerably. President Roosevelt wisely refrained from continuing a discussion which served no useful purpose but, on the other hand, caused a good deal of irritation. The task of replying to Herr Hitler was left to Col. Beck, the Polish Prime Minister, probably as head of a State immediately concerned with the greater part of Herr Hitler's speech. This was in itself a favourable factor for European peace for three important reasons. As a country which had profited at the expense of Czechoslovakia along with Herr Hitler, Poland could scarcely indulge on a high moral condemnation of Germany's aggressive policy; as a State which is not democratic, the Polish Government could not raise the issue of rival ideologies; and finally, the Polish nation has been as guilty of anti-Semitic conduct as Nazi Germany has been and over a longer period. Col. Beck accordingly restricted his pronouncement to the main issues t at existed between Germany and Poland. His speech conveyed a welcome assurance that the fears entertained by Germany and by a section of the British Press that Poland would be driven to turbulence by Franco-British support, were unfounded. While giving expression to Poland's determination to stand by her rights, Col. Beck made it no less clear that he was ready to enter on negotiations for a settlement of outstanding differences with Germany. An important contribution to European peace was his assertion that Poland was not prepared to adopt any policy against Soviet Russia. A noteworthy development has been the attitude of other "threatened" countries which have adopted Col. Beck's lead of neutrality between Germany and Russia. Turkey, Bulgaria, Roumania and Finland, it was reported on Wednesday, would welcome Russian guarantees if they did not offend the Axis Powers. Once again the small nations of Europe have contributed more than their share to maintaining peace in Europe.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

In spite of the optimistic interpretation in certain Anglo-French quarters of M. Litvinoff's resignation, the negotiations between Britain and Russia have not been hastened by the new Soviet Foreign Minister. The Japanese official statement early this week to the effect that, in the event of a war in Europe Japan would keep out of it unless the anti-Comintern pact between Berlin, Rome and Tokio came into operation, was indirectly an assurance to Russia that she had nothing to fear in the East so long as she kept out of European entanglements. French comments during the week also indicate, that the democracies are finding much difficulty in drawing Russia into their system of alliances, where they had in the past exercised much ingenuity in excluding her from it. The weakness of the imperialist democracies in negotiating with Soviet Russia, lies in the fact that they have already committed themselves to guaranteeing East European frontiers. Considerable adroitness will be needed for the French and British Government to wriggle out of these commitments which they are not in a position to put into effect without Soviet aid. Accordingly today the reverse of what British statesmen had hoped to achieve till very recently, is threatened: that instead of Russia being involved in a life struggle with Germany out of which Britain and France would profit, it is they who are primarily in danger of an ideological conflict with Germany. No wonder that the Russians themselves enjoy the irony of the situation.

The British proposals to Russia are now before us. Mr. Chamberlain made a statement on Wednesday to the House of Commons a few hours after a Moscow statement on the British proposals had been released to the press. Both statements agree that the British proposals required a Soviet supplementary guarantee to render military assistance if the Anglo-French promises to certain European countries have to be put into effect. The Russian statement goes on to say that France and Britain refuse to accept a reciprocal obligation in respect of other States in Eastern Europe to which the Soviet has undertaken responsibilities in the event of aggression. The statement definitely names the countries she is asked to guarantee, Poland and Roumania. The Russian objection, from this statement, appears to be that the proposals are one-sided and do not go far enough. Mr. Chamberlain remarked in the House of Commons that the Soviet Ambassador was hesitant about the proposals because his Government feared that Russia might be rushed into intervention in Europe without support from France and Britain,—i. e., if by her accepting the proposals the Axis Powers are diverted to the States she has guaranteed. On the face of it there is a more important objection which Mr. Chamberlain does not seem to have noted. A supplementary guarantee by Russia to countries primarily guaranteed by France and Britain, will be no more useful now than it was to Czechoslovakia at Munich. What would be effective is a complete military alliance, similar to the one put through recently by Germany and Italy.

The subsidence of the crisis has given various parts of the Empire breathing space to consider their position. Canada, it was well known, looked with consternation at her long unprotected coast-line in the event of war. This has made her statesmen supporters of peace in Europe and she has made her voice felt in Empire discussions. Australia's Premier, Mr. Menzies, at the height of the tension expressed his sympathy with Germany's claims in Danzig. His Minister for External Affairs, Sir Henry Gullet, in pledging Australian support to the mother country in the event of war, in a foreign affairs debate in the House of Representatives on Tuesday, went rather out of his way to declare his attitude to Japan. Under cover of advising Japan to side with her old ally, the British Empire, Sir Henry pleaded for nearer and more auspicious relations with the Japanese. South Africa celebrated the averting of the crisis in her own way, by doing her best to antagonise another part of the Empire, India, by pushing through with her Transvaal Asiatic Land and Trading Bill. It is interesting in this connection to read in Indian Opinion a curious distinction in favour of a Japanese naval officer who was refused admission to a South African theatre. The officer protested and received an apology. Writing editorially Indian Opinion gives an explanation to the effect that the term "Asiatic" did not mean "Japanese". "Whenever a Japanese battleship or ordinary Japanese boat arrives at a Union port," writes Indian Opinion,

"all the places where Asiatics are generally restricted from entering, are flung open to the Japanese." We reprint this week a report of this instructive incident from our Natal contemporary. The Nazi acceptance of the Japanese as "honorary Aryans," although it evoked much British humour at the time, is not so unusual after all.

In the U. S. A. too, President Roosevelt after his intervention in European affairs has turned to handle domestic questions once again. The conscription contemplated by the Senate Military Committee in the event of war, will be an encouragement to British Labour members of Parliament who suggested it as an alternative to Mr. Chamberlain's conscription plans. It is a conscription of capital. By this scheme there is to be a census of wealth and on the basis of this census individuals will be compelled to subscribe to 50-year one per cent Government bonds. The amount to be subscribed varies from five per cent of the net wealth for individuals with a capital of $ 1,000 to 75 per cent for individuals "with fortunes in excess of $ 100,000,000." Mr. Roosevelt will not, of course, find it easy to put through this scheme. But the very fact that it has been suggested is a tremendous step forward for the leading capitalist State of the world. Mr. Wickham Steed in a broadcast speech some weeks ago, referred to the close collaboration which has subsisted for many months past between Moscow and Washington. This apparently is the first important contribution made by the Soviet State to U. S. A. economy.

No survey of world affairs would be complete without reference to China. The Japanese forces there seem to be winning a few victories but they are less important than inner developments in Chinese politics. Apparently the assistance recently given to General Chiang Kaishek by Britain and America, has done little to change the Chinese attitude towards Britain. The Government of Sinkiang has decided to expel all foreign subject except Russians. The blow has fallen on Indians and Afghans who were trading in that remote province. In Sinkiang the Soviet influence is paramount and this sudden decision bodes ill for the Anglo-Russian negotiations in Europe. It is not improbable that Australia's overtures to Japan were the cause of renewed Chinese suspicions of British help.

Two non-political appeals for peace have been made in Europe during the week. His Holiness the Pope through his papal nuncios approached the various governments with a message for moderation and reasonableness. Without the publicity which attended the American President's appeal to the dictators, the representations of His Holiness which were made to both democracies and dictators, have been left to work their silent influence in European affairs. On Tuesday the Duke of Windsor made a notable personal appeal from Verdun for sanity in international politics. His detached position and the dignity of his speech gave a special value to his message. He said:

> In our personal contacts, we strive to live in harmony with our fellowmen, otherwise civilisation could never have come into existence. Are we now going to destroy civilisation by failing to do internationally what we learnt to do individually?
> I personally deplore the use of terms like 'encirclement' and 'aggression,' which arouse dangerous passions which it should be the aim of all of us to subdue. Statesmen who set themselves to restore international security and confidence must act as good citizens of the world, and not only as good Frenchmen, Italians, Germans, Americans and Britons. The greatest success that any Government could achieve for its own national policy will be nothing compared with the triumph of contributing to save humanity from the terrible fate which is threatening it today.

Prohibition in Bombay:—Prohibition is today the accepted policy of all the provincial governments in India. A Committee has reported to the Sind Government recommending a seven-year programme for introducing total Prohibition. In the Punjab the Government has declared its readiness to introduce Prohibition measures when it considers the moment propitious. Bengal has excused itself for the time on the ground that there is less drunkenness in that province than in other parts of India. While conceding that both the Punjab and Bengal have displayed more academic appreciation for Prohibition than active interest in putting it into force, that appreciation in itself is a powerful index of the strength of feeling in this country. The two great political parties in India today, the Congress and the Muslim League, are committed to Prohibition. In the agitation against Prohibition which has sprung up in Bombay since the announcement of the Government's radical proposals for this reform, very few Hindus and practically no Muslims have taken part. The Indian Christian community as well has not been unsympathetic to suggestions for restricting liquor sales. A section of the Europeans and some outstanding Parsis who claim to speak for their community, form the opposition and the position with regard to these two is well illustrated by a letter written by a Parsi gentleman to the Times of India which has made itself the organ of anti-Prohibition. "I have read," says the correspondent, "innumerable letters against Prohibition in your esteemed paper. I regret, however, to observe that very few letters have been written by Europeans. I therefore entreat my European brothers to join us in our agitation against Prohibition, otherwise if we lose now it will be their turn next." The European anti-Prohibitionists have no objection to make use of anyone who will attack Prohibition but they would much rather not incur the odium themselves. The correspondent's theory that European silence is explainable by the permits allowed to them, is based on a misconception. Few responsible Europeans are opposed to Prohibition. Even those who do oppose it, do so in the name of temperance and on grounds of individual liberty. The excesses into which the anti-Prohibition movement has been led in these two months, are in themselves, sufficient to keep any sensible man away from it.

THE CINEMATOGRAPH IN INDIA.

The Cinematograph was introduced in India twenty-five years ago and the event was celebrated by a series of Conferences last week. His Excellency the Governor opened an Exhibition illustrating the technical development of the industry during the last quarter of a century. This was followed by the Film Journalists' Conference which was noticed in the last issue. Next came the Artists' Conference, then the Producers' and Distributors' Conferences, and last the Motion Picture Congress presided over by Mr. S. Satyamurthi, Deputy Leader of the Congress Party in the Indian Legislative Assembly. Mr. Phalke who produced the first Indian film, Harischandra, was in the Conferences acclaimed as the pioneer in this field.

The situation at present is rather complex. The raw film, that is, the blanks on which the pictures are made, are not made in India and have to be imported from Germany, Great Britain and the United States. If there is war or strike in these countries in the film factories, or tariff variations, the Indian industry will either collapse or will be hampered by reduction of supplies and enhanced prices. This is a contingency to which all Indian industries are liable except agriculture. But there are as yet no great vested interests in Great Britain in the manufacture of films, to come in the way of the development of an indigenous industry. The first concern of those interested in the industry should be to promote the manufacture of films in the country. Mr. Satyamurthi made a passing reference to this point but it seems to be generally assumed that India must continue to depend for a considerable time on imported raw films to furnish the basis of the Cinema in this country. Thus it comes about that, while there is a demand for heavy and even prohibitive import duties on picture films, in the case of the raw films the lowering or repealing of the existing duty is being pressed upon Government.

The exploitation of the terms "foreign" and "national" by the spokesmen and champions of cinematograph produotion, is fatal to the development of the art as an instrument of culture as distinguished from an article of trade. Foreign films—we are referring to the picture films—are in the same class as books and magazines and should enjoy the same freedom from tariff restrictions. If Indian publishers should hold a Congress to demand the levy of prohibitory duties on books published abroad, they would, we fancy, meet with scant support from the reading public. The case of pictures produced abroad is in no way different. Some days ago a too "nationalist" member of the Indian Legislative Assembly recommended that Western music must cease to be broadcasted from Indian stations! Apparently his own musical needs would be amply satisfied if no song except "Bande Mataram" is permitted on the Indian air. Though a heavy duty on imported pictures may increase the profits of the cinema as an industry, it will certainly lead to its deterioration as an art and as a means of culture. Already, there is a widespread complaint which was voiced by the President of the Artists' Conference, that Indian producers are not supplying a sufficient variety of pictures. The public soon tire even the most "glamorous" artists if there is no fresh idea behind the story which they are meant to express in action. The way in which the face and figure of some female stars are used in advertisements in newspapers and posters to attract audiences is positively revolting. The producers and distributors seem to be aware that their pictures will not attract people because of its intellectual interest and that they must depend upon the sensuous appeal to fill the auditorium. There is no reticence whatever in too many Indian pictures, nothing left to the imagination of the individual. We admit that some of the foreign pictures are worse, infinitely worse, and that no Indian picture, so far as we know, has reproduced the cannibalistic five-minutes-by-the-watch kiss, of the most blatant of the foreign films. In one or two pictures there was a very near approach to this obscenity but on the whole our producers and artists have been held back by Indian sentiment from imitating it.

Some one in his enthusiasm called, at one of these conferences, the film industry a key industry which it certainly is not. A key industry is one the decline of which would be directly felt in every part of the economic life. If all the cinemas were closed, outside a few cities, there will not be much of a ripple on the surface of Indian life. The cinema at present in India is not even a luxury industry; it is inspired and maintained solely by the profit motive with little regard for the health and soundness of social life. Even in Great Britain where the pictures produced reflect the social conditions to a much larger extent, tariff and quota devices have not brought prosperity to the industry. Last year an amending Act was passed with the object of helping the English industry against the competition of American imports. The Economist reviewing the results of a year's operation of the new Act, concludes :

> The evidence is far from convincing that a turn in the tide of fortune for British films has taken place. Successes are still few, failures too many....More than half the studio space in this country has been idle during the past twelve months. Less than one half of the producing capacity of the remaining stages has been utilised in that time. If it were not for the increase of the quota rate (compelling theatres to use a prescribed minimum of British to foreign films) to 20 per cent, there is reason to believe that the volume of production in the current year will show no increase, and even diminish.

One of the chief difficultites in the way of the development of the Indian industry which several speakers at the Conferences refered to, is the multiplicity of languages. The attempt to force on the people Hindustani has been a failure. Whatever a man may say on the platform he does not appreciate having to listen to a talk in an as yet unformed language in his hour of relaxation. The solution of the problem is to produce silent pictures, leaving every linguistic area to append its own script to the scenes. To many people the silent pictures of the days before the sound film made its appearance, still seem preferable. When Britain first exhibited Russian films, a deep impression was produced by the discriminating use of sound in contrast to the eternal noise and chattering of the usual talkie. The talk except in a few pictures is tedious and even fatuous. In the so-called Indian social pictures it is forced, artificial and often downright stupid. Here the personality of the artist comes in. According to the Editor of Film India, most of the women actors can not read or write. Perhaps a good proportion of men actors are not much above the some level of literacy. One of the speakers at the Artists' Conference complained that they had no status in society. The President also dwelt on the lack of appreciation shown by the public and the producers, of the services of the artists. Through the ages, occupations mainly consisting of the exhibition of the body as a means of livelihood, have been regarded as among the lowlier arts. The great sculptor's name is handed down to posterity but not that of his model. Still much may be done to make acting in films a career which cultured people may adopt. There is a censorship of the films. It should be applied to the story before it is filmed, if the author himself cannot be persuaded to avoid scenes in which he would not like to see his own daughter or sister taking part.

The impact of the cinema on social life is direct unlike that of other scientific inventions for increasing one's educational or entertainment resources. The Indian theatre has existed from ancient times but until a few years ago women did not appear on the stage, women's parts being taken by men. This has now become odious to Indian sensibility. The cinema has played a decisive part in precipitating this change in our ideas. Instead of being advanced as a measure of social reform, the getting together of men and women has been forced on society by a machine and that too in contexts hitherto regarded as sacred to family life. The result has been a sudden release of emotional explosions. In one week, the papers contained two cases of a boy and a girl thrown completely out of balance by film pictures. At Tezpur on the 4th May a young man pleaded in answer to a charge of attempted suicide that he had fallen in love with a film star whose picture he had seen and wanted to frighten his parents who had objected to his seeking the star in marriage. The other case is that of a fourteen year Sindhi girl who pined to death because her parents opposed the idea of her marrying a young man whose picture she had seen at a cinema. She contracted consumption and at her death her parents complied with her last desire to get a shawl of the actor laid over her bier.

CATHOLIC CONTROL OF HOLLYWOOD.

Writing on "The Catholic Church in Politics" in The New Republic, Mr. L. H. Lehmann, for many years a priest himself, has the following to say about the way in which the Church deals with the movies:

Today the Catholic Church controls Hollywood through Hollywood's master censor, Joseph I. Breen, devout Catholic. Formerly a Washington newspaper man and labour conciliator (he wears a scar on his cheek as a memento, it is said, of a "conference" with striking miners in the early days), Breen was an assistant in the Will Hays organization before assuming the office of Code Administrator. He is a one-man censorship board; virtual dictator of a $ 2,000,000,000 industry. All stories and scenarios offered for production must be submitted to him before they will be considered or even read by individual studios. The minute a writer completes a script it is carried to Breen's office to await his verdict. Every year thousands of stories are submitted and read by his staff.

Writers, directors, producers have all capitulated to Breen. It is said that he has written more sequences unaided than any other writer in the studios. Producers may try to defy him but they know that in the end his word will prevail, for no theatre subscribing to the Code will exhibit a film produced without his approval. The story is told of a dispute with Breen over a picture involving $ 825,000. The eight reels were submitted to him. His answer was an emphatic No. Every effort was made to reason with him. For weeks the fight persisted. Without his approval the matter was at a standstill. Finally, he advised the producers to take it up with his superiors, the Board of Directors of the Board of Motion Picture Producers and Distributors in New York, knowing full well that the Board's reversal was highly improbable. At this point the studio capitulated and asked Breen what changes he wanted.

In another instance, a studio paid $ 5,000 for a story. Two writers worked over it for weeks, being paid $ 17,500. Breen turned it down. Two other writers were put on the job. Breen again withheld approval. For two years, at a cost of $ 128,000, writers of various talents were tried. At last in desperation Breen was approached once more. He outlined his recommendations. These were followed and the script was then accepted.

Nobody can condemn the Catholic Church for setting up a censorship of this kind so long as it can get away with it. Protestantism conceivably might do the same thing if it were sufficiently united and sufficiently intelligent. The only point we wish to make is, that if the moving pictures always and invariably treat the Catholic Church and the Catholic priesthood with respect it is simply because there is machinery which compels tham to do so.—The Christian Evangelist.

THE JEWS OF EUROPE.

Attention has been concentrated so much on Germany, and the German persecution of Jews has so far exceeded the persecutions of other countries that one is led into believing that, if somehow the German persecution could be stopped, the whole situation would clear up. Nevertheless in Poland, in Hungary, in Roumania and in Yugoslavia, there is a strong anti-Jewish feeling which has shown itself in sporadic acts of persecution, in pogroms. The German form of anti-Semitism is not different in kind from that of its neighbours. It differs by reason of its sustained ferocity. The result of this persecution has been a tendency in several countries to regard the refugee problem as primarily one relating to Jews. Sir Norman Angell and Mrs. Dorothy Frances Buxton have, for instance jointly written a Penguin Special entitled "You and the Refugees" in which the word 'Jew' is practically equated with the word 'refugee.' The reason is, not necessarily consciously, that the writers believe it is easier to appeal to the Western mind against a pseudo-religious persecution than against political persecution. There is much sympathy which anti-Semitism creates for its victims, which anti-Communism, for instance, does not bring out. Political heresy is today a more heinous sin than religious.

But the methods of well-meaning writers have been singularly unfortunate for the very Jews it was intended to help. A straw ballot by the American magazine Fortune, showed recently that anti-Semitism is spreading in the U.S.A. Ken, an anti-Nazi weekly of Chicago, in a recent number reported that "anti-Semitic picketing had made its appearance in the nation's capital," that the Klan and similar organisations are increasing their activities and that in Miami, the "White Front," an anti-Jewish Society, is busy in propaganda work. In the same issue of Ken there is a letter replying to a previous article by Sir Norman Angell urging that the employment of a Jewish refugee did not mean less employment for Americans but on the contrary more as the Jew will open up new avenues of employment. "Personally," writes A.B.W., "I'd much rather keep my job and support my family, than be fired in favour of some Austrian Jew, however deserving he may be." The trouble is that there are two fundamental differences in Sir Norman's view of the Jewish refugee problem and that of "A. B. W.": In the first place, the Jews they are considering, have nothing in common but the name. Sir Norman's Jew would find his feet anywhere: the instances he gives even in "You and the Refugees" of Jews who opened up new lines of trade and industry in Britain, are of unusual types whose very first success was in getting to Britain in spite of all the difficulties that Sir Norman himself has ably depicted. The Jews considered by "A. B. W." are the Jews who really need help; the Jews who have been deprived of their living by Nazi intolerance and who can with difficulty re-establish themselves in ordinary business in a new country. Then again Sir Norman studies the question of employment from above; the fear of being thrown out of employment does not lurk within him. "A. B. W." on the other hand, requests the editor of Ken not to publish his name lest he lose his job in Hollywood.

Since it is obvious that both among the Jews who have to be helped, and among those nationals who are asked to help, the mediocre predominate, the development of anti-Semitism along with sympathy for the Jews is inevitable, and in the end it is not inconceivable that the hatred might submerge the sympathy. Already it seems to have had that effect with some writers in Britain. Mr. Douglas Reed in his "Disgrace Abounding" presents an anti-Nazi case which is also anti-Semitic. Whilst there is much obvious exaggeration in many of his statements, that does not completely dispose of his contention that it is inexplicable that Britain which was prepared to sacrifice Abyssinia, Czechoslovakia, Spain, which will not respond to appeals to help unemployed Britons at home, is moved to compassion for the Jews. We do not agree with Mr. Reed that all, or even much of, this is due to a sinister propaganda. We believe it is greatly due to misguided propaganda, not so much by Jewish writers as by sympathisers like Sir Norman Angell. Sir Norman, for example, has written up a story in "You and the Refugees" called "the Story of Elsa Strauss." This is a "built-up" narrative of several incidents which have happened to many people. We think that this is a particularly bad method of propaganda. Sir Norman is trying to evoke public support for a good cause but he is appealing to the same sentimentality to which Herr Hitler addresses his anti-Jewish propaganda. The dangers of this are obvious.

The problem of the Jew is that of the refugee, whether Spanish, Czech, German, Austrian or Chinese. The only way that it can be solved is as part of the larger problem. We quite concede the point that it is awful that in times of peace an entire community should be hounded out of peaceful occupations. But is it any easier for those, for instance, whom a ruthless war has driven out of Spain, to settle down to a new life in a new country? The lesson of Palestine is clear that you cannot evoke a community as an island community among a different people without provoking antagonism. And even for individuals it is difficult. So long as the Jewish refugee is a "refugee" dependent on the sympathy of his neighbours and their charity, he will be well-treated. But only so long. The moment he sets up and becomes independent, all the anti-Semitic stories will follow him into the new country. The only way of meeting the danger is, therefore, to help the men, women and children not as Jews but as refugees. After all, what used to distinguish the Jew from other peoples was the fact that he had no country. This is not equally true of the political refugee driven out of his country or fleeing from the Government? This can best be achieved through some such machinery as the refugees conference. Questions which bear closely on settling refugees are, how far they can be expected to adjust their lives to that of the people around them, and how capable the new countries are of assimilating their new citizens. The rather selfish argument advanced by Sir Norman Angell that Britain should settle the Jews in Palestine because they would be loyal and grateful to Britain, is here of no avail. The point seems rather to be whether they can join in a community life with the Arabs. It is no use being loyal and grateful to a people or a government thousands of miles away, if you cannot get on with your immediate neighbours.

In Australia and Canada we have two States that could absorb all the refugees of Europe and benefit by the act. But both Australia and Canada, not less than Herr Hitler's Germany, are suffering from a 'Nordic' complex which carries racialism to peculiar lengths. They are willing to have as immigrants people who at the present stage have no desire to go out of their own countries. But it is too much for them to provide homes for the refugees. If Europe could be really considered as one, the difficulties of the refugee problem would readily solve themselves. But the gulf between Eastern Europe and Western Europe is a well-nigh unbridgeable one. A close consideration of the question will show that in Europe the refugees naturally divide into West European and East European. The first finds no difficulty, whether Jew or Gentile, in settling in England or France or in the U. S. A. He regards the East European, generally speaking, as a lower species. In fact the refugee problem itself is the fruit of European inability to settle the differences between the two. The East European has in Russia an ideally suitable country. It is, at present at any rate, free of anti-Semitic prejudice. If the communities are naturally settled in this manner by a general agreement, we think that the whole problem could be disposed of with some degree of permanence. We have not mentioned Asia or Africa not because we object to certain communities but because of the difficulties of assmiliation. and of present high population. To those who had hoped to find in the Jewish communities a link between East and West, there has been a disillusionment in this that Western Jews share in the prejudices of other Westerners on questions relating to Asia and Africa, as shown to some extent in Palestine. Thsee Jews themselves do not look to Asia except when Europe turns them down. No country can be expected to take in in large numbers—immigration "by retail" is a resource that does not solve the problem of refugees—a people whom it cannot expect to assimilate. And it is not a satisfactory solution if dominant European nations "plant" refugee communities in Asia and Africa in the hope of growing oases of loyalty amid the rising nationalisms of "backward" peoples.

When all this has been settled there still remains the question of the Chinese refugee who seems to have received much less consideration than his case warrants. The West European can easily fit into England, France or the U. S. A. The East European will take longer but even he can adjust himself. Both have large groups of their own communities abroad, more or less flourishing, to help them. The Chinese faces a dismal future. Sir Norman Angell following a political tradition concerns himself solely with European refugees. Does that mean that the Japanese political refugee or the Chinese refugee—the latter number thousands and tens of thousands—are to be left to rot in persecution? We may even take the argument a step further. What about the treatment of Africans and Indians in Africa? Or must we wait till things get as bad as it is with the Jews in Germany before protesting? Driving people out of a country is not the only persecution.

THE RELIGIOUS ORGANISATIONS CONTROL BILL IN JAPAN.

The Tokio Government's bill for the control of religious organisations has passed the House of Peers and is now under consideration in the House of Representatives. The indications are that that body will also approve it. Over a period of forty years, succeeding cabinets have wrestled with this question and four definite attempts have been made to secure the passage of some such legislation.

As the terminology of the present bill indicates, it proposes to deal not with religions as such but with religious organisations. This new approach is evidently made in order to ward off the charge of interfering with religious freedom. The control of religious organisations provided for in the present bill is comprehensive. No religious body can be established without the approval of the Minister of Education. In applying for approval, the creed or an outline of the doctrine of that religious group must be submitted as well as a statement covering its ceremonies, its organisational set up, its range of activities and the qualifications, prerogatives and powers of its pastors and officials.

When once approval has been secured for the establishment of a religious body the matters outlined above cannot be altered, if such alterations affect its status as a religious body, without the approval of the Minister of Education or by his delegation the prefectural governor or the local police. Each local church as well as each denomination must appoint an official representative and this representative will be held responsible by the government for the character and affairs of that body.

A local church may not dissolve without the consent of the responsible head of the denomination with which it is related and the approval of the prefectural governor. However the prefectural governor or police may dissolve a local church, (a) if it fails to rebuild within five years after its building has been destroyed, (b) if it has no responsible head for a period of three years or more.

In cases where religious doctrines or ceremonies disturb peace and order and run counter to the public good the authorities may limit the functions of the religious body concerned or order the suspension of pastor or dissolve it.

Religious bodies, local churches, pastors and officials who violate the provisions of this law will be subject to fines ranging from £ 200.00 to £ 500.00 or to imprisonment for a term of not more than six months.

Inasmuch as Christianity hitherto has had no legal status, all Christian communions and local churches must take steps to conform with the provisions of this law within two years after its passage.

Christian communions and local churches which have sought and received the approval of the proper authorities will have the right to organise as juristic persons and hold property. They will also be freed from local and national taxes. Moreover, their property cannot be confiscated in case of debt. These privileges do not accrue, however, to communions or local churches which register as religious societies.

As a whole the reaction of Japanese Christian leaders to this proposed legislation is as follows:

Many of the provisions contained in this bill are already in force. The bill has the advantage of clarifying the situation and giving definiteness to the powers of local authorities.

If communions and local churches meet the conditions laid down in this legislation the local authorities must take favourable action. Hitherto the personal equation of the local officials, their likes or dislikes, have played too large a role.

The government has given serious and considerate consideration to the amendments to the original drafts urged by Christian leaders and most of them have been incorporated into the bill as it now stands.

Large sections of the Japanese people have looked upon Christianity as an alien faith. Ever since the days under the Tokugawa regime when persecutions broke upon the Japanese Christians this faith has been labelled foreign in the minds of many. This legislation, however, puts the stamp of approval upon Christianity by the Empire's highest legislative body and relates it to the nation's inner indigenous life. For eighty years Christianity has been an interloper in Japan's religious world. It has had no legal status. It has been tolerated but given no legal recognition. This legislation gives it a legal standing and legally puts it on a basis of equality with the nation's other faiths—Shinto and Buddhism.

JAPANESE PROTESTS AGAINST DURBAN "INSULT."

The commander of the Japanese ship, Manila Maru, called on the Acting Mayor of Durban (Mr. J. Fyfe) to protest against his being refused admission to a Durban bioscope when his ship was last in port—on February 4.

"It is not my personal pride so much as my national pride that has been hurt," said the commander, Captain Hiromatsu Kanegae, in a letter he handed to Mr. Fyfe.

"We Japanese have pride not for ourselves so much as for our nation. We would rather be trampled under muddy boots than that our nation should be insulted."

Mr. Fyfe assured the commander that his complaint would receive attention. It would be handed to the Mayor (Mr. Fleming Johnston) when he returned from Capetown next week.

The managers of the various cinemas, interviewed by a representative of the Natal Daily News, said there certainly appeared to be some mistake because the Japanese had always been allowed to enter the theatres in South Africa.

The manager of the Twentieth Century Theatre declared: "We reserve the right of admission, whether European or otherwise, but I cannot believe that this captain of the ship was refused admission. If there was such a mistake I would be the first to apologise to him.

"A few weeks ago a number of Japanese sailors wanted admission; we did not think they were fittingly dressed and did not allow them to enter, just as we refused to let some Europeans enter because their cloths were dirty and torn."

Captain Kanegae stated in his letter that he liked Durban, its climate and the pleasant modern city area; he admitted that it was already an important distributing centre and had a most promising future; it was a world-famous port and the natural spaciousness of the Bay would meet any demands that development might make upon it.

"The people of Durban are kind and polite—so much so that my crew as well as myself always feel quite at home in Durban when we call after a long sea voyage. We are grateful for your hospitality. But I fear that this experience has done much to disturb my hitherto kindly feelings towards Durban."

"On my asking the reason why I was refused admission I understood the manager to explain that it was 'an agreement of their association.' I do not know whether I understood this rightly or not; as the past there has been no question about admitting me or my officers to local cinemas. I sincerely trust that there is no suggestion now that we should be barred from the cinemas, and I appeal to you to use your influence for the continued recognition of Japanese for what they are—people who are treated on the same footing as Europeans in any part of the world without exception.

"It is hardly necessary to remind you that in London and New York, Japanese may occupy any seat in any theatre. In Capetown the Japanese is treated as well as any European. I might add that I know many Europeans of high social standing and with them I can dine, talk, play and dance and be thoroughly easy in mind. I shall never forget, for instance, the constant kindness of Mr. te Water, the South African High Commissioner in London, and Mrs. te Water.

"Ours is a country that has taken a high and honourable place in the world: we have a culture which many admire, an ancient and honourable history, a record of considerable practical achievement.

"To insult one Japanese by making him feel that he is regarded as one of an inferior or despised race is to make him feel that not he so much as his country has been slighted."

Captain Kanegae states he has no doubt that the management of this particular picture house intended no gratuitous slight to him or to his people. "But through you (the Mayor) I appeal to them, and to Durban as a whole, to reciprocate the friendship which we Japanese have always felt towards Durban. It is our wish that each of us should leave this beautiful port with nothing but pleasure, cordiality and gratitude in our hearts."

PROHIBITION AND REPEAL IN U. S. A.

Unity of Chicago wrote the following editorial on December 5, 1938:—

Prohibition, you may remember, was done away with because it increased drunkenness so horribly! The philosophy of repeal was simple—take liquor away from men, and they will insist on having it; give them liquor in abundance, and they will leave it alone." This never made sense to us, but propaganda put it over and a "dry" country was made "wet" again. And we were confidently told that drunkenness would now disappear! Well, how has it worked out? Statistics are few, because investigations are few. But now again some figures come along, and they confirm what the eyes of any honest observer clearly see—that drunkenness is now rife among us, worse than ever, and steadily increasing. Thus, a correspondent in the New York Herald-Tribune calls attention to the fact that the 1923 census report, section "Prisoners," page 81, table 12, states that in 1923, after Prohibition had been in force for three years, the commitments for drunkenness had declined 55·3 per cent, or more than one-half. On the other hand, the Federal Bureau of Investigation, in a recent report comparing arrests for 1932 ("dry") and 1937, ("wet"), states that in these years, the repeal had been in force four years, drunkenness per capita increase in arrests for was 100·5 per cent, or more than entitled. Our "wet" friends are to be congratulated on their great success in repealing the 18th Amendment and thus getting rid of the evils of liquor. Which is "rit sarkastik," as Artemas Ward used to put it! As a matter of fact, of course, the question of drunkenness and general conditions under Prohibition never came into the minds of the "wets" at all. It was at the very time when Prohibition was at its best, with vastly improved conditions everywhere about us, that the repeal movement was started, and its motive was nothing in the world but the selfish insistence of men used to having their own way, especially in matters of personal indulgence, upon getting their "booze" safely and easily, no matter what the cost to the public welfare. They were going to have their cocktails, no matter what the increase in drunkenness! Now they have got what they want—and the price is being paid. When we have gotten sufficiently tired of paying this price, we shall have Prohibition again!

BOMBING PLANES—WHO MADE THEM "LEGAL"

An ironic fact, known hardly at all to the general public in any country, writes No frontier News Service, is that the retention of the bombing plane as a legal instrument of war and the suppression of native populations, was due to insistence by Great Britain. The background story of this amazing episode has been told in several places where it can be documented, but most recent, perhaps, is a speech made by Hugh Dalton, Member of Parliament, last February at Accrington. Referring to the Disarmament Conference, of 1932, Mr. Dalton said: "On February 10, in the first debate of the Conference, Italy proposed the abolition of all bombing aeroplanes. Germany, Russia, and other States supported. The United States of America was friendly to the idea, and in June President Hoover definitely came out in favour. From the first, Sir John Simon and Lord Londonderry resisted and obstructed: and on July 7, Lord Baldwin, on behalf of the Government, opposed abolition, and proposed instead that limits should be defined within which air bombing should be legitimate. Nearly three years later, Lord Londonderry told the world that in 1932 when 'the Disarmament Conference assembled, almost its earliest discussions were centred around the possibility of the total abolition of.....the bombing aeroplane.....I had the utmost difficulty at that time in preserving the use of the bombing aeroplane.' But he succeeded, and his Liberal colleagues of that time helped him to succeed. The consequences of that success are written in letters of blood in China, Abyssinia, and Spain. And may be the end is not yet."

INTERNATIONAL COURT OF JUSTICE.

The term of office of the fifteen members of the Permanent Court of International Justice expires at the end of this year. The new Court for the period 1940 to 1949 will be simultaneously elected by the League Assembly and Council in September next from lists of candidates submitted by national groups of the Permanent Court of Arbitration or, in some cases, other national bodies of jurists. For this election, certain non-member States and parties to the Statute of the League are permitted also to vote on the Council. The Permanent Court of International Justice consists of a body of independent judges elected, regardless of their nationality, from persons who possess qualifications required in their respective countries for appointment to the highest judicial offices, or are jurists of recognised competence in international law. The present members of the Court are: M. Guerrero, President (Salvador); Sir Cecil

INTERNATIONAL COURTESY.

While the attention of the public is readily focussed on international conflicts, acts of international courtesy which serve to soften asperities, pass unnoticed. World Youth calls attention to an outstanding instance between the United States and Japan, who stand in opposite camps of international politics. At the orders of President Roosevelt, the U. S. warship Astoria sailed from Annapolis bearing the ashes of the late Japanese Ambassador Saito, on the long voyage by way of Panama to his native land. Ambassador Saito was only fifty years when he died. He was exceedingly popular with Americans and in the face of many difficulties he managed to maintain friendly relations between the United States and Japan. World's Youth recalls that, in the autumn of 1925, the remains of U. S. Ambassador Edgar E. Bancroft were, by order of the Japanese Government, brought across the Pacific by a Japanese warship to America.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN'S DUAL POLICY.

Labour Research (London) in its April number writes:—

On March 17th, the same day as Chamberlain's Birmingham speech, was announced the conclusion of an Anglo-German trade agreement between the F. B. I. and the Reichsgruppe Industries. The press statement caused an immediate uproar, and the full text confirmed the worst fears. The Financial News (21-3-39) wrote that: "What is intended is nothing less than a complete Anglo-German economic alliance—a complete reorientation of the whole of our commercial policy. The object of the agreement, according to the text, was: to provide a volume of foreign currency sufficient for its signatories' economic needs"—in other words, for the German arms programme. The agreement is moreover, virtually directed against the U. S. A., and contradicts the spirit, if not the letter, of the recent Anglo-American Trade Agreement. Despite sharp protests from America, however, the Government has so far refused to request the F. B. I. to cancel the agreement.

SOCIAL REFORM BILL IN BOMBAY.

Nine non-official Bills, relating to various social reform activities, which will be considered by the Bombay Legislative Assembly, have been published in the Bombay Government Gazette, dated May 10.

Mr. Bhogilal D. Lala will introduce a Bill seeking to amend the Criminal Procedure Code so as to entitle a wife to have the right not to live with her husband. Mr. S. H. Jhabvala has a Bill in his name, which seeks to amend the City of Bombay Municipal Act, making it incumbent on Municipal Officers to undertake monthly rounds to hear grievances from the poorer and illiterate classes of citizens. The same member will introduce another Bill which seeks to "free hawkers and hand-cart men from harassment." A Bill in the name of Mr. R. R. Bole seeks to enable members of the scheduled classes to use public wells, tanks, conveyances, dharamshalas along with other classes of Hindus.

Mr. Mirza Akhtar Hasan will introduce a Bill to consolidate the provisions of Muslim Law in its application to the Province of Bombay relating to suits by married Muslim women for the dissolution of marriage and to remove doubts as to the effects of apostasy of a married Muslim woman on her marriage tie.

Mr. S. V. Parulekar has two Bills in his name, one seeking to make free or compulsory or forced labour an offence punishable with imprisonment or fine. The other Bill seeks to exempt from attachment property not exceeding Rs. 2,000 in value of a judgment debtor who is an industrial worker, artisan or agriculturist.

Mr. Babubhai Patel will introduce a Bill to prevent the excommunication of members by various Hindu castes and communities on social grounds.

A Bill in the name of Mr. H. V. Pataskar seeks to empower the Sub-Divisional Magistrate to hear appeals against orders passed by the police patil.

REFUGEE SETTLEMENT IN BRITISH GUIANA.

The Commission appointed to investigate the possibilities of a large-scale refugee settlement in British Guiana expresses the opinion that the territory while not ideal for refugees from Middle European countries and not suitable for immediate large-scale settlement, possesses potential possibilities and recommends a trial settlement, at the earliest possible date, with a personnel of 3,000 to 5,000 carefully selected young men and women under a properly equipped technical organisation.

This summarises the conclusion of the Commission investigation appointed by the United States President which have been issued today as a White Paper.

The Commission is of the opinion that the climate in the area offered does not preclude the possibility of a white settlement. Severe tropical diseases do not occur with dangerous frequency. The bases for certain industrial development appear to exist. The present inhabitants would welcome immigration by Europeans.

The report adds that every consideration of health sanitation, working efficiency and social wellbeing indicates that the unit of settlement should not be the family, but the village.

The Commission considers that the colonists should be chosen from young married, but childless, couples and single young men and women of good health and sturdy physique, and that approximately 3,000 to 5,000 people will be required in the first year to man the various projects. In the area available, there are suitable soils for permanent agriculture and natural resources, which make possible correlated industrial development, the climate and health conditions making settlement by Europeans feasible. The approximate cost of the trial settlements over a period of two years with a population of 5,000 is estimated at 3,000,000 dollars.

Mr. MacDonald announced in the House of Commons, that the British Government had considerable hopes of the possibility of a settlement of refugees in British Guiana.

S. Natarajan's

WEST OF SUEZ.

Prof. L. Rushbrook Williams writes in The Asiatic Review

"He adds to a lively, and occasionally malicious, pen a keen sense of humour and a certain confidence in his own judgment, which is the habitual prerogative of youth. The result is an engaging book, which tells us almost as much about Mr. Natarajan as about the places he visited and the persons he encountered."

"May well prove invaluable to other young Indians addicted with Western Wanderlust. For here they will read of the hotels he patronised, the tips he gave the porters he employed, where and what food he found, and the conclusions he sedately drew." The Times of India, Bombay.

"A pleasant souvenir of a six-months holiday which Mr. S. Natarajan spent in Europe last year. Mr. Natarajan left the shores of India on February 12, 1937 and when he set foot in Europe he found the whole Continent in a State of frenzy. The Civil war was in full swing in Spain, nervousness had gripped Naziland, Paris was getting the Exposition ready and England was all agog with excitement in view of the (then impending) Coronation of King George VI. Mr. Natarajan had plenty to see and hear during his sojourn. And he did well in taking his typewriter with him." The Hindu, Madras.

THE TRADITIONAL HOME OF THE SANDALWOOD TREE.

It is in perfumery that the greater proportion of Sandalwood Oil is employed at the present day and to discriminating buyers, such as perfumers and soap manufacturers must of necessity be, it is hardly necessary to extol the virtues of the East Indian Oil which is without equal, both as a fine perfume base and a fixative for the increasingly popular bouquets of the Oriental type. In addition it is now being used extensively, and with marked success, in the creation of some of the more delicate perfumes in which the Sandalwood odour is not required as a predominant character.

A few trials will convince the perfumer who has not taken full advantage of the odour-value of this oil, that is of the greatest use to him, not only for predominant Sandalwood odour where required, but also a modifier and a fixative for other odours. This is true for liquid perfumes, soaps, creams, powders and all other cosmetic preparations. It will be found invaluable to those up-to-date perfumers who pride themselves on their own "creations."

NOTES.

Soviet Nazi Rapprochement? :—Mr. Douglas Reed in "Disgrace Abounding" warns his readers to watch out for anti-Semitism in Russia. He writes: "Herr Hitler's obvious move now..... would be to join hands with Russia.....Together the world will be theirs. National Socialism and Bolshevism are not worlds apart, but close together.....There is one great obstacle. Stalin had or has—I am not sure how matters stand at the moment—a Jewish wife. The Jews are powerful in Russia, numerous in the Bolshevist administration. I can perfectly well imagine an alliance between National Socialist Germany and Bolshevist Russia.....I cannot imagine an alliance between National-Socialist Germany and the present regime in Soviet Russia. If you see signs of a change of regime in Russia, of the exclusion of the Jewish element, you may book that passage for the Bahamas, for all is lost." There is a singular appositeness about this passage as one reads the newspapers today. For while the British Government is laboriously considering the Soviet proposals for the peace front, news comes through that the Russian Foreign Minister, M. Litvinoff, has resigned his post. M. Litvinoff is a Jew and has an English wife. More than this he has been a staunch advocate of collective security which is now gaining ground in Britain and France. If the Soviet wanted to give a definite indication that they were not committed to either democracy or dictatorship in the European conflict, they could not have chosen a better method of doing so than by dropping M. Litvinoff. Herr Hitler's own attitude towards Russia which is now singularly subdued—it was noted, he studiously omitted any reference to it in his last speech—is not encouraging to France and Britain.

The Small Nations and War :—The small nations of Europe have two alternatives in meeting the menace of War. They can either sell their defence to that Great Power which offers the best terms—since trying to defend themselves would be expensive and futile—or they can secure assurances from both the democracies and the dictators to respect their neutrality. This is being done unostentatiously by the Scandinavian countries who are considering a non-aggression pact with Germany. More advertised because immediately threatened is the attitude of Roumania whose Foreign Minister, M. Gafencu, has completed a round of the democratic capitals and has started visiting the dictators. M. Gafencu has secured Anglo-French guarantees of assistance in the event of unprovoked aggression. But such a guarantee is useless unless Soviet Russia, the one Great Power that can render immediate assistance, joins in it. Roumania's internal condition is such that reliance on Soviet help might well let loose several discontented elements now held down. Besides Roumania has a none too easy conscience in regard to Bessarabia, once Russian, now under Romanian administration. M. Gafencu has taken the only course open to him of negotiating with the dictators for the best possible terms.

Are Government Weakening? :—We publish today the official report of an interview between a deputation of the Licensed Victuallers' Association and the Minister of Excise on the introduction of Prohibition in Bombay City. While the Minister is said to have been adamant with reference to the request for compensation to the liquor trade, his undertaking to lay before his colleagues the point of view of the Association that Bombay City should be taken last and not first in the scheme of Prohibition, and his remarks generally on it, might create an impression that the Government may give up their plan to introduce Prohibition in Bombay City on 1st August. We had ourselves suggested that Prohibition would better have been extended from the districts to the capital city. But, on the announcement of the Government scheme, we recognised that they have begun at the right end, as Bombay City is the principal centre from which the liquor habit spreads to the villages. Unlike Madras and Calcutta which have a large permanent population, Bombay City has a predominantly floating population and, even otherwise, it exercises, for good and evil, an influence on the life of the province as a whole which no other provincial capital does. The deputation admitted this in its statement that Bombay was interested in the liquor trade over the whole province. A revision of the scheme at this stage in the direction desired by the Victuallers' Association, will amount practically to the abandonment of Prohibition.

Unitary Government in India:—British India, as every schoolboy knows, began as three large and independent provinces, Madras, Bombay and Bengal. It was found necessary at a very early stage to bring them together under a Governor-General. This was done by the Regulating Act. Since then the provinces were from time to time endowed with an increasing amount of autonomy in the administration but the central government retained its supremacy. This was wrecked by the Hoare scheme which made the provinces separate autonomous units. This is the position now. In other parts of the world the tendency, owing to various causes, is for governments to have powers concentrated more and more at the centre. Federation is steadily giving place to unification. The need of a strong central government was never greater in India than now. All important non-official movements are organised on an All-India scale. Provincial governments are at their wits' end to meet the impact of these movements whenever there is any disturbance in their territories. The present position of the United Provinces is the most acute illustration of this feature of the reforms. The Pant Ministry is beset on all sides with outbreaks of lawlessness, which it is unable to control with its unaided resources. It hesitates to call upon the Central Government for help as it will go against the Congress policy of ignoring the Central Government in matters relating to the provinces. The condition in Burma is even worse. It is evident on all sides that the present Constitution will break down soon and unless revised in time by a form of government which will be able to control the forces of disorder in all parts of the country, we must face the prospect of early chaos.

The Forward Bloc :—Rumours of the formation of a new party within the Congress have been set at rest by Mr. Subhas Chandra Bose's announcement of the setting up of a Forward Bloc which would be to the Leftist-Radical elements what the Gandhi Seva Sangh is to the Rightist group. This is a wise step. It avoids the creation of one more party, it seeks to bring together all the extremists and pseudo-extremists, and it might well succeed in giving some character to the rather vague political theorisings of the Left parties in the Congress. At any rate, even if forces beyond his control defeat Mr. Bose's attempt to bring coherence to the Leftists, it is something that unlike others who have been wrecked by the Congress hierarchy, Mr. Bose is not wasting his energies explaining to the country how it all happened. The Poet, Rabindranath Tagore, who was reported some days back to be considering intervention as a peacemaker between Mr. Bose and Gandhiji has now congratulated Mr. Bose on the strong line he adopted at Calcutta. This is a significant development. On Friday morning a Bombay Chronicle correspondent reported that Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel wished to resign from the Working Committee, that four other vacancies were expected, and that these places would be filled by left-wing Congressmen. Such a step would be the final victory for Mr. Bose as it was for just such a Committee that he has stood out. If the report is true, the attitude of the rightists assumes all the aspects of a personal vendetta against the ex-president.

A Tell-tale Observation :—In the bad old days when dacoities flourished, a little boy was warned not to disclose to the dacoits the hiding place of his father in the household barn. Accordingly, when the bandit chief approached the house, the boy ran forward and eagerly told him ; "My father is not in the barn." This old story came to mind on reading Mr. K. M. Munshi's remark at Poona last week-end that Gandhiji is not a spent force. He did not explain how on three occasions recently the country respectfully declined to follow Gandhiji's lead. The first was when he sought to foist upon the Governor of the Central Provinces the blame for the failure of Dr. Khare to be guided by the Working Committee. The second was the election of Mr. Subhas Bose as Congress President for a second time in contravention of the wishes of the members of the same Committee. The third and the most significant was the poor response to Gandhiji's call to make the Rajkot affair an all-India issue. In Rajkot itself, as Gandhiji has admitted, his intervention proved a failure. We deal with the resignation of Mr. Subhas Bose and the manner it came about in an article in this issue. It has been hailed as a great victory. At best it is a pyrrhic one. Time will show.

The Spectator on the Rajkot Award :—The Spectator (London) has a significant comment on Sir Maurice Gwyer's award in the Rajkot dispute. It observes that the issue was whether the Thakore should necessarily appoint whom ever Mr. Patel recommended, or could he reject the recommendations in whole or in part? "Mr. Gandhi said the former, the Thakore Saheb the latter. Sir Maurice Gwyer agrees with Mr. Gandhi and the Thakore Saheb will no doubt accept his finding which should incidentally improve the already cordial relations established between Mr. Gandhi and Lord Linlithgow." Is it suggested that these relations would have been impaired if the award had been different? In our comment on the award, we indicated that though legally it must be accepted as final from the commonsense point of view it failed to commend itself as perfectly satisfactory. There are certain attributes of which the ruler of a State can divest himself only by abdicating,

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The right which the Thakore Saheb claimed is inherent in his position. All engagements entered into by a ruler have this condition implicit in them. It has been held that the ruler of an Indian State can not be cited as a co-respondent in a British Court even in such a purely personal affair as a divorce case. Dr. B. R. Ambedkar has contested the correctness of the Chief Justice's award from the legal point of view in a statement issued this week to the Press.

Holkar-Lawler Marriage:—The American magazine, Time, gives particulars of the parentage and antecedents of Miss Marguerite Lawler whom the Maharaja of Indore announced a few days ago that he had married. She is of humble origin. Her father is described as a retired switchman with a pension of 30 dollars a month. She herself is said to have served as a stewardess in the Union Pacific. It appears that she is the divorced wife of a Mr. Branyan. All this is of no public interest and if the Maharaja was a private person, there will be no occasion for comment. To the American a Maharani is nobody. The brother of Miss Lawler is reported to have expressed his disapproval of the marriage on account of Holkar's race. But in India there will be widespread regret that the Maharaja did not find a spouse more worthy to share with him the historic gadi of the saintly Ahalyabai.

Sir Raza Ali on South African Situation:—It is a healthy convention that a person who has held high and responsible office, should after his retirement refrain from public expressions of opinion which might embarrass his successor. We can not imagine what purpose Syed Raza Ali's protest against the rumoured convening of a third Round Table Conference to discuss and decide on measures to ameliorate the condition of Indians in South Africa, may be intended to serve. On the other hand, we can readily see that it may embarrass his successor who is trying against difficulties, which did not exist in Sir Raza Ali's time, to stem the tide of anti-Indian sentiment which has suddenly and unaccountably become acute. The position of Indians in all parts of Africa is once again in the melting-pot. The whole question must be considered anew and if South Africa leads the way with a Round Table Conference, there is every reason to welcome and none whatever to denounce it as Sir Raza Ali does.

Miss Sorabji's Stock-Taking:—The East India Association of London, is a body with a standing in India as well as in England, and the papers read and the discussions held there are generally on a high level. It is a pity, therefore, that it could not have secured a more unprejudiced person than Miss Cornelia Sorabjee to do the "Stock-taking in India" for its members. We do not refer to Miss Sorabji's political views or her criticisms of Congress administrations. Some of her allegations against the latter are so monstrous that no fairminded person should mention them without at the same time particularising the Administration and the Minister responsible for them. Her generalisation of the Hindu shastras as "conservative to the extent of decadence in most cases in all their works and ways," is not improved by the footnote, whether it was supplied by herself or the Editor of the Journal of the Association in which her paper is published. It runs: "That this need not be so with orthodox Hinduism is nobly exemplified inter alia by the Maharaja of Mysore, who combines strict orthodoxy with a high level of progress as known to the modern civilized world." Miss Sorabjee found a congenial commentator in Sir Michael O'Dwyer who took the opportunity to vent his spleen on Indian nationalists. Miss Kinnaird bravely attempted a defence of the Indian leaders but her information was woefully faulty as when she described the Provincial Prime Minister (Mr. C. Rajagopala Charya) as being "also the landlord of the district" of Salem where Prohibition was first introduced in Madras.

A Governor's Credulity:—Miss Sorabji and Sir Michael O'Dwyer are irresponsible critics and their observations are of no significance as bearing on the course of events in India, Sir Gilbert P. Hogg, who presided, however, has acted as Governor of Assam and, judging from the generally restrained tone of his remarks, he has not quite shaken himself free from the obligations devolving on a servant of the Crown in India. We are, therefore, astonished that he should have permitted himself to repeat a silly and, on the face of it a most improbable, story which, he said, had recently reached him from India. Here is the story: "A certain Minister loaned to one of his supporters his set of false teeth and to make matters worse he has not since been able to remember which one of them it was he gave them." "I do not say," Sir Gilbert added, "that such are the only means whereby a party is kept together in India, but I quote that merely to illustrate the great difficulties which every Minister in India has to face!" Surely, Sir Gilbert knows that a set of false teeth does not fit every one. The loaning of false teeth as a means of keeping a political party together, is plainly an invention of some one who wanted to cast ridicule on the personal rather than on the political habits of Indians. Sir Gilbert apparently believed in this palpable canard as he protested that he did not say that this was the only means by which a party is kept together in India. Indians are very fastidious even about drinking out of cups or lotas used by others. The idea of chewing with false teeth belonging to another will not commend itself to the most parsimonious politician. There will be far less improbability in a story that Mr. Neville Chamberlain keeps his party together, despite his frequent changes of front, by loaning his famous umbrella to its members! We do not claim that Indian Ministers are more scrupulous than British Ministers as to the means whereby they maintain their following. But the loaning of false teeth is too stupid a joke to be repeated by a man of Sir Gilbert Hogg's standing in the Indian administration.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER
BOMBAY, May 6, 1939.

HERR HITLER'S SPEECH.

Herr Hitler made his eagerly awaited speech in the Reichstag on Friday (28th April). Never before has the world hung so breathlessly on the words of one man. The radio enabled the substance of the speech to be known to the ends of the earth in about six hours after its delivery in Berlin. The British Broadcasting Station began giving the speech in English when the Fuehrer was still speaking. It had transmitted nearly the whole of it by ten o'clock at night, Indian Standard Time. The full text of the address was in the daily papers on Saturday morning.

There was little sabre rattling or shaking of the mailed fist in the address. Its calmness and restraint have been explained by prejudiced critics as the result of President Roosevelt's message and the introduction of a very mild form of conscription in Great Britain. With more reason they may be attributed to the speaker's faith in himself and his cause. Herr Hitler declared that he did not pretend to have a mission to save the world. His task was to redeem his people from the slough of depression and despondency in which they had been plunged by the Treaty of Versailles and to ensure that they will have never again to go through a similar experience. Otherwise, he wanted to live at peace with all nations near and remote. He did not profess to be more moral than other nations in carrying out his aims but he maintained that his methods were not less moral than those of the democratic Imperial Powers. He repeated what he had said in his book "Mein Kampf" that he had a high regard for the British Empire as an agency for the preservation of peace in a large part of the world. But, since British statesmen and the British Press have recently proclaimed their distrust of his motives, he thought it right to denounce the Naval Pact between Great Britain and Germany which he had signed some years ago, accepting a limit to the strength of the German Navy in proportion to the British. His only outstanding claim against Great Britain is for the return of the Colonies of which Germany was deprived by the Versailles Treaty, in violation of President Wilson's pledge, and some of which were being held by Great Britain under mandates from the League of Nations whose authority he did not recognise, which, indeed, no longer existed. But Herr Hitler repeated his assurance to Mr. Neville Chamberlain at Munich that he did not regard this matter as one to be settled by force of arms. So far as the British Empire is concerned, therefore, if we accept, as we should, Herr Hitler's assurances as sincere, there is no cause to expect aggression from Germany. But, it is urged, the Fuehrer has violated his promises to Mr. Neville Chamberlain at Munich, and he cannot, therefore, be trusted. We are not told what specific promise to the British Prime Minister has been violated. The annexation of Czechoslovakia? The cession of Sudetenland to Germany under pressure from the British and French Governments, destroyed the economic and strategic foundations of Czechoslovakia and made it impossible for it to continue to exist as an independent State. This was foreseen by many observers who knew Czechoslovakia and its peoples—which Mr. Chamberlain ostentatiously disclaimed for himself and his people—and the annexation of what was left of it by Germany was the natural and inevitable corollary to the cession of Sudetenland. The acquisition of Memel aroused little opposition or comment in Britain, the general feeling expressed about it being that it was bound to come. Herr Hitler's claims with reference to Danzig and the Polish Corridor are held by Mr. Menzies, the new Prime Minister of the Australian Commonwealth, among others, to be not unjustified. In passing, Mr. Menzies' ideas of what is necessary for Australia, sharply conflict with the concert of Democracies suggested by the author of "Union Now." Mr. Menzies includes Japan prominently among the countries with which Australia should strengthen her diplomatic relations. The Canadian Prime Minister has given a broad hint that the only contingency that would bring Canada into a war in Europe, is the actual invasion of Great Britain by a foreign power. The general feeling in India, too, is that the British Empire should avoid war by all honourable means. Herr Hitler's speech shows that Germany does not want to declare war against the British Empire.

The President of the United States for some occult reason has been recently egging on the British Government to hostility to Germany on the ground that Dictatorships are a menace to Democracies. The President does not contemplate the invasion of Germany by America. He is prepared to help Great Britain and France morally and materially—by speeches and sale of armaments — to wage a war of destruction against the dictatorships of Germany and Italy. The American people will not support the President if he undertook a war in Europe in defence of democracy. They have bitter memories of the last war to make the world safe for democracy. They fear with good reason that another war in which America participated would inevitably mean the prolonged, perhaps the permanent, establishment of a dictatorship in the United States itself. Further, a considerable body of American opinion holds that every country should be free to have whatever form of Government suits it, and that Germany and Italy have every right to govern themselves on the Nazi and Fascist ways. There remains France which is suffering badly from a fear complex. But Herr Hitler in his address last week has assured France also that he regards the present Franco-German frontier is settled. France has to settle some ...ssions with Italy; and Germany thinks the ...ndian point of view has much to commend it ...the impartial judgment of statesmen of all ...countries. It has been charged against Italy ...that she took Abyssinia by force. Herr Hitler asserted that the whole African continent has been subjugated by bloody force. It is not Germany but it is the ghost of their own past that obliges the democracies to wince at such a retort.

The scheme of guaranteeing the "threatened" States on which Mr. Neville Chamberlain has now fixed his hopes, has some obvious defects. In the first place many of these States are more in fear of Soviet Russia than of Nazi Germany. Between the two principal European democracies themselves, there is not much mutual esteem. Asquith records that Lloyd George did not wish the holy places of Palestine to be under the protection of "the agnostic, atheistic French." The traditional English prejudice against the French has not disappeared. Then, Poland is one of the poorest countries in Europe. It is not a democracy, Anti-Semitic prejudice is as rife in Poland as in Germany. To get rid of its three million Jews, Poland will pay any price. If Britain does not help her to do so, she will turn to Germany as a more sympathetic neighbour. On the other side, the European Axis Powers are united both in ideas and interests. Germany and Italy are complementary to each other not only geographically but also in regard to national character. The position of the third—Tokio—member of the Axis, is much less secure. With their strong colour and race prejudice, her European friends may let her down any day as they have done in the past. She will do well, therefore, to bring her adventures in China to a close at the earliest possible opportunity and come to a settlement with the Chinese, which will inure to the lasting friendship and goodwill between the two great Asiatic peoples. The European situation which last week seemed very threatening, is much improved, thanks to the moderation and wisdom of responsible statesmen of all countries, supported by weighty and well-informed world opinion. We trust that it will not be allowed again to deteriorate.

THE CONGRESS AFTER CALCUTTA.

Too much can easily be made of the "rightist" victory at Calcutta. And from the comments in the British press both in Britain and in India, it is obvious that too much is being made of it. The one feature that has not received sufficient recognition is that Mr. Bose in leaving the Presidentship, has forced his successor to carry out his policies. "We do not have," said Babu Rajendra Prasad in his first speech as President of the Congress, "to lay down any new policy for us at the present time. The policy is there. It has been laid down by the Congress. We have to devise ways and means for giving effect to it." There were many issues raised by Mr. Bose and by Dr. Pattabhi Sitaramayya in the last election to the Presidentship—the position of the Congress President, the desirability of re-electing Mr. Bose, Federation, the struggle between left and right in the Congress, the attitude towards the Indian States. The second of these was decided by the election of Mr. Bose. The struggle between left and right wings has grown very acute and, though today the Congress Socialists and others might consider it expedient and political to subordinate principles to unity, no one among them feels that all is now well with the Congress. The Congress attitude towards Indian States has changed and probably is still changing but, if we are to draw any conclusion from Rajkot it is that, so long as the people of a State are only concerned with good government and not self-government, the Congress will not intervene. As regards the position of the Congress President, the very fact that the right wing had to call upon a person of the standing of Babu Rajendra Prasad to replace Mr. Bose, proves effectively that the Congress President, after Mr. Bose's determined stand, cannot be regarded as a mere rubber-stamp to his Working Committee.

The question of Federation remains. It is on this ground alone that the British press, which cares little for the constitutional forms adopted by the leading political organisation in India, regards the resignation of Mr. Bose as a desirable conclusion to the dispute. But if the defeat of Dr Sitaramayya was due to Mr Bose's raising the cry that the Congress anti-Federation policy was in danger, Mr. Bose's dethronement is no less due to the definite repudiation of a pro-Federation policy by the right-wing leaders. We do not say that it is impossible for the Congress under Babu Rajendra Prasad to reverse its policy and support Federation. In fact even under Mr. Bose's presidentship, its commitments in Indian States and its references to the Paramount Power were making it extremely difficult for the Congress to maintain unmodified its attitude towards Federation. But heavy political manoeuvring will be necessary to convince the Congress rank and file that the right-wing leaders changed their attitude after Mr. Bose's resignation. A factor that would help greatly in this direction would be concessions from the British Government which could be represented to the country as a substantial change for the better and as a telling argument for abandoning opposition. If the British are anxious to strengthen Gandhiji's hands, as they seem to be from several reports, against extremists in the party, they cannot do better than alter their unbending attitude towards the 1935 Constitution. If they do not, the extremists, temporarily eclipsed as they are today, will soon emerge out of the shadows.

From the point of view of the country itself, it must be said that the defeat of Mr. Bose sets back political progress for the time being

We say this not because we are enamoured of the policies of Mr. Bose. On many matters the ex-president has a tendency to overestimate the strength of his supporters and to ignore the opposition. The more often, for example, he expounds his theory of taking advantage of Britain's weakness, the more people in this country are revolted by it. There is something in winning freedom through one's strength. It is quite another to sneak it out of dropping fingers. Both Palestine and Czechoslovakia serve as lasting and pathetic warnings of the weaknesses of this policy. But at least with Mr. Bose one knew exactly were one stood. Whether in foreign policy, or in his attitude to Britain, or in his methods in Indian politics, Mr. Bose did not waver from his position. If his opinions were vague in matters of detail, the direction of his thoughts was known to supporter and opponent alike. The high courage which he has shown in fighting the present conflict with no support, or, worse, only half-hearted support, in the Congress, the determination with which he has asserted grave principles, and the dignity with which he has accepted the verdict of his fellow Congress leaders and their followers, have brought a new and healthy factor into Congress politics. Of the several dissentients from authority that the Congress hierarchy has had to cope with since office acceptance, there has not been one of the calibre of Mr. Bose.

The reason for the irreconciliability between the right wing leaders and Mr. Bose lies in the fact that both, for all their differences, are first rank political agitators. The right-wing likes to work in a fog. Mr. Bose not only wants to see his way clearly but he wishes to shout it out to all who will hear him. But neither of them know where they want to go. That in the long run is why the A. I. C. C. delegates voted for both within an interval of three months and were even prepared to vote simultaneously for both at the Calcutta meeting on Sunday.

THE FILM JOURNALISTS CONFERENCE.

(By K. Natarajan.)

It was a complete surprise to me when three friends called on Friday before last and invited me to inaugurate the first All-India Film Journalists Conference to be held two days later. Their answers to my enquiry why they had pitched on me who had no connection whatsoever with films either as Art, Industry or entertainment, were flattering but not convincing. I concluded that they must have been disappointed by others better qualified for the distinction and that they had been driven to go to me as a last resort at the eleventh hour. Without any set principle of coming to the rescue of people in difficulties, I have often agreed to last minute appointments; trusting to the wide range of a journalist's interests, to supply me with some suitable ideas to express on most topics without much previous preparation. In regard to the cinematograph, I had a few general ideas gathered in the course of my casual perusal of the principal Indian newspapers and reviews bearing chiefly on its influence on Indian society. These were far from complimentary to it. For instance, in the course of a series of short biographical sketches of the artists, which was published in a North India daily, it was remarked that a particular "star" was one of the few in that line who were known for the purity of their personal life. A leading worker in the cause of social purity had written to me that the dedication of women to temple deities, was being replaced by the dedication of women to the Radio and the Cinema. Not long ago, a lady who has established a reputation as a singer on the Radio told me that, when she first appeared at the microphone, her friends and relatives had discouraged her saying that broadcasting was not becoming to family women. She has lived down the prejudice and her community has come to see that there is nothing incompatible between singing on the Radio and leading a happy family life. The prejudice against the cinema too will disappear in course of time. Much depends on the character of the people, especially the women, who take to the profession.

Some time back a man applied to be employed as a cook. Asked what he had done before, he said that he had worked as a cinema star! Perhaps he had served as one of a crowd in a scene of religious worship or a political demonstration. Every one who has had anything to do with a cinema theatre calls himself and is known among his friends as a "star" just as a person who has written a letter on "the Beggar Nuisance" or "Prohibition Craze" to a newspaper, thinks of himself and is spoken of by his friends as a journalist. I informed the friends that this was all my equipment and that it was very scanty for the inauguration of a Cinema Journalists conference. I hardly see three shows in a year and had not seen a single issue of any journal devoted to the Cinema. I can make only some general observations regarding journalism as a profession which may be of interest to the Conference as one of journalists. They said that was all they wanted of me. They promised, too, to send me some literature the next day to supply me with some colour for my inaugural observations. They kept their word. They sent me some reports and tracts, three copies of Film India and an advance copy of the Presidential address of Mr. Baburao Patel, the Editor of that journal. I first looked into the journal. I wanted to know whether film journals were concerned with the technical side of the industry and trade or whether they were reviews of the pictures shown in the local theatres. There was not much of technical information in the journal. Film India dealt mostly with Indian productions most of which emanate from studios in the Bombay Presidency. There were two pages in each of the issues of answers to questions from readers. I gasped as I glanced through them. This was journalism of a kind utterly unfamiliar to me. Here is a specimen :

Query : I am starting on a foreign tour this year. Will — accompany me if I pay all her expenses ?

Answer : Why do you particularly insist on —? She gets plenty of fun and excitement here without having to go to any foreign country. Why, I will accompany you, if you pay for all the expenses. But if you insist on taking a film artist, then why don't you submit your proposal to — ? She has been thinking, loudly enough, of going across and might accept your offer.

Here is another :

Query :—Can I have the privilege of meeting— personally ? Please give me her address.

Answer :—Last month some one wrote to me saying that —'s mother was a great obstacle when he wanted to see her. I think the mother is still there and as she is reported to be quite hale and hearty she threatens to be "still there" for a long time to come. I suggest your writing to —— at —— and making discreet enquiries about her mother first. I wish you every luck and you will perhaps need it.

There is yet another:

Querist: I want to form pen friendship with some Cinema actresses. How can I?

Answer: Sign your name on their photos when you find them published. What is the use of writing to the girls, as most of them can't write? Those few who can, have no time. They are busy between the producers and the directors.

I have omitted the names.

When I read these in the film magazine sent to me, my immediate reaction was to beg myself out of the engagement. But it would have caused much inconvenience as it was announced in the papers that I was to inaugurate the Conference and there was no time to the convenors to get another man to take my place. I had told the friends who came to invite me that if I went I should say what I felt, and they had warmly agreed, I decided to be at my post at the Conference hoping that, in consideration of my years, if nothing else, the audience may take what I might say in good part. At the worst, they could dimiss it all as senile rubbish.

I was agreeably disappointed. My audience was not only patient but cordial and seemed to appreciate my views that sound criticism was discriminating appreciation, that personalities, except where a principle was involved, should be avoided, and that the purpose of comment was to convince the author of the thing commented on how he could do better. The President, indeed, before delivering his address expressed his dissent from my views on criticism saying that I did not know the kind of people the film journalist has to deal with. No doubt he is right. Certainly he knows all there is to know about them. I could only treat them as "a cross section" of Indian society, just a mixture of good and bad like the rest of us.

The President himself devoted a good part of his suggestive address to the question of criticism. He complained that film producers resented all criticism and that what they wanted was fulsome praise of their productions irrespective of merit. "A film journalist," said Mr. Baburao Patel, "is not a film salesman." The President said that the daily papers indulged in continuous praise to the point of flattery. The Anglo-Indian Press, he added, was more guilty of this policy than the national and provincial dailies. The Indian papers cannot altogether ignore, as the Anglo-Indian press can, the possible consequences to Indian social life of certain pictures with a retrograde or otherwise objectionable tendency.

Towards the end I managed to get in a word about total abstinence as an indispensable qualification for journalists. Every time I have spoken to journalists recently I have felt it my duty to make this exhortation. Somehow, drink seems to have a special temptation of journalism. I have known young men of brilliant promise break down in mid-career in consequence of the growth upon them of the drinking habit. Prohibition, when it comes, will be of special advantage to hard-working journalists as it will put this particular temptation out of their way. I apologised to the audience for this seeming propaganda on behalf of Prohibition and I was grateful to the Chairman of the Reception Committee for welcoming my remarks when he proposed a vote of thanks.

GUNGA DIN.

A n esteemed friend sends us the following extract from a letter which he has received from an American lady in charge of a library in the U. S. A.:—

"To-night I saw a movie about Gunga Din, the water boy of the British Regiment. I did not want to go but I decided to attend the picture because I wanted to check a few details of the movie to prove to myself that it was a grand and glorious glorification of War and especially the righteousness of the British in India. The movie was exactly as I thought it would be, a good propaganda picture of the so-called righteous cause of England's Rule in India (to suppress the wicked and the mad Indians). The Indians as pictured were greatly at a disadvantage in the part they played as villians. It was a disgusting picture, actually filmed and approved by the English officials in the Army. Pardon this frankness, but to many people, it was a grand example of heroism typified by the brave daring Englishman and the one Indian character of Gunga Din. The rest of the Indians, even their Guru were ruthless and evil. Such a picture does more damage than even a war. It foments hatred among peoples. It comes at a time when the British people are having their difficulties within their colonial Empire, and this movie serves well the purpose of lauding the British Rule for the benefit of the Whites with the real purpose of trying to recreate American interest in the Colonial Empire—just as did the movie "The Charge of the Light Brigade." The British are no longer subtle in their propagandist methods. They openly display their wares on the market and many of us Americans are becoming very gullible."

INDIAN TROOP MOVEMENTS.

(By J. M. Ganguli, Calcutta.)

The news of Indian troop movements out of India in view of war possibilities, raises again the question of principle as to whether India should be singled out from other colonies and dependencies of the British Empire for drawing soldiers from, for Imperial purposes. The further question also arises—on moral grounds at any rate if not on constitutional grounds, for India being a mere dependency has no right of say on Imperial decisions—as to whether soldiers who are Indians by birth, who are trained and maintained avowedly for the keeping of peace in India, and whose heavy expenses are borne by the Indian Exchequer, should be sent abroad for serving Imperial interests without even the knowledge of the Indian Legislature and of the Indian public.

The same questions arose when Indian troops were shipped to Abyssinia during the Italian invasion of that country and when they were sent to the Far East on the outbreak of Sino-Japanese hostilities—not to refer to so many other previous occasions. But beyond some sporadic criticisms by some legislators and politicians the questions went a-begging, unanswered, of course, and even unraised seriously by the press and by the public. In the case of Abyssinia it was suggested that Indian troops were to guard local Indian interests in Ethiopia. Such explanations have come and will come no doubt on other occasions, but it can easily be seen that considerations about safeguarding Imperial interests, immediately or ultimately, are behind decisions to send Indian troops abroad.

The point, however, is not so much the sending out of Indian troops as their being sent without even a mere formal reference to the Indian Legislature. And the further fact that India alone, as distinguished from other parts of the Empire should be tapped for soldiers for guarding the common interests of the Empire, raises issues which call for consideration. If Indian soldiers had been sent to Abyssinia to protect Indian nationals and their interests there, it could well be asked if there were not nationals of any other part of the British Empire there who needed to be protected and whose trade and commercial interests had to be safegurded. That point remained unexplained then as also later when troops were sent-to Hong kong; and it will so remain today also when Indian troops are being dispatched under War Office orders to unannounced destinations.

India as a part of the Empire may be interested in safeguarding its interests, but so are also other parts of the Empire. And if India is to benefit from the solidarity and prosperity of the Empire, other parts of the Empire are also so to benefit and in much greater measure also, as was seen after the last war. Other parts of the Empire like Australia, South Africa, East Africa, etc. aremuch more advantageously positioned in the British Commwealth from the point of view of political rights and privileges than India, but it is still not those parts, but India, which are asked for troops and other military help on such occasions. True, England cannot order her Dominions to send troops abroad, as she can, without the least thinking, order the Government of India. But could she not even make requests to them so as to remind them of their sense of Empire duty? In the case of the Chinese war Singapore and Hongkong being nearer to Australia than to India, was it not in the fitness of things to ask Australia to serve the Imperial policy of strengthening the strategic points in the Far East? Why were not the African colonies similarly asked to give vent to their Empire sentiment by offering to look after Imperial interests in Abyssinia? In the case of any advantage accruing to the Commonwealth from such wars, as in the last Great War, will Australia or South Africa, or any other colony for the matter be less or more benefited than India? While the colonies profited territorially, materially, and commercially at the expense of defeated Germany and improved their political status and constitutional position through the post-war Act of Westminister, India's post-war political history is one of forced resort to non-cooperation and Civil Disobedience movement, of wide-scale political repression, of disappointingly inadequate political reforms, of the imposition of a reactionary statutory commission that cleverly sowed seeds of disunion, bitterness and quarrel between classes and classes and communities, and communities etc; not to say of the transference of a good part of war expenditure to her account, and of the studied manner in which she was kept out of the principles like that of self-determination which were enunciated under the Versailles Treaty.

On what principle, therefore, moral, ethical, or political, is India alone ordered on all such occasions, and that too without any consultation with the Indian Legislature, to send her soldiers abroad for military duty in the cause of the Empire, in dangerous war zones? Are there only Indian nationals and Indian national interests present in all such war zones? And, even if that be so, is it a sound and statesmanlike policy of the Empire that the nationals of any part of it are to be protected in times of danger, only by the soldiers of that part of the Empire? No Empire statesman can ever think of saying so, for that would mean the dangerous breaking up of Empire solidarity and the evaporation of all Empire sense from the Commonwealth. The protection of the nationals of any part of it, is an Empire interest, to be looked after by the Empire as a whole. This must be the essential basic idea in which the Empire can stand; and the feeling of and-responsiveness to this idea all over the Empire can alone sustain the Empire solidly.

It is therefore a matter of wise statesmanship to take the greatest precaution never to strain the feeling in any part of the Empire, in the way in which it has been done in India by now and then requisitioning Indian troops for service abroad, in which service the colonies take no part. It is not good policy to thus repeatedly and bluntly remind India of her helpless political dependence. Is one to suppose that British statesmanship is bankrupt today to the extent that it should, time and again, take the risky decision to single out a particular part of the Empire for drawing troops and war resources from in times of emergency, without pondering over the reaction to Empire feeling that is likely to result therefrom in that part? Otherwise, one would expect the British Government religiously to avoid making any discrimination in such respects, even if a particular dependency be too weak to protest. For that purpose, the question of employing soldiers of any part of the Empire abroad, for Imperial purposes, should be considered and decided on the broad principles of equality, sympathetic mutuality and absolute impartiality. Any deviation from these sound principles, whether out of narrow selfishness or out of fear to dishumour powerful Colonies, or in following the natural human inclination to take advantage of a country's weakness and helplessness, is sure to give a serious jolt, sooner or later, to the links and bonds, which have kept the various components of British Empire, accomodating different peoples having national consciousness and national aspirations of their own, integrated and united into the greatest Commonwealth of Nations in the world. The life of Indian soldiers is as precious to their mothers and to their countrymen as that of soldiers in the Colonies is to their mothers and to their countries. And, therefore, it is but natural and human that the sacrifice of Indian lives in the interests of the Empire, when the Colonials remain safe and aloof, should excite strong Indian feeling against such Imperial policy. In fact, it is discriminating policies like this which have been chiefly instrumental in generating and strengthening the present Indian feeling, that is extending, to get out of the Empire. When the Colonies taking inspiration and encouragement from such Imperial outlook accord to India a most insulting and high-handed treatment, as in Africa and elsewhere, one cannot surely wonder at the anti-Empire feeling in India but is rather led to wonder that the feeling has not yet gone much deeper. And yet if there had been far-sighted statesmen in England to see that absolute equality of status and consideration being accorded to India as to other parts of the Empire, India might have been the strongest supporter of the Empire-idea today; for, unlike the self-seeking colonials the Indian mind, traditionally and naturally has been an optimistic believer in internationalism and universal brotherhood.

MAZDAZNIAN FRENCH LECTURERS.

Three French visitors, Mazdaznians believing in the teachings of Zoroastrianism, arrived in India on a lecturing tour by the English mail steamer Cathay, last week. They are M. and Madame Pierre Martin, and M. Cyrano Huguenenin. M. Pierre Martin, interviewed by a representative of the Times of India, said that the Mazdaznian movement was non-sectarian and non-proselytising and had followers all over the world. They believed, he added, in peace, clean living by means of breathing exercises, vegetarianism, non-alcoholism and non-smoking.

THE RAJKOT TANGLE.

(By K. Chandy, Kottayyam.)

If Durbar Shri Viravalla or the Thakore Saheb or any other Indian State ministers or Princes should imagine that Rajkot has scored a victory for autocracy, that would be a fatal mistake. Unless the Rajkot affair is settled soon in a manner that is generally satisfactory, there is a likelihood of serious trouble. This is not because Gandhiji was right throughout—that he was not is shown below—but because he was holding the right end of the stick as non-revolutionary constitutional advance and on account of the tremendous veneration in which he is held. For those who discern spiritual laws, it must also be clear that a cry of despair emanating from a person like Gandhiji must result in great evil.

Possibly, within a very short time, men's minds might get so occupied with the horror of war that no time or attention could be spared for a comparatively trifling affair like the Rajkot tangle; and besides, things get settled through the interplay of political forces, and for reasons of expediency and never in the cold light of reason.

Nevertheless an unbiased analysis might be interesting to your readers.

Among the many telegrams and letters received by Gandhiji's Private Secretary when the fast was started, was one which probably was not considered of sufficient importance to be communicated to him. It said that the intuitions even of saints, are sometimes misleading, and that it behoves men to apply reason even to the promptings of the inner voice, and added that the questions involved were not such as could or should be resolved by means of a fast.

A saint is a law unto himself; all that others could do is to quote if they dare to do so the words of another person—Oliver Cromwell who was also guided by his inner voice—words addressed to other saints similarly guided. "By the bowels of God, I entreat you, gentlemen, consider that you might be mistaken." The Rajkot experience will, it is hoped, persuade Mahatmaji to make it an absolute rule that no one who looks to him for guidance should undertake a fast before getting his previous sanction. Fasts undertaken by others outside his control could then be dealt with under the guidance of reason and commonsense, and Indian administrators would be saved a lot of needless trouble, as in the instance of the ridiculous Hamilton Satayagraha at Mysore. The Mahatma himself, it is hoped, will realise the fact that although his object might be non-political, a fast becomes a very dangerous weapon, when it involves also a political consequence. There can be no doubt that the Harijan fast has greatly contributed to the subsequent Hindu-Muslim tension; and the Rajkot affair has also helped to some extent in adding fuel to that fire.

A political problem, as was observed in the above mentioned letter to Gandhiji, is too complex to be disentangled through a fast. At Rajkot even Gandhiji's objective has not been gained: the Thakore Saheb's heart has not changed and certainly not Viravalla's; and no helpful political result has followed.

The political question includes several complex elements, which require patience, knowledge, and the will to help for being dealt with satisfactorily.

In order to understand these various elements some 'attitudes' have to be re-emphasised. The Princes are not independent sovereigns. Even Hitler, the only absolute sovereign, considered it necessary to profess to take the approval of the Reich before launching on his next offensive. Sovereignty is divisible and functional even within the borders of its own territory, and is restricted in a dozen ways concerning its outside relations—economic, social, political. The sovereignty of Indian Princes is further restricted on account of Para mountcy. The Reading-Nizam episode shows clearly that the last word about the extent of sovereignty must rest with the Paramount Power—and there is no recent instance of the Secretary of State having heard or decided any appeal against the interpretations of the Crown Representative in India. Nevertheless, subject to these restrictions, the Thakore Saheb does possess a certain measure of sovereign independence, and must exercise (his own) discretion or individual judgement—which he cannot constitutionally will away to Sirdar Patel or Gandhiji. Similarly the Chief Justice or any other judicial tribunal could not create law. They could only interpret what has already been laid down or written. It is simple ignorance on the part of Gandhiji to imagine that Sir M. Gwyer could give a decision as between the recommendations of the Thakore Committee and the desires of the Parishad. Treaty rights and obligations, and the limits of responsible government which could be granted in an Indian State so as not to endanger Paramountcy are all matters about which the last word is with the Crown Representative, and not with any judicial officer however distinguished. The same flaw applies to the interpretation put on the agreement between the Thakore Saheb and Sirdar Patel. Put in one word, the former cannot give away what he does not possess. It ought to be obvious to any Congressman that the Thakore could not accept any recommendation which the Paramount Power considers to be in conflict with Treaty obligations and Paramountcy. Similarly, should the Patel Committee make any recommendation which hands over the interests of minorities to the majority community, the Thakore Saheb would be morally justified in rejecting such a recommendation. Even should the Chief Justice consider that the Thakore had given away this inherent right of his, the Paramount Power would be justified in interfering so as to restore the right, although that might involve the appointment of a new Thakore Saheb on the Rajkot gadi.

The ultimate basis of all this confusion is the desire of majority communities mostly in ignorance but sometimes with knowledge, to get control under forms of democracy. I have been pointing to this danger for over ten years but it is still there. Very many Indians seem to be unable to think democratically—democracy being only a method for obtaining obedience to rule by consent. Although so frequently abused in various ways, it does not, even theoretically, give a majority community the right to exercise rule over a minority community on account of numbers. The sub-conscious idea in the minds of many Hindus that the Indian government ought to be a Hindu government, and the expressed idea of several Moslems that India should be a confederation of Hindu states and Moslem states are both fundamentally undemocratic. The communal award, the Harijan fast, etc., etc., have all helped in this confusion. Those that are not communal in this sense, are mostly totalitarian in their instincts. Whether the world itself for its sins, has become unfit for democracy, or whether, after the new world revolution, a higher form, for instance organic and functional government (no one exercising control for its own sake) is going to evolve, I do not know. In India, at the moment there are two ways in which the danger of confusing communal majority with a parliamentary majority could be met or minimised. The first and the best method is what Mr. S. Sreenivasiengar and Mr. S. Satyamurti have been urging—viz that of completely secularising politics. Another method is to recognize the communal feeling, make no pretence of democratic consent, but to obtain communal consent through a system approximating to the Panchayat.

There can be no question that the distrust of minority communities in the good faith of the majority community has been exploited at Rajkot. Gandhiji was unable to meet this onslaught on account of defective knowledge.

No one can assert that Sirdar Patel or Gandhiji should have the last word in the Rajkot constitution. The last word concerning Treaty obligations and Paramountcy rests with the Crown Representative; and if it is conceded that the Thakore Saheb gave the utmost possible maximum of responsible or popular government within the State, the last word on the extent of devolution, must rest with the people, or with the Thakore, or with any impartial and informed judge. It cannot rest with the Parishad because the Parishad is only a progressive Party and does not represent the entire populace. Hence the ideas of a packed Committee, or of a majority of four or of one, are all irrelevant. The proposal that a community would be allowed representatives provided they vote with the Parishad shows the confusion in Gandhiji's mind. A committee is appointed with the specific intention of giving expression to all shades of opinion. The extent to which and the manner in which these recommendations could be embodied in a constitution is manifestly the function of a Parliament or a constituent Assembly, or where neither exists, of an impartial judge. Gandhiji's idea that his majority of one for the Parishad ought to have the deciding voice is not strictly consistent with his statement that every representative represents every interest, and neither is helpful for solving the Rajkot question. What is required is a generous interpretation of the notification and a very early settlement, satisfying all reasonable anticipations and giving all reasonable safeguards to minority interests and also preserving Treaty obligations.

Darbar Sree Viravalla is apparently competent to carry on the controversy from point to point for many years to come, but should he be allowed to do so?

The Crown Representative interfered in this controversy most effectually once. Should he not do so again, in the interests of India as a whole and of Indian States in particular?

The present Viceroy is himself an expert in Political Science, and could command the services of the best available material in India. May I humbly submit for the reasons mentioned above, and for other reasons that could be cited, that a scheme of responsible government safeguarding all interests might be formulated forthwith and recommended for adoption by the Thakore Saheb as has already been suggested by the Editor of the Indian Social Reformer a fortnight ago?

Finally, it has to be stated that Gandhiji appears to have spiked his guns by indefinitely suspending civil disobedience in Indian States. It was the fear of civil disobedience under his guidance that compelled autocratic ministers in Indian States to attempt to come to terms with the people. They have no such fears about his present constructive proposals. These could go on for years without any kind of danger. It may be recollected that the minister of an Indian State remarked at the conference of ministers at Bombay that his difficulty is that while the Paramount Power would put up with a few shootings, it would not allow hundreds to be shot down. Gandhi's faith in Ahimsa, as a method of converting such ministers does credit to human nature—but down the centuries such an event has not happened. The Crown Representative is again the only person who could substantiate this simple faith through advice that constitutional progress is inevitable, and also that in these dangerous times every Prince should get the wholehearted backing of his people and should not depend on treaty rights solely.

FASCISM IN MEXICO.

In Mexico, last February, the Fascist, anti-Semitic movement, which was so widely advertised up to that time, suffered a set-back which has been decreasing in prestige ever since. A "banquet of 5,000" was called by a coalition of all the reactionary groups in the country. However, a mere 14 per cent of that number attended, although the affair had been twice postponed in order to gather more diners. Many of those attending obviously had been given tickets, since workers, of whom there were few, could not have paid the price of the ticket, almost a day's wages.

The breakdown of this affair, which was called by the "Centre for Revolutionary Unification," has had unfortunate repercussions for the reactionary elements. The leaders of the pro-Fascist group are largely discredited, ranging from generals who have been kicked out of the army, congressmen who have been expelled from the Party of the Mexican Revolution, lawyers with questionable means of support, to known agents of the German Nazis. One General playing ball with the group is Pablo Gonzalez, the man who planned the treachery which resulted in the assassination of the revolutionary hero, Zapata.

President Cardenas seems determined not to make martyrs of the leaders of this outfit by deporting them, though demands have been made that he do so. He wants to apply in this situation, as in others, his technique of handling his enemies without killing them. Even the Cedillo rebellion was destroyed, not by suffocation in the blood of the rebels, as was the Mexican custom, but with a minimum of bloodshed and a maximum of understanding of the reasons for the handful of Cedillo's followers having taken such a step.

"We shall have to push ahead with our revolutionary programme," said Cardenas in answer to reporters who asked how he intended to cope with the new group, "so that our country will supply the needs of the people and therefore not furnish any excuse for their turning to such demagogues."

No Frontier News Service points out that the continuance of the campaign against Mexico in the United States will hinder President Cardenas and will play into the hands of the Fascists. Lies about road conditions and the danger of tourist travel, the boycott against Mexican oil which has forced Mexico to deal with the Fascist nations, the insults to Mexico from prominent United States Congressmen all tend to strengthen the hands of what would otherwise be an insignificant group.

THE CONGRESS CHANGES PRESIDENTS.

On Sunday at its special session at Calcutta, the All India Congress Committee put an end to the deadlock which had arisen since the election of Mr. Subhas Chandra Bose for a second time to the Congress Presidentship last February, by accepting his resignation and by electing Babu Rajendra Prasad in his place. It was an unprecedented step but the circumstances that led to this action were unusual. The fact that the change of Presidents was undesirable was clearly shown by the prolonged negotiations between, first, Gandhiji and then, the leading members of the old Working Committee and Mr. Subhas Bose to prevent it. The belief that it was the only solution to the difficulties in which the Congress organisation found itself after Tripuri, had gained general acceptance in the Party.

The main resolution of the Tripuri Congress expressed its confidence in Gandhian methods and regarded it as "imperative that the Congress Executive should command his complete confidence and requested the President to nominate the Working Committee in accordance with the wishes of Gandhiji." The President, Mr. Bose, in announcing his resignation has made public the steps he took to carry out this resolution. Owing to his illness, Mr. Bose was unable to get in touch with Gandhiji and had to seek his advice by correspondence. That method proved unsatisfactory and it was only at Calcutta last week that the two were able to discuss the main points that arose out of the resolution. In the discussions, according to Mr. Bose, Gandhiji advised Mr. Bose to form his own Working Committee, leaving out the members who had resigned from the previous Working Committee. Gandhiji, however, did not disguise the fact that, though that was his wish, such a Committee would in no way command his confidence. For this reason and also because Mr. Bose felt that the critical situation today demanded an inclusive Committee, the President tried to persuade Gandhiji to "shoulder the responsibility vested in him by the Tripuri Congress and to nominate the Working Committee." "And I told him," said Mr. Bose, "that whatever Committee he appointed would be binding on me, since it was my determination to implement Mr. Pant's resolution." Gandhiji felt unable to do so and the next step was that Mr. Bose on the suggestion of Gandhiji tried to negotiate with the members of last year's Working Committee for an informal agreement. The agreement was to be submitted to the A. I. C. C. for approval. Having failed to achieve an agreed solution, Mr. Bose felt that he had no choice but to resign.

It is interesting to note the striking parallel which the Congress crisis presents to the recent trouble in Rajkot. In both cases there was a dispute between the "right-wing" Congress—in Rajkot represented by Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel alone; in the Congress by the whole Working Committee—and a section which resented its authority or interference. In both matters reached a stage at which it was felt that the "right" Congress was losing its grip on the situation: in both Gandhiji had to step in to save the situation for Congress democracy. The parallel goes further still. Both in Rajkot and in the Congress, Gandhiji obtained a verdict from the final authority, the Paramount Power in the one case, the body of A. I. C. C. voters in the other, against his adversary. And then again instead of using the advantage he had gained in the hope of winning more. In Rajkot Gandhiji pressed the Thakore Saheb and his adviser, Mr. Viravala, to form their own Committee of Reforms and to submit its findings to the Rajkot Parishad for approvae criticism and amendment, the differences being referred again to the Chief Justice. Mr. Subhas Bose was asked to do the same thing, in effect, when he was told to negotiate a settlement with the old Working Committee and seek the A. I. C. C.'s approval. Rajkot has refused Gandhiji's offer and the authorities have been now left to produce their own reform scheme. Mr. Bose too, it must be remembered, had been advised to form his own Working Committee. The two political streams opposing Gandhiji have now taken divergent courses. One reason is to be found in the fact that the Thakore Saheb is irremovable (at any rate, by the Congress), while the Congress President is an elected man. Another is that the Thakore Saheb in the minorities he used against Gandhiji had a weapon peculiarly effective in harassing Congressmen. Mr. Bose had also brought in the Muslim League as an argument for his being President in a pre-election statement but he was not able to persuade any but a few Bengal Muslims of the validity of this contention. Perhaps the fact that in Rajkot Gandhiji had to deal with fellow Kathiawadis who, as he himself says, are expert in steering a course through tortuous politics, had something to do as well with the result.

At the A I. C. C. meeting, Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru tried to achieve in the open session what Gandhiji had failed to bring about by private negotiation. He put forward a compromise resolution asking Mr. Bose to withdraw his resignation and nominating last year's Working Committee. The resolution was so unconnected with the trend of events that only Pandit Jawaharlal could have moved it and to many it was a surprise that even he had done so. It was regarded by the general public as a method of getting the A. I. C. C. support to a settlement in which neither side won a complete victory over the other. It would have had the added merit of saving tho A. I. C. C. delegates from the necessity of reversing their February vote in favour of Mr. Bose. But this was a wrong impression. Pandit Jawaharlal who referred in his speech to the international situation, was anxious to bring about a united Congress. The meeting was adjourned to Sunday to allow the retiring President time to reconsider his resignation. Mr. Bose saw no reason next day to change his mind. "This resolution is in effect," he said, "identical with the suggestion made informally by Mahatma Gandhi and others during my conversations with some members of the previous Working Committee. Ordinarily Mahatmaji's word is law to me but where principles are involved, I sometimes feel unable to accept his advice or suggestion." This declaration which Mr. Bose made in announcing his decision to stick to his resignation, does not somehow accord with his statement the previous day that whatever Committee the Mahatma "appointed", would be binding on him. Pandit Jawaharlal withdrew his resolution and the House proceeded to vote Babu Rajendra Prasad to Presidentship. The next day the old Working Committee was reinstated with the exception of the Bose brothers and Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru, all of whom declared their preference for staying outside the executive. Two new Bengal Congressmen were appointed to the Committee, both of them known to be opponents of Mr. Bose in Bengal politics. On all three days there were angry scenes outside the Conference pandal and in the visitors' galleries.

Judging by the results the "right-wing" has won a complete victory in the Congress. The victory seems the more thorough in so far as Mr. Bose has been left completely in the cold, with only the Royists to support him. The Congress Socialists who were at first enthusiastic about Mr. Bose, cooled down considerably when it came to supporting him against Gandhiji.' They have their reward in the appointmeut of Mr. Narendra Deo to the Purge Committee which has been appointed to cleanse the Congress. Pandit Jawaharlal is with two, rightist members also on that Committee. But it is obvious that the right wing is not pleased with the result. In accepting the Presidentship, Babu Rajendra Prasad said:

> Considering the situation that confronts us the country, the internal position in the Congress itself, and other things which we have to face, it is not a bed of roses to be elected President. I have realised more than anybody else the difficulties, the trials and tribulations which await anyone in these times, and much more than anybody else one who is called upon to hold the post as that of the President of the Congress. It has, therefore, not been a pleasure to me to accept your mandate We appealed to Sj. Subhas Chandra Bose to continue to shoulder the burden of the office of the President. I requested him to form a Working Committee of his own liking, composed of people who share his views in entirety and we were prepared to go with him as far as possible. I assured him further that if he did that, I would not for myself and if I may speak for anybody else, they also—would not stand in his way. There would be absolutely no obstruction. But unfortunately he could not see eye to eye with me. He thought in the circumstances the best course for him was to resign. I am very sorry for that.

Mr. Rajendra Prasad undersates the case. We have no doubt that in acting as he did Mr. Bose felt that even if the old Working Committee were prepared to accept his presidentship, they were not prepared to allow the A. I. C. C. delegates to do so. To the many difficulties of the Congress this is added: That the conduct of the proceedings at the Calcutta meeting both under the presidentship of Babu Rajendra Prasad and under the chairmanship of Mrs. Sarojini Naidu has left cause for discontent. The press reports seem to indicate that certain members of the Congress, including men like Dr. M. S. Aney, were not allowed to speak. These things might have well been avoided.

BOMBAY GOVERNMENTS PROHIBITION POLICY.

A communique issued by the Bombay Government states :

Mr. Baria, the President, and other members of the Licensed Victuallers Association, discussed with the Hon'ble Minister for Health and Excise for two hours on April 28, the effects of the introduction of Prohibition on the trade. The principal subjects discussed were the question of compensating licensees for the stocks which they held, the premises which they had leased, contracts which they had entered into, etc. on the introduction of Prohibition; and the measures to be taken to give employment to those thrown out of work.

The Minister in the first place made it clear to the deputation that there could be no discussion of Prohibition in principle since in introducing Prohibition into Bombay he was merely carrying out the policy accepted by the legislature. In accordance with this policy Prohibition had to be introduced within three years from the Congress taking office and of this period only one year now remained. The Minister pointed out that the policy of Government had from the beginning been to start with the cities for the reason that the cities accounted for the bulk of excise revenue and it was thought that Prohibition would be most difficult to enforce in them. The deputation, however, pointed out that Bombay was interested not only in the liquor trade of the City but in that of the whole of the Province and areas beyond it and therefore Bombay City should be taken last and not first in the Prohibition Scheme. This would enable the losses of the trade to be minimised. The Minister once again drew attention to the fact that the policy of the Bombay Government was to start with the cities, but promised to lay the point of view of the deputation before his colleagues.

In the matter of compensation the Minister was adamant. He pointed out that licenses had always been given annually and were non-transferable. They created no vested interests. There can therefore never be any question of compensation when a license is closed. In saying this he left aside the question of the few "privileged licenses" in Bombay which he had not fully considered. The deputation admitted that there was no legal claim to compensation but represented the existence of a moral claim; but the Minister declared that in his view legal and moral claims were equally non-existent. It has been made clear not only now but as early as 10 years ago that there was no vested interest in the liquor trade. The reply to this question covered a suggestion of the deputation that if Prohibition failed the licenses should be restored to the existing licenses and to them only. The Minister, while refusing to concede the possibility of Prohibition being a failure, stated that a concession to this demand would mean offering an inducement to assist in the break-down of Prohibition and was entirely unacceptable to Government.

On the question of unemployment, the Minister regretted that the Association had failed to give him the information which he had asked for on the extent of the unemployment that would be created on the 1st of August and informed the Deputation that Government had decided to appoint an officer on special duty to ascertain the principal facts. The deputation asked what facilities would be given to enable the trade to dispose of stocks in existence on the 1st of August. Here again the Minister regretted that the Association had not supplied him with the information for which he had the asked about the stocks held in Bombay. He pointed out that on the introduction of Prohibition the wholesale trade with the retailers outside the area of Prohibition would continue. There would also be the supply of liquor to permit-holders, but details arrangement for this had not yet been settled. The deputation asked that the existing retail licensees should be given such trade as remained in supplying liquor to permit holders and on medical prescriptions so as to help them to dispose of their stocks. The Minister promised to take these suggestions into careful consideration.

NOTES.

Peace Prospects :—Herr Hitler will reply on Friday to President's personal message to him and Signor Mussolini. The contents of his speech will not be available in India before the Reformer is printed. It does not seem that the German Chancellor will merely shake his mailed fist at the American President. The President demanded that the two dictators should undertake not to invade any one of 31 countries for at least ten years. Herr Hitler immediately invited several of these countries to say whether they feared aggression from Germany. Sweden, Denmark, Switzerland, Greece, Turkey, Yugoslavia, Bulgaria, Holland, and nearly all the other countries have replied that they do not entertain any such fear. They have also said that the President had not consulted them before sending his message. Herr Hitler's object is clearly to show that the President's action was wholly uncalled for and mischievous. It is strange that President Roosevelt did not foresee this obvious retort to which he was exposing himself.

Soviet Russia :—The Bolsheviks who were hated and feared twenty years ago, are now the chief hope of the pluto-democracies of Great Britain, France and the United States. Even seven months ago, Soviet Russia was despised as a decrepit Power. It had a Treaty with Czechoslovakia to come to the latter's assistance if her independence was in danger and if France came to her help. The Soviet Government more than once declared before September that it was ready to fulfil its obligation if Germany invaded Czechoslovakia. If France had gone to the help of Prague, Russia was bound by treaty to follow. Great Britain would have had to join France. Mr. Chamberlain did not want to fight Germany. Propaganda to the effect that Soviet Russia was in the last stages of decrepitude, led France to join Great Britain in urging Czecho-Slovakia to surrender the territory which Herr Hitler coveted. Everybody warned the British Premier that the surrender was sure to lead to the extinction of Czecho-Slovakia. When this happened a few months ago, Mr. Chamberlain lifted up his hands in horror at the German Chancellor's breach of faith. The same thing happened after the occupation of Memel. If Mr. Chamberlain were a convinced pacifist and a votary of absolute non-violence like Gandhiji, one may understand and even applaud his actions. His pouring out money on armaments may be explained on Sri Ramakrishna's maxim that while it is sinful for the serpent to bite, it is permissible for it to hiss in order to keep off assailants. But Palestine remains to prove that the British Premier is not a pacifist or believer in non-violence.

The British Premier:—The position of the British Premier, Mr. Neville Chamberlain, would be ridiculous were it not so pathetic. In the last eight months he has completely gone back on his policies and still remains Prime Minister. The principle that a statesman whose policy has become totally discredited, should resign office and make way for others has been abandoned. Mr. Chamberlain changes his policies every other day according to circumstances but he will not quit office under any circumstances. He has no vision. He can not foresee things which are plain to everybody else. On Wednesday he announced in the House of Commons that his Government has decided to introduce conscription and that as a first step persons between the ages of 20 and 21 would be called up for training. He plainly said that he was doing this under pressure from France. British policy is no longer in the hands of the British Government. It is either the United States France or that calls the tune, and all three have their eyes screwed on the baton of the Rome-Berlin orchestra.

Japanese Reverses in China :—While nothing further has been heard of the report that President Roosevelt had addressed a message to Japan, the Japanese forces in China have not had things their own way during the past week. As an index to the instability of Japanese control over the areas won from China, the reported Chinese attack on and capture of seventy minor towns is important. The international feeling against Japan is shown similarly in the high number of political assassinations of pro-Japanese Chinamen, which are reported from Shanghai where too many masters have created chaos. Neither of these happenings, however, mean more than a period of considerable difficulty for Japanese Governments in China. A concerted attack by the Fascist-Nazi Powers in Europe and by Japan in the East, still remains a major threat to world peace.

Resumption of Unitary Government :—The Secretary of State for India, Lord Zetland, in moving in the House of Lords the second reading of the Government of India Act Amending Bill, explained that it was found necessary to resume some of the powers of control and supervision exercised by the pre-reform Government of India over the Provincial Governments, but that this will be done only in case of emergency such as the outbreak of War. He argued that this necessity was disclosed by the working of provincial autonomy for about two years. The fact, however, is that Sir Samuel Hoare and the Parliamentary majority which backed him, put into the Act all sorts of safeguards which their ingenuity suggested, to prevent the Congress Party getting a majority in the provincial Legislatures. But they were completely misled regarding the actual state of things in this country. The large majorities secured by the Congress in seven provinces, were a complete surprise to them. But they tried to put the best face they can on their discomfiture and were effuse in welcoming the Congress Governments. They did their best to propitiate Congress Ministries even where the latter were obviously in the wrong. Things were going on nicely. But Subhas Bose's election to the Presidentship upset the apple-cart. It was an act of sheer perversity to have destroyed the unitary government under which British India had developed for a century and a half. But to resume powers that have been definitely relinquished, undermines confidence in the stability of constitutional reforms and has naturally evoked strong protest. We know by experience that emergency powers have a strong tendency to become normal.

The Congress and World Affairs :—Although the main reason for the convening of the All India Congress Committee at Calcutta is the settlement of the internal differences which have prevented the formation of a Working Committee for the year, there is a red herring in the international situation which threatens to overshadow the proper business of the meeting. We do not see anything in the situation, grave as it is, which necessitates serious consideration by the Congress. In the matter of Czechoslovakia, when Indian feeling was really roused as it never was before or after, the Congress adopted a resolution that they would have no part in an "imperialist" war. Unless the leaders are going to tell us how they propose to keep India out of a war in which every other country will be engaged, there seems to be no object, except to divert people's minds or to relax their own, in again considering the probable attitude of Congress in the event of war. The frequent statements on the international situation issued by Pandit Jawaharlal and by Mr. Bose, though both these leaders approach the subject from different angles, show that no change has come over the Congress attitude since Munich. The resolution now to be considered, therefore, has no value, apart from advertisement, to anyone at all.

Rajkot Stalemate :—The Gwyer award seems to have overshot the mark. In conceding the privilege of appointing seven out of a committee of ten members to Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel the decision, it was felt, had gone to the Congress. The Thakore Saheb, however, decided to absolve himself of all responsibility for the non-official part of the Committee and advised his minorities to seek redress at the hands of Gandhiji who had taken over charge from Sardar Vallabhbhai. The minorities proved singularly amenable to the Thakore Saheb but resisted every effort of Gandhiji's to secure their support to the Parishad. Unable to move them, Gandhiji suggested, first, enlargement of the Committee so as to secure a majority to the Parishad and to include the minorities as well. The Thakore Saheb refused to depart from the letter of the Gwyer award. The next proposal was that of surrendering the gains of the Gwyer award and allowing the Thakore Saheb to nominate the entire Committee, if he in turn agreed to the Parishad scrutinising the final report and submitting its opinion on it; the differences to be submitted to the Chief Justice for arbitration. Mr. Virawala, it appears, regarded this as an unjustified check on the Thakore Saheb and appealed to Gandhiji for greater trust. From Gandhiji's statement it seems that he has accepted this position and led the Rajkot agitation back to where it was before Sardar Patel first entered the scene against Gandhiji's advice. The only change is that Sir Patrick Cadell has left the dewanship and Mr. Virawala who had been sent away under a heavy cloud has been seated once again with Gandhiji's blessings and to all appearances even more securely on the saddle.

Mr. Subhas Bose :—Gandhiji has got out of the Rajkot tangle to face a not less serious one in Calcutta. President Bose has apparently regained his health. He has resumed his activities. The Tripuri Congress resolution required him to appoint his Working Committee on the advice and to the satisfaction of Gandhiji. As he could not meet Gandhiji owing to his health and the latter's preoccupation with Rajkot, the Working Committee could not be appointed and Congress activities are at a stand-still. The President has meanwhile been amusing the public

...ish enquiries as to why this member of the ...th Command lunched with the Viceroy and ...r member attended a party in honour of some ...her agent of British Imperialism. It was ...eported that he had even asked Gandhiji to ...explain his conduct in visiting the Viceroy ...d His Excellency's residence in New Delhi. ...Gandhiji may plead that he is not even ...a four anna member of the Congress and ...is not bound by the conventions of the ...Congress! Mr. Bose seems to be confident ...that Gandhiji and he will agree upon the future ...course to be pursued. This is possible only if ...Mr. Bose descends a good deal from his ...anti-Imperialist pedestal. Gandhiji's policy just ...now is to work with the Paramount Power, that ...is, British Imperialism in its most undiluted ...form. Otherwise, Mr. Bose will do well to resign ...the Presidentship.

The Indian National Congress :—The meeting ...of the All India Congress Committee at Calcutta ...to settle the outstanding differences between ...Mr. Subhas Bose and the members of the old ...Working Committee is a momentous one. As ...Rajkot Gandhiji has taken over the leader-...ship from Sardar Patel and it is believed that ...the Congress will emerge out of the Calcutta dis-...cussions with either a new president or a "left" ...Working Committee. Sardar Patel whose activi-...ties in the past have brought on him the full ...measure of discontent against the policy of the ...Congress, will not attend the meeting at Calcutta ...for special reasons. This is both an advantage ...and a misfortune. The absence of the Sardar ...will permit of a discussion of policies apart ...from the chief personality involved in many of ...them in the past. After all, as Pandit Jawaharlal ...Nehru has pointed out, the acts and omissions ...of the Sardar had the approval of the Working ...Committee as well as of the Congress President ...whoever he was at the time. Pandit Nehru ...accepted full responsibility for the Nariman ...incident and rightly remarked that Mr. Bose was ...no less responsible for the Khare interlude. The ...Sardar, it is well known, has not the gift of ...convincing opponents of the justice of his case—...an essential quality in a politician who has ...eschewed violence. No man can ask for a better ...advocate for his cause than Gandhiji, especially so ...when that cause is also Gandhiji's. Nevertheless ...it is not a gain either tor the Congress or to ...Indian politics if it appears too often to be the ...case that Gandhiji's time and energies are spent ...in pulling chestnuts out of the fire.

Purdah in Baroda :—The accounts of the ...coronation of Maharaja Pratapsingh of Baroda ...on Wednesday, contain an item which ...will be noted throughout India as well as abroad ...with surprised interest. Her Highness the ...Maharani who took her place beside her husband ...at the function, is said to have worn a veil. For ...a whole generation, the Maharani (dowager) of ...Baroda has been a prominent leader of the ...Indian women's emancipation movement. The ...purdah is the symbol of women's subjection and ...it was thought that the Baroda royal family has discarded it once for all. We earnestly trust that this is not symptomatic of a reversal of the progressive social policy of His Highness Sayajirao Gaekwad, which more than anything else has brought Baroda to the front rank among Indian States.

Post-Graduate and Research Studies :—Several years ago in an important report on the reorganisation of the London University, the late Lord Haldane stressed the inter-relation between undergraduate and post-graduate work. In Bombay we have been building up post-graduate courses without much thought about securing adequate foundations in the undergraduate stage. 'Academicus' in two articles in the Mahratta, which are reprinted as a pamphlet, has exposed this weakness. This writer can endorse from personal knowledge what 'Academicus' says of the thesis door to the M. A. degree. The thesis which he was last invited to value, was a mechanical collection of information more or less related to the subject but and betraying not a trace of original thought on the part of the thesisist. He was told that this was a fair sample. 'Academicus' suggests that the thesis for the M. Sc. is open to similar criticism. The suggestions of "Academicus" for the organisation of the Deccan College into a Research Institute for Languages, are mostly sound. When, however, there is such a strong demand to reduce language to its bare, "basic" elements, it is an act of courage on the part of the Bombay Government to found an Institute for their study in the higher reaches. We, therefore, welcome the scheme and we have no doubt that the Prime Minister who is in charge of Education, will not let his great enterprise be handicapped at the outset by tolerating second best material in any part of its organisation. The success of the Institute will depend upon its recognition by cognate Institutes in other countries as a worthy confrere.

Vice-Chancellorship:—The proposal to amend the law so as to make the office of Vice-Chancellor of the Bombay University elective, will, if given effect to, relieve the Education Minister and the Chancellor of a delicate part of their duty. The most popular Vice-Chancellor, however, may not be the most capable Executive head of the University. We commend the suggestion made by the University Reform Committee some years ago that a full time Rector should be added to the permanent staff to relieve the Vice-Chancellor of his routine duties and to exercise closer supervision over the University Colleges...We were surprised to read in the papers the other day that the new Vice-Chancellor, Mr. R. P. Masani, had assured beforehand the candidates for the recent Matriculation that he will see that they do not suffer owing to the difficult Algebra paper set for them!

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER
BOMBAY, April 29, 1939.

"WHAT OF INDIA?"

The conflict between Democracies and Dictatorships now raging, has only an altruistic interest for non-White races. So far as the latter are concerned, both sides entertain practically the same view, namely, that they are bound to accept domination. The champions of the Dictatorships no less than the champions of Democracies, proclaim the preservation of the peace of Europe and of European civilisation to be their central purpose. The Democracies hold that with their disappearance European civilisation will disappear. The Dictatorships maintain no less firmly that the existence of European civilisation is bound up with their success. The professions of the Democracies to this effect are well known. Those of the Dictatorships have been obscured by democratic propaganda. Yet it is the fact that, if anything, the Dictators are far more emphatic, certainly far less equivocal, than the Democrats in their assertion of the supremacy of European civilisation and their mission to save it. "We consider it our duty," declares Dr. Arthur Gutt, "to direct the attention of the European nations, and of the White race in general, towards the dangers threatening our common civilisation from Russia in the East and from Africa by way of large armies composed of races of non-European areas, specially trained by France, in the south." ("Germany Speaks" p. 64) "Our standpoint," writes Dr. Walter Gross, "is not so very far removed from that of other people with a sound mental outlook. The American Immigration laws, for example, are based on definite racial discrimination." ("Germany Speaks," p. 75.) Race and colour prejudice is not the vice of the Latin races. But Signor Mussolini has adopted it as a necessary adjunct of Empire. The Duce very likely took the idea from Lord Curzon. In a footnote in his book on "The Problem of the Far East," that great British Imperialist attributed the decay and collapse of the Roman Empire to the failure of the Romans to keep their blood untainted by that of the subject races. "The Roman Empire perished," wrote Curzon, "not because its ruling class was, but because it ceased to remain, a caste." Signor Mussolini is evidently resolved not to let his Empire perish again for that reason. The main difference between Democracies and Dictatorships is as regards the European Jews. The Anglo-Saxon democracies favour them. The Dictatorships, not only the German but also the Polish, the Hungarian and other Continental nations, reject them.

The attitude of Western democracies to non-Europeans has been throughout hypocritical. The first article of the American Constitution proclaiming the equality of all men, is nowhere more fragrantly violated than in the United States. When the Japanese delegation at the Peace Conference at Versailles got racial equality placed on the agenda, President Wilson sabotaged it by grossly abusing his power as President. The British delegation voted against the Japanese amendment. The conduct of the Indian delegates on the occasion is veiled in mystery. How the democracies of the self-governing Dominions of the British Commonwealth treat their coloured citizens is notorious. But, it may be said, all this is of the past. The future will bring absolute equality along with perpetual peace if only the Democratic countries are helped to down the Dictators. That hope, too, has been snatched from us by the author of "Union Now," the book to which Lord Lothian in an article in the London Observer, on which we commented in The Reformer of March 18, referred in terms of high praise as a practical contribution to the solution of the problem of World Peace. Mr. Lionel Curtis in a letter to the author, Mr. Clarence K. Streit prophesied that its appearance would be, like the Federalist, a mile-stone in history. The gist of Mr. Streit's treatise is that the fifteen democracies which he names should be united for four common purposes, namely, defence, citizenship, currency, a customs free economy and communications. As we observed last month, union for these purposes means practically union for all purpose. The fifteen democracies are the American Union, the United Kingdom, France, Australia, Belgium, Canada, Denmark, Finland, Holland, Ireland, New Zealand, Norway, Sweden, Switzerland and the Union of South Africa. The term Democracy as applied to these States must be understood in a very comprehensive sense, just in the same way as the term Christian. Herbert Agar tells us in the New Statesman of the 8th April that a section of American opinion questions the strength of the democratic ideal in France and England. The South African Union is more a White oligarchy than a democracy. This is also more or less true of the United States itself and the British and French Empires.

Mr. Streit devotes less than two pages to this country under the heading "What of India?" He calls it a "possession" of a democracy, whose admission will prevent the proposed Union. He puts this on the ground of the political inexperience of the Indian millions. On the analogy of slavery in the American States before their union, he advocates the incorporation of India as a subject race in his scheme. He writes :

> Suppose those founders of the American Union who wanted slavery abolished, had sacrificed the idea of union when they found they could not realize it without accepting slavery. Would they have made more freedom for anyone? They chose instead union despite slavery, and within 70 years tens of thousands of white men were giving their lives to save the Union by freeing the slaves.

This idealistic view of the Civil War has been badly mauled by the testimony of historical facts. Lincoln himself repeatedly declared that he was not fighting the South to abolish slavery

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

but to save the Union. Slavery was abolished in Great Britain thirty-four years earlier and if the North had followed the example and compensated the owners, the reform would have come without leaving behind the bitter legacy of the anti-Negro prejudice in the Union. Indians are chafing against British domination as national slavery, and are not likely to view the domination of fifteen democracies as an improvement. They will reason, If we are to remain slaves, what does it matter if our masters call themselves Democrats or Dictators? This point of view does not seem to have struck Mr. Streit even as a possibility. But it is not merely a possibility. The first task of his democratic Union will be to coerce India into remaining its "slave." The real cause of the disruption of the Western world, is that it regards the East as its legitimate prey, Against this complacent action the East is in high revolt. The necessity for reconciliation with the East was urged by many thinkers ten years ago. During the last six or seven years there has been a setback to this train of thought and a tendency to regard Europe and its peace and prosperity as the only things that mattered. But Europe will have no Peace until her dealings with Asia and Africa are on a just, humane and honest basis. Until then, Mr. Streit may cry "Union Now," but Asia will forbid the banns.

The Urban Property Tax:—The final proposals of the Government of Bombay for relieving the poorer taxpayer of the burden of the immoveable urban property tax have been released to the press. In respect of properties of which the rateable value is below Rs. 500 in Bombay City and below Rs. 200 in Salsette and Ahmedabad, the tax will be remitted entirely. The Government communique declares that "it is estimated that the number of properties which will thus be relieved from the tax is considerable, in some areas being nearly 50 per cent of the total." We cannot think of any locality in Bombay City where the number of properties fetching in a rent of Rs. 41 and less a month is even 5 per cent of the total; or of any urban area in Salsette in which the percentage of properties bringing in roughly Rs. 18 or less a month would be over ten. It must be remembered that the building boom which Bombay has experienced in recent years, has left few recent plots and has sent up the value of even these. There has been a tendency in the city which was noticed in the 1931 Census towards larger buildings. The Census Report remarks, "The practice is growing of providing large chawls containing accomodation for many families in one building instead of the smaller buildings which used to be the chief means of providing cheap housing accomodation. Thus while the total number of buildings has fallen by 1,501, the number of chawls has risen by 1,343." In the eight years that have elapsed since this was written, larger chawls have sprung up in Bombay. In announcing in the Bombay Assembly, the first concession of a lesser tax of 5 per cent on property bringing in an annual rent of Rs. 2,000 and less, Mr. Latthe mentioned precisely the amount of revenue he had sacrificed by that reduction. We should have liked to know what further fall he expects in revenue after his new concessions. A measure similar to the grading in Bombay City has been adopted in Salsette and in Ahmedabad where instead of the original 10 per cent, a five per cent tax will be levied on properties of the annual letting value of Rs. 1,000 and less. We had urged several reasons for the Bombay Suburban area receiving the same concessions as Bombay City. The first set-back to the natural development of the suburbs was the land development nearer Bombay, notably the reclaimed area at Church Gate. The higher taxation now levied by the Government of Bombay adds another handicap. Suburban municipalities have several schemes, principally relating to drainage, which are held up for want of funds. The encroachment of the Government on the hitherto untaxed margin of ratepayers does not help them in their difficult tasks.

A Perplexing Method :—More than the actual figures, the method by which the Bombay Government has gone about announcing its scheme of urban taxation, is open to criticism. The proposals were first announced in February. A fortnight later, there was a further statement lightening the burden of taxation to some extent, with a promise of further concessions. After another two months we are given the final proposals. So far as we can see, there appears to be no reason for the uncertainty caused by this procedure. It is true that the opposition to the original taxation proposal has been in a measure mollified by these minor alterations. But at the same time there would have been less opposition to the Prohibition scheme itself which was made a part of the taxation policy, had Mr. Latthe started out at the very outset with a complete scheme instead of with the outline of one. Both in the urban tax and in the concession to religious needs for liquor, the Bombay Government has roused an unnecessary measure of opposition to a vital reform by not making up its mind in advance.

Exemption of Nira:—Some years ago Gandhiji decreed the destruction of brab trees as the easiest way of eradicating the drink habit among the masses. Now he has exempted nira or fresh today as containing no alcohol. But nira ferments in no time and it will be a very difficult job for the Police who are to be charged with the duty of enforcing Prohibition, to check whether the liquid drunk as nira has or has not undergone fermentation, especially as the work of inspecting nira will have to be finished between day-break and sunrise, that is within about half an hour.

The Jame-Jamshed on Prohibition:—The Jame-Jamshed, the leading Parsi Gujarati daily

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

in Bombay, takes us to task for criticising the Parsi women's protest meeting against Prohibition. The Jame seems to have learnt with surprise that the Reformer is a Prohibition paper and it has devoted three columns of its editorial page to convince us of the error of our ways. The main argument it advocates—the economic one, may be dismissed as even gradual Prohibition will be obnoxious to our contemporary—is that Prohibition in America was the deliberate mischief of some bootlegging millionaires who hoped to make more money by it, and that Prohibition will introduce "goonda raj" into the country. If we might correct the Jame, we would point out that the degree of "goondaism" will depend not on the introduction of Prohibition but on the attitude adopted by the public towards bootleggers. Here we are glad to have the Jame's assurance that the Parsis are too self-respecting a community to resort to the methods of American gangsters. Behind all the fire and thunder of the Jame editorial this is a real recognition of the law-abiding nature of the Indian.

GANDHIJI'S FAREWELL TO RAJKOT.

Gandhiji left Rajkot for Calcutta to attend the All India Congress Committee meeting on Sunday. He signalised his departure by issuing a highly emotional statement. "Rajkot seems to have robbed me of my youth," he said, "I never knew that I was old. Now I am weighed down by the knowledge of decrepitude. I never knew what it was to lose hope. But it seems to have been cremated in Rajkot. My Ahimsa has been put to a test such as it was never subjected to before." Gandhiji has of late been subject to attacks of abysmal depression. A year ago he wrote in the Harijan that he could not see light. Such fits of depression are familiar to all who live in the strenuous pursuit of an ideal. All works on Yoga which is at once the science and art of such pursuit, warn the aspirant not to be deterred by such moods. The Poet too has these moods. Tennyson in his 'In Memoriam' has described his own experience.

> Be near me when my light is low,
> When the blood creeps, and the nerves prick
> And tingle; and the heart is sick,
> And all the wheels of being slow.
> Be near me when the sensuous frame
> Is racked with pangs that conquer trust,
> And Time a maniac scattering dust,
> And Life, a Fury, slinging flame.
> Be near me when my faith is dry,
> And men, the flies of latter spring,
> That lay their eggs and sting and sing,
> And weave their petty cells and die.
> Be near me when I fade way,
> To point the term of human strife,
> And on the low dark verge of life
> The twilight of eternal day.

Gandhiji gets over his moods of depression by broadcasting his woes for all to know and sympathise. Others, too proud or self-possessed to share their sufferings with others, struggle inwardly, and if they are strong, overcome the depression and resume their course with mind strengthened thereby. The weaker ones live to regret ever having attempted to guide the chariot of the sun with hands unequal to the task. Gandhiji's is thus the easiest way of dissipating these clouds when they hang over one's mental horizon.

Turning to the subject matter of the outburst, which is painful to readers though it should have afforded relief to the writer, it is difficult to see what there is in it for so much breast-beating. To onlookers it was evident from the first that Gandhiji was drawn into it against his own judgment and as he has himself avowed, against his own inclination. Well would it have been had he trusted to his own instinct and held himself off from the movement which had no reality behind it. The people of Rajkot had some, several, genuine grievances. They could and would have been redressed if Sir Patrick Cadell had continued as Minister. We have received from more than one quarter corroboration of what a friend in Rajkot said in his letter (Reformer, March 25) that the people have come to regret the dismissal of Sir Patrick Cadell. The conversion of the local movement for the redress of grievances into a movement for the establishment of Parliamentary Responsible Government, was a mistake. This was evidently thought necessary to give the movement an all-India character. Gandhiji came to believe that there was a genuine movement in Rajkot for Responsible Government and that the whole of India was bent upon making it the central issue leaving aside Federation and everything else. Under this impression he sat down at Rajkot giving up all other concerns, including the Tripuri Congress which was threatened with a serious impasse. The Rajkot affair was in substance and fact a personal difference between the Thakore Sahib and Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel. Even Gandhiji's entry did not make it an all-India question. It is his invocation of the Paramount Power to exercise its authority on the Rajkot ruler that made the question an all India one. No Indian leader of equal or even less eminence had regarded the authority of the Paramount Power except as one to be carefully prevented from its tendency to press constantly on the independence of the States. British Indian public opinion has been the principal factor in protecting States from encroachment by the Paramount Power. Even after the institution of the States People's Conference, responsible leaders like the late Dewan Bahadur Ramachandra Rao, Mr. Ramananda Chatterjee and Mr. Chintamani have been careful to say or do nothing to impair the integrity of the States. Gandhiji's action startled India. The incongruity of the leader of the Congress, which still had the goal of Independence inscribed on its banner and many of whose leading spokesmen continue to proclaim that British Imperialism is the great evil adopting a course calculated to strengthen and extend the authority of Imperialism in a large part of India where so far it has been kept as a reserve in the distant background, added to the public perplexity.

Much of the excitement of the past three weeks might have been avoided and the real grievances of the Rajkot people duly redressed, if the whole question had been viewed in its proper perspective. But there is no need to take a too tragic view of what has passed. Gandhiji has now realised that the dispute between the Thakore Sahib and his subjects can be best settled without his or Sardar Vallabhbhai's intervention. In his statement Gandhiji says;

> The agonising experience of the fifteen days have resulted in my making the discovery that my 'Ahimsa' should be voted down as failure if the Thakore Saheb and Darbar Shri Virawala were to feel that they had to give anything under pressure from above. My 'Ahimsa' demanded that I should remove that feeling. I assured Durbar Shri Virawala that I took no delight in invoking the assistance of the Paramount Power. Apart from 'Ahimsa' my connection with Rajkot should impose that restraint on me. I assured him that my spontaneous offer to Mr. Gibson was an effort in that direction. He immediately retorted: "But if you are not satisfied with his Committee's report you claim the right to scrutinise the report in the light of the Notification, and if the Parishad dissents, you want to have the report and the dissent to be examined by the Hon. the Chief Justice of India. Do you call this removing the feeling of pressure? Why not trust His Highness and his adviser through and through? You may not get all you want, but whatever you get will be charged with his goodwill and will carry a promise of full delivery. Do you know what the Parishad people have said about the Thakore Saheb and me? Is that the way of people desiring reforms from their Prince?" There was bitterness in his speech and contempt for the Parishad people. But with the dawn of my imperfect handling of "Ahimsa" instead of parrying the blow, I recognised the force of his argument as showing want of faith in the essential goodness of human nature and in the littleness of my own belief in "Ahimsa." I parted with the feeling that we had come to know each other better and that in trying to woo Durbar Shri Virawala I was on the right track.

And so I presented this new line of approach to the co-workers. They had more than once told me that Durbar Shri Virawala was the source of all the evil that had descended upon Rajkot, and that his removal would mean for them full Swaraj. I had no difficulty in showing them that what they were thinking of was good Government and not Self-Government. At this meeting which only took place yesterday, I told them that if they accepted my explanation of 'Ahimsa' they would have to set their heart not on getting rid of Durbar Shri Virawala but in converting him. This they could do only if they would set about finding his good points and working at them. They must develop infinite faith in the capacity of 'Ahimsa' to neutralise every person of 'Himsa.' I have asked the workers to confer with Durbar Shri Virawala, to forget me and Sardar Patel, and if they get enough to satisfy their least wants they may accept the offer without references to either of us. I have told Durbar Virawala: "I am defeated. May you win. Placate the people by giving as much as possible and wire to me so as to receive the hope which I seem to have lost for the moment."

INDIAN CHRISTIANS IN BOMBAY CITY.

The Rev. James Kellock's Report of the Investigation undertaken under the auspices of the Central Board of Christian Higher Education in India, into the social and economic environment of the Indian Christian population in Bombay city, is a useful contribution to the study of the effect of religious conversion on the material conditions of life. A comprehensive list of over eighty questions was sent out and the answers received in whole or in part numbered 623. The individuals to whom they related were distributed among 25 different Church groups or congregations. Roman Catholics were not included in the investigation though two or three questionnaires were returned by members of that denomination. About 75 per cent of the persons investigated came from Maharashtra, especially Ahmednagar and the Nizam's Dominions. Nasik district is another main source. Mr. Kellock describes the procedure of Indian Christian immigrants to Bombay for employment. Often they desire to stay there only a few months. During these months if there is no special care taken of them, they feel lost. It appears that they are always anxious to get in touch with some relative as early as they can. One investigator says that he has come across many cases of persons coming from outside to Bombay who have shown eagerness to be in touch with the clergyman or the representative of the Church, and he gives it as his opinion that it is only when the making of the contact is very difficult that these people lapse from the Church.

Three quarters of the Indian Christians investigated own no land in their villages. Only a quarter of those who own land get over rupees 50 a year from it; nearly 40 per cent get nothing from their land. Nearly one half of the Christian population investigated, have relatives in the villages, either dependants or others. In respect of literacy the Christian community ranks high. Nearly 90 per cent of the persons concerned in this enquiry can read and write. The advantage of literacy is not reflected in their economic condition. Taking the Indian Christians in Bombay as a whole, Mr. Kellock observes, the most prevalent level of wage is between Rs. 15 and Rs. 25, and next to it the range of Rs. 25 to 35. Taking all the classes together, he further observes, 59 per cent are in debt. The most prevalent causes of indebtedness are said to be marriage, unemployment, sickness and insufficient wages. 84 per cent of the households investigated were living in single rooms. Even of families with an income of from Rs. 40 to Rs. 100 only a fourth occupied two-room tenements. Mr. Kellock's description of the Bombay chawl is reproduced here as being of general interest:

> It is a large building with three or four storeys and one or perhaps two entrances, and containing one or two hundred single rooms, which generally open either side on narrow passages that run the length of the building. The washing and the privy accommodation is generally situated at one or both ends of the passages, though it may be in the middle of the passages or in some other position. The comfort and convenience of the inhabitants of the chawl will depend a good deal upon the number of the available water taps and privies.

The commonest situation, Mr. Kellock adds, is 2 to 12 families to a water tap—this is the case with 64 per cent of the households; 86 per cent are accommodated with a privy in the same proportion. The way in which people use what is called leisure, affords an index to their culture. Mr. Kellock remarks that there is remarkably little use of leisure by the persons investigated in any particularly active way except "sitting talking."

Mr. Kellock gives some interesting facts about marriages among the Bombay Christians. He came across 5 cases of very young wives, one of seven years, one of 10 years and three of 12 years. They were all Telugus from the Nizam's Dominions where there is no Sarda Act in force. A Christian with two wives is rather a novelty but Mr. Kellock found one, a Gujarati from Kaira, 42 years old and teaching in a Municipal School. The elder spouse was 42 and the younger one 36 years of age, Mr. Kellock explains: "The man is a convert and the Mission has allowed him to be a member of the Church, even though he has two wives. In such cases they married the wives when they were Hindus." We are not told whether the women too had joined the Mission or had remained Hindus while agreeing to live with their convert husband. From an interesting chapter devoted to the generations of Bombay Christians it appears that three generations are needed to stabilise converts in the Christian faith. The first generation is apt to be wistful. The second sceptical. Those who survive to the third have burnt the bridges and settle down to the new environment.

In view of recent discussions, the question arises, does conversion to Christianity effect any important change in the material conditions of converts? It is in the first place clear, says Mr. Kellock, that the Christian community is exceedingly poor. This in spite of the fact that it is to a large extent cared for and guided by strong organisations of foreign missions and its church life to a a large degree is maintained and supervised by these missions. The reflections with which Mr. Kellocke oncludes, about the relation between the economic condition and religion of the converts provoke the question, Why is there no such connection between a Hindu and his religion or a Mahomedan and his? Mr. Kellock quotes Mr. Ravade's opinion that there is a close relation between the economic condition of families and their Christian connections. Mr. Ravade makes out that men who are preoccupied with the struggle for existence have no time for religion! He divides Christians in three groups: those who are in fairly well paid jobs, they tend to take an interest in Church affairs; those in poorly paid, permanent jobs, but not free from debt——they take very little active part in Church life; and those casually employed in temporary jobs, they take no part in Church life, probably attending service only on special occasions. And 44 per cent of Bombay Christians do not contribute anything to Church funds.

THE CHURCH AND POLITICS.

Whilst the repeated crises have turned leaders of secular thought in Europe to study political questions from a different angle, they have at the same time given a new vitality to those who equate European civilization with Christianity. We notice this week Mr. Streit's "Union Now" which seeks a political solution to the problems of Europe. Mr. Ziliacus, the political commentator who has earned distinction under the name 'Vigilantes,' offers in a Penguin Special entitled "Between Two Wars", an economic approach to the main issue of averting war. Both writers look to establishing peace by overawing the totalitarian states. In so far as they do so, their policies are two variations of rearmament. The Students' Christian Movement have put forth a series of Crisis Booklets, three of which—No. 4, 'The Crisis and World Peace' by Leyton Richards: No. 5, 'What Does "A" do Next?' by F. A. Cockin: No. 7, 'The Church Militant' by Leslie S. Hunter:— have come to us. The argument in these booklets is that the Churches have lost their savour and that much has to be done before they can hope to regain their leadership intellectually and morally. The need, for all these writers, is to "christianise" European cizilization.

> The crisis of the autumn, says Mr. Hunter, was not an hour of victory and cause of rejoicing either for the Christian Church or for the democracies. It was made clear that the Church has not been able to exercise a a decisive influence for good in post-war Europe.

The crisis, they all argue, served a good purpose in as much as it showed the horror of war which was widespread among the peoples of the world. But, as Mr. Cockin puts it, it was actuated by fear as much as by penitence. He continues:

> Too much has, I think, been made in public speeches of the universal hatred of war and desire for peace, which was said to have saved us at the last moment. This is a potential rather than actual asset.....As they stand, they may be that most dangerous of all counterfeits of a truely moral motive, sentimentalism, the desire to avoid unpleasantness, to escape disaster.

The problem therefore is how to transmute this emotional feeling into a vital force for peace. The methods commended by these writers are of disarmament, in the widest sense of the term. Whilst rejecting the value of the retaliatory arguments used against British and American objectors to German persecution of racial minorities, the group urges that greater value would attach to protests if Britain and American could show, if not clean hands, an earnest desire to cleanse their hands. Similarly a more enlightened attitude towards colonies is proposed as the first step towards checking the scramble for colonies. Mr. Richards who, of all these writers seems most sympathetic to Mr. Chamberlain's policy of appeasement, even suggests that more concrete results can be achieved in securing better treatment of Jews in Germany itself, by a promise to give "speedy consideration to German colonial economic claims." In fairness to Mr. Richards it must be added that, he with the other writers in this series, believes not "in the creation of a new German imperialism, but in the liquidation of British and other imperialisms." If the crisis has brought about a rethinking of colonial questions, it has also awakened a greater social consciousness. "An active concern for refugees," writes Mr. Cockin, "good as that is, will only be a get-out from responsibilities which lie nearer home, unless it rouses us to a new realisation of the needs of our own fellow-countrymen." These thought-provoking shilling booklets merit serious consideration. Whatever the response of "Christians" might be to the ideas put forward lucidly in them they are invaluable as signs of the new thought which is taking shape among religious-minded men the world over. DR. DESHMUKH'S DIVORCE BILL.

(By Kopargam Ramamurti, Aska).

Sir N. N. Sircar, the retiring Law Member of the Government of India, was generally known as a frank and genial fighter who could cheerfully give and take downright hard blows in debate, but was believed to be incapable of striking a false note in his logic. His latest and perhaps last performance in the Central Assembly in connection with Dr. Deshmukh's Hindu Women's Right to Divorce Bill came to us, however, as a painful disillusionment. It has certainly not enhanced his reputation for candour, sportsmanship or sound reasoning as a Government spokesman or as a public man.

He tried no doubt to keep up his name for geniality by raising a laughter at Dr. Deshmukh with the ungracious remark that Hindu women should be careful hereafter to find a better champion than Dr. Deshmukh. But this could serve only to provoke in the mind of the man (or woman) in the street, who is unaware of the gallant Knight's natural chivalry and innate benevolence, the sorry reflection that, after all Sir Nripendra's able championship of any cause, whether as a practising lawyer at the Bar or as an official servant of the Crown, bore no relation to the goodness or badness of the cause itself.

It would not have mattered in the least and offended none if the Honourable Law Member had carried out what he thought was his duty to Government with simple straightforwardness and opposed the Bill on some more plausible ground, however much his hostile attitude may be repugnant to current public opinion. But a more fallacious, insincere, unintelligible and in effect unfair argument could not have been conceived than the one he thought fit to urge as his main ground for condemning and rejecting Dr. Deshmukh's Bill off-hand.

From the thankful reference Dr. Deshmukh had made at a previous session of the Assembly to the help he had received from Sir N. N. Sircar in connection with this Bill and the immediate reason made by Mr. Bajoria, the orthodox opponent, that it was "undue help," the public had been led to believe that the Honourable Law Member was prepared to allow a friendly consideration to the merits of the Bill. Even in the last debate Sir Nripendra thought fit to boast of the help he had given to Dr. Deshmukh in framing the Bill, and yet he had no scruple to denounce it as badly framed without condescending to give any reasons for not framing it better himself or allowing it to be improved in Select Committee.

According to Sir Nripendra, it would seem, the most fatal defect of the Bill was that while granting the right of Divorce to Hindu wives it did not provide for giving the same privilege to their husbands! One does not know whether to weep or to laugh when a Hindu lawyer of Sir Nripendra's eminence and experience solemnly makes a declaration which wrongly implies that a Hindu husband does not already under the present Hindu law enjoy the right to shake himself free at any moment from an existing wife, at his own will and pleasure, so as to lawfully marry another and have children by the latter who will be legally recognised as legitimate issue. If such abandonment as he is free to make, is not technically called Divorce and does not operate fully as a dissolution of marriage because the Hindu law permits only the abandoning husband and not the ill-used and deserted wife to remarry, and if Dr. Deshmukh prefers not to knock his head against the stonewall of masculine selfishness by attempting to drag in the privileged and irresponsible Hindu male under the irksome control of the law courts, but seeks only to help the distressed wife to remarry subject to strict legal procedure, is that a reason to cry out that the Bill is not equally kind and fair to the male sex? With due deference to the learned Law Member, one cannot help thinking that the Bar Association of this little mofussil town displayed a truer appreciation than he of the realities of life and of the law and facts of the situation when it advised as follows in the opinion which it submitted on Dr. Deshmukh's Divorce Bill at the request of Government:

> Dr. Deshmukh's Bill was conceived independently of the other Bills and deserves to be passed, with necessary amplifications, even on its own merits. Unlike the other Bills it avoids interfering with the powerful vested interests and privileges of the Hindu male. The highly irresponsible power of desertion and unrestricted power of polygamy which Hindu law permits is a sword of Damocles on the head of every good wife however kindly treated for the time being, is left untouched as sacrosanct. The Bill seeks only to give a very bare minimum of relief to the Hindu after the worst has happened to ruin her happiness and turn her married life into a ghastly farce. This Bill should therefore commend itself even to those who may feel inclined to oppose the other Bills. (vide the Reformer of 28th January 1939).

But we are perhaps doing an injustice to Sir N. N. Sircar by taking his spurious argument too seriously without probing deep to get at his kind motive. It may be that all the irrelevant fuss and fury of opposition to Dr. Deshmukh's Bill is a deliberate pose to pave the way for the acceptance of a more adequate measure which would prevent irresponsible desertion and polygamy as well as relieve the distress of an unfortunate Hindu wife. If this camouflage will only make the Bull Elephant of the Hindu woods believe that there is greater freedom and privilege in the Khedda from which Dr. Deshmukh is unfairly keeping him back, he will of course make our task and the Government's task easy by voluntarily rushing into it and getting himself roped in under the strict disciplines of a monogamous law of Divorce as desired by all. We are only sorry that Sir Nripendra will not be in the Assembly to welcome it on behalf of the Government and see his able scheme brought to fruition when Mrs. Subbarayan's Bill will come up next for consideration. We fervently hope and trust that his successor will take the cue from Sir Nripendra's present arguments and give hearty support to that lady's Bill, because no better champion of the women's cause can be thought of than a woman of Mrs. Subbarayan's outstanding position and ability, and her Bill certainly does equal justice to both sexes in the all-important matter of Marriage and Divorce.

As for Dr. Desmukh, he can well afford to rest on his past laurels as a champion of Hindu women's rights. Thousands of Hindu women in all corners of the country bless him daily for his championship in putting the Women's Right to Property Act of 1937 on the Statute Book. Thousands and millions more will continue to bless him for it in future from generation to generation!

UNIVERSITY ACT AMENDMENT.

(By S. G. Warty.)

The statement made by the Hon. Mr. Kher that a revision of the Bombay University Act is to be undertaken shortly, is a very welcome announcement. A revision of the Act has long been due in view of the evils that have gathered in the University life and the vitiated atmosphere that prevails there.

Mr. Kher has prominently mentioned one principal amendment which he desires to bring about, namely the election of the Vice-Chancellor by the Senate. While it is certainly desirable to have an elected Vice-Chancellor, it should be borne in mind that the position in the University would be worse than what it is at present if simultaneously with this amendment other more substantial amendments connected with the elective system, the administrative procedure, the appointment of examiners, etc., are not also brought about.

The point that I have to make is this. In the present vitiated atmosphere of the University, created by cliques, groups and all sorts of undesirable combinations with the only object of dividing the spoils, the election of the Vice-Chancellor would provide another opportunity for the play of these evil forces, and an elected Vice-Chancellor will have necessarily to adopt partizan views, and in his administrative capacity will have to satisfy the cravings of the groups that supported him.

What is more to be feared is this. Really worthy men, will be disinclined to stand for election, because there is little hope for them to succeed unless they are also willing to submit themselves to all the demoralising tricks, intrigues, manoeuvres, devices, etc., without which success would be difficult in a contest, especially against those who hold no scruples in such matters. It must be admitted in this connection that Vice-Chancellors appointed by Government have been worthy men who, not being dependent upon any groups in the Senate, have all along kept an impartial and independent attitude and filled the position with distinction. Mr. Chandavarkar who has just retired and Mr. Masani the new Vice-Chancellor, are men whose ability and impartiality none can question, but I very much doubt if they would succeed in an election or would even care to stand for it.

Therefore, it is that I feel convinced that without more comprehensive amendments the mere conferring of a right on the Senate to elect their Vice-Chancellor would make the situation worse in the University. I need not detail here what these amendments should be. The whole of the present system of electing the Senate will have to be replaced by another. There should be general election every three years and a radical redistribution of seats, and certain methods followed by candidates in the election should be prohibited. Prof. P. A. Wadia who has had long practical experience of University working, also holds the same view.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

It would also be desirable—I feel it is necessary—to appoint one whole-time paid Rector to look after administrative matters, while the Vice-Chancellor's business would be connected with senate meetings. The right of interpellations should be conferred on Senate members, as this would serve to bring before the public, many matters regarding the internal administration of the University.

The Hon'ble Mr. Kher would do well to appoint a small committee of about three independent men of high educational experience to report on this matter after due enquiry and keep himself ready with a satisfactory Bill to be introduced in the Legislature immediately after the Government of India Act, 1935 is amended in Parliament on the lines proposed by the Secretary of State.

PROHIBITION IN INDIA.*

News has recently reached this country that the city of Bombay and its suburbs will soon become a Prohibition Area. From August next no intoxicants are allowed to be sold except to Europeans and Americans, and the excepted people are allowed to use them only in their homes. This decision comes from a long discussed reform programme, and the Indian people are to be congratulated that definite action in the achievement of this reform has at last been taken. It is to be hoped that this action will be followed up rapidly by similar decisions for other parts of the country until the people of the entire country will be freed from this great curse.

The great leader of the Indian people, Mahatma Gandhi, voices the feelings of the reformers in these words: "It means new and substantial accession of moral and material strength.....Our freedom will be the freedom of slaves if we continue to have anything to do with the drink habit and the drug habit. Is any cost too much to establish complete Prohibition in all the Provinces?"

That is constructive statesmanship. Short-sighted people will grumble and say that the cost is too much, and will point to the immediate loss of one million pounds revenue in this action. Let no one be disturbed by such a statement. A million pounds sounds like a great deal of money to a poor man, but let the poor man count up the many millions of pounds that will be saved in the process. In the United States of America between four and five billions of dollars (about eight billions Straits Currency) was spent for intoxicants alone in 1936. This is an enormous amount of money which few can comprehend at all. Deducting from this figure the few millions paid to the government in revenue, and there still would remain a good seven billions saving for the people. But that is only the beginning of the saving; in one state only there were five institutions. The running expenses of these institutions for the year 1936 was about $4,000,000 (Straits Currency)—a considerable saving for the people of one state, and the chief cause of delinquency in those institutions was alcohol. When one adds to these figures the hospitals, sanitoria, prisons, reformatories, and a host of other social institutions made necessary, very largely to care for the victims of alcohol, one can begin to realize the enormous saving to a country in dollars and cents only if intoxicants could be banned entirely for beverage purposes. If, in addition to all this, the misery, poverty, suffering, destruction of life and property directly attributable to the use of intoxicants is taken into account, one finds it difficult to understand how anyone can consider it a cause for congratulation to live in a country where alcohol is permitted to flow freely. Here is a situation in which it is ridiculous to think of the amount that is lost through Prohibition as compared with the enormous savings to the people. Congratulations are due to India who has the courage to start on a difficult crusade of reform.

Malaysia Message, Singapore.

How Medical Science Views Alcohol.

Below are given the resolutions of the American Medical Association with regard to the use of alcohol as a beverage or for medical purposes.

"Whereas, we believe that the use of alcohol is detrimental to the human economy; and

Whereas, its use in therapeutics as a tonic or a stimulant and for food has no scientific value; Therefore,

Be it resolved, that the American Medical Association is opposed to the use of alcohol as a beverage and

Be it further resolved, that the use of alcohol as a therapeutic agent should discouraged."

PROHIBITION AND NEW TAXATION.*

Opponents of the Prohibition scheme have not given up the battle, but have altered their lines of attack. It is no longer the moral issue in compulsion, the impracticability of the measure, the legitimate rights of the tired worker that form the pabulum of the sceptic, but the truer objections he has had in the secret places which emerge now. No one doubts at this date the amelioration that has occurred among the drinking classes and the Madras Premier's modest criterion of fifty per cent success has already been attained. In vain critics seek the fulfilment of their forebodings in the periodical reports of the District Officers. The call for renewed vigilance is taken as an indication that a state of desperation has been reached in the attempt, and that public opinion has slackened in zeal. It is forgotten that the public opinion referred to was not born on the eve of the Prohibition Act, but is the long established tradition of India which is not a changing mood. Public opinion has been reinforced by the support of women who are the immediate beneficiaries of the scheme. To this body of opinion may be added also the chastened reflections of the men who have been weaned away from the evil habit. Not demonstrative, but firmly founded in their convictions, the converts act as aggressive propagandists of the protective measure that Prohibition is.

On the practical question, whether the enormous excise revenue can be replaced, fresh light has been thrown. New taxation measures show that other sources are available though not to the full extent of the needs. Here it is that opposition has been consolidated. Congress Provinces have adopted the principle, that whereas a small minority of the population—viz., the drinking classes—contributed as much as a third or fourth of the provincial revenue and thus relieved the others of their obligations, the latter hereafter should be made to pay in more equitable proportion. This does not go as far as the other principle that the Congress would like to operate—viz. transference of the superabundance of wealth from the rich so as to benefit the poor. At the present stage Prohibition has led to no more than this distribution of taxation and is merely an approach to an elementary canon of taxation. To an electorate brought up under a system in which they were delicately treated, the change is "revolutionary," but when the issues are realised, they will know that, if Prohibition did not force the change, the reform was inevitable at a near date in some other form. The Congress Ministers have a hard battle to fight on this score and neither in Madras nor in Bombay have they bowed before the storm. Excise revenue is only an illustration of the iniquities of taxation. Discussion hereafter is bound to centre on the broader issue and the alleged failure of Prohibition will then cease to be a weapon in the hands of the tax-dodging privileged classes.

PROHIBITION IN THE U. P.

The second anniversary of the introduction of Provincial Autonomy in the United Provinces was marked by the extension of Prohibition to four more districts in the province, Bijnor, Budaun, Farrukhabad and Jaunpur. The total area of these districts is 6,996 square miles, with a total population of 30,59,112. Etah and Mainpuri districts, covering 3,392 square miles with a population of 16,10,111, were declared "dry" in April, 1938. In a message on the occasion, the Premier, Pandit G. B. Pant, says that the success of Prohibition in the districts of Etah and Mainpuri should convince the sceptic and encourage the weak and wavering that Prohibition is a practical proposition. The whole province would soon be rid of this evil which had spread misery in palaces and huts alike. The United Provinces Government have also introduced a system of State management of liquor sales in big cities and industrial areas, which will effectively lower the consumption of intoxicants. The retail sale prices of certain intoxicants have been raised. The U. P. Government's excise revenue has been reduced by these measures from Rs. 152 lakhs in 1936-37 to Rs. 115 lakhs, while the expenditure on preventive measures has increased by Rs. 150,000. The import, transport or possession of any quantity of opium, intoxicating hemp, drugs, country spirit and foreign or Indian-made liquor is prohibited in these areas. Exemptions have been granted to priests or Ministers of the Christian religion for import, transport or possession by them of grape wines for sacramental purposes. Troops, either permanently stationed in the districts or in transit through them and bona fide travellers, while aboard railway trains passing through these districts or while waiting at railway stations to catch a train, are allowed possession or transport of two gallons or twelve quart bottles of Indian or foreign liquor, one seer of up to 35 degrees of country liquor or equivalent quantities of spirits of other strength and two tolas of charas or ganja. Railway dining cars attached to runing trains can possess liquor for sale to bona fide travellers under their dining car licences. Consignments of intoxicants booked on rail from and to outside the four districts are exempted, provided they are not tampered with or used in these districts. Exemption is also made in the case of hospitals or dispensaries or addicts or personal permits as approved by the Collector.

Marriage Reform Legislation:—On the suggestion of the Premier and Begum Shah Nawaz, Lala Duni Chand withdrew her Punjab Hindu Marriage Reform Bill, in the Punjab Legislative Assembly. She accepted the offer to serve on a select committee to which Bhai Fateh Jang Singh's Punjab Hindu and Sikh Polygamy Bill would be referred.

PROHIBITION IN BIHAR.

A Gazette Notification prohibits, from April 1, the tapping of toddy and the transport of country liquor, ganja and bhang in Hajipur subdivision of Muzaffarpore district, Jharia coalfield in Manbhum district, in police stations of Hazaribagh, Ichak, Barkagaon, Mundu and Ramgarh in Hazaribagh district and in police stations of Ranchi, Burmu, Mandar, Ormanjhi and Angara, in Ranchi district. Pachwai, an indigenous drink used by aboriginal tribes in Chota-Nagpur, has also been prohibited in the dry areas of Manbhum, Hazarigarh and Ranchi districts, aboriginal tribes possessing pachwai, manufactured by them for domestic use, being exempted. Exemption is also granted in the case of bona fide travellers proceeding from one non-prohibited area to another, without halting in the prohibited area for more than 48 hours and the railway administrations. These prohibitory orders are issued under the Bihar and Orissa Excise Act of 1915.

Steps are being taken to ensure the success of prohibition which has been introduced in the coal-field area, Dhanbad. A meeting of the local Congress workers was held under the presidentship of the Hon'ble Babu Jaglal Choudhury to devise ways and means of making the experiment a success. It was tentatively decided that a committee of officials and non-officials should be formed to which would be entrusted a fully-equipped propaganda van to carry on prohibition propaganda. Mr. Jnananjan Niyogi, Officer-in-charge of Corporation Commercial Museum, Calcutta, had been invited by Dr. Rajendra Prasad to lecture on Prohibition.

DR. GILDER ON PARSI OPPOSITION.

"Do not judge my community from what some of them have been doing for the last few days in their excitement. I implore you to postpone judgment till October this year," said the hon. Dr. Gilder, Minister for Excise, addressing a well-attended meeting at Matunga, organised by the Prohibition Propaganda Board, appointed by the Government of Bombay. Referring to the agitation carried on by the Parsi community, against the Prohibition policy of the Congress Ministry, he said, "I know my community very well. I am after all a limb of that community. Do I not know my people? Please do not judge them from what they have been doing now. The Parsi community is essentially a sound community. It is known for its sound common sense. Otherwise, could it have maintained its integrity for the last thirteen hundred years in this country? All that is happening now is mere effervesence. Give them time. Let them cool down, and then you can judge them."

PALESTINE ARABS AND PROHIBITION.

The Palestinian Arabs who are struggling for freedom, have a keen realisation of the importance of enforcing total abstinence from intoxicating drinks on their fellows as essential to the success of their cause. Miss Mary Campbell, the veteran worker of the Women's Christian Temperance Union and a warm friend of the Arabs, in a letter written on New Year's Eve from Jerusalem, said: "As you may have heard the Seychelles exiles have been released. They should reach Port Said today. I'm personally acquainted with Dr. Khalide, the Mayor of Jerusalem, who is one of the five deportees. He helped us in our fight against drink. A poster in Arabic signed and sealed by the leaders of the revolutionaries, is on the city walls today. It contains eleven points. The first two refer to drink.

No. 1. Any person seen drinking a third time will be shot. No. 2. Any house where drink is kept or served will be destroyed. Drastic action against drink, but it is the Arab way. They have pleaded many years to have relief and no response. So now they, having become weary, resort to violence. I know some of the leaders, both Christians and Arabs."

SIR PHEROZESHAH MEHTA AND DRINK.

In the course of the recent agitation against Prohibition references have been made to Sir Pherozeshah Mehta and a controversy has grown around the probable attitude that he would have taken towards Prohibition. Considering this the remarks made by Sir Pherozeshah Mehta against the setting up of one liquor shop at Matheran in his speech during the discussion of the Bombay Budget for 1898-99, have a much wider application than the particular case discussed by him. If it was reprehensible to attempt to raise revenue "out of the drunkenness of the people" surely it must be equally so to make money out of it. We extract the passage below:—

"A case in point has come under my personal observation at Matheran, which has existed for 45 years without the need of a liquor shop having been discovered. Suddenly, the rains before last, when nobody was on the hill, it was decided that a liquor shop should be started. I know that the department is always supposed to give notice. We are told that notices were given in this case, but they must have been affixed to the trunk of trees, but without people to read them as the population all go down to the plains in the rains. When the time came for the people to go up to the hill they found this abomination flourishing vigorously and they also found that there was an increase of crime and disorder, and a representation was made to the Superintendent. The reason I have asked for the correspondence is that I believe it contains a report from the Superintendent that in consequence of the opening of the liquor shop there has been an increase of crime and disorder upon the hill. If that is part of the report, I can bear it out from my own observation. The opposition to this liquor shop came from no fictitious parties, but from the more respectable visitors on the hill and those who occupy their houses permanently, and no greater mistake could have been allowed than to permit this establishment to be started. I know we must bow to the decrees of Providence, that is to say we must bow to the resolutions of Government, which are something like the laws of the Persians and the Medes; but I must say that the establishment of a liquor shop in a place like Matheran does not speak well for the bona fides of the spirit in which Akbari administration is carried on in this Presidency. In itself a very small case, but it illustrates the arbitrary and selfish way in which revenue is attempted to be made out of the drunkenness of the people."

PROBLEM OF PROHIBITION IN A NUTSHELL.

(By V. S. Muuvedkar.)

Habits are not born with men, nor acquired with any deep thought. They are generally acquired sportively, casually, carelessly, customarily. Only when they are indulged in for a time—often against one's inclination, as in the company of friends—they begin to take root, look nice, and become more indispensable than food. As a glaring example of this, take the case of meat-eating. Vegetarians, far from envying meat-eaters, or feeling the necessity of eating meat or the inclination of trying its taste, actually get giddy and nauseous at its very sight and smell, and pity and despise those that eat such [illegible] with so much zest. And the reason for [illegible] is simply that they have not been accustomed to eating it. No man is born either a meat-eater or vegetarian, like tiger or deer. And the same rule applies to the case of addicts of the different drugs also. 4 p. c.

If, accordingly, a bad habit is to be rooted out the best way of doing it is to nip it in the bud. Those not yet addicted to it should be warned against its bad effects, the allurements should be made difficult or impossible of obtaining—like fire-arms or explosives—and their use highly criminal. Those already addicted and unable to give it up should be given a permit, allowing them to continue their indulgence, in a gradually descending degree if possible, or without any restriction, if otherwise leaving them to their fate. A habit, which has come down almost from the beginning of the world, and is prevailing over the entire world, may well be allowed to continue for a generation more or so, without any very serious danger to society.

Lastly, whether or how far, and of what particular stuff, the habit of drink or of other drugs is harmful appears yet to need careful investigation. The objectionable features, however, of excessive use of intoxicants, such as improper behaviour in public places or cruel treatment of family members should be made more severely punishable by law, if they are not already adequately punishable. And this much provision should suffice for the transition period, until the question is fully and calmly discussed at length, and suitable measures decided upon in due course.

GOOD GOVERNMENT.

The Editor,
Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

The Rajkot muddle has for the present ended in what Gandhiji has himself described as a defeat, the second great triumph of his Guru which Mr. Munshi proclaimed with such gusto and acclaimed with all the enthusiasm of an idol-worshipper has turned out to be an acknowledged defeat. The pathetic statement of Gandhiji issued on his departure from Rajkot makes interesting reading. There is one aspect of this affair which ought to receive the attention it deserves. Gandhiji says in this statement that the Parishad people were of the opinion that the all important question was the removal of Darbar Veeravala, and that he (Gandhiji) had to point out to them that the removal of Veeravala would only spell good government but that it would not be self-government. This means that the Rajkot Parishad is willing to be content with "Good Government," and that an outside agency—the Congress—is pressing it to press for self-government. The demand for self-government is therefore not genuine, but only engineered by the Congress for its own ends—for assuring a majority of votes to put the Congress in power when Federation comes. There is implied in this the existence of a movement for swallowing Federation, if and when it comes, of which Mr. Bose complained so bitterly and of which complaint so much fuss was made by the Rightists.

This leads me to ask one question to your readers: If the politics of Rajkot and Kathiawar are tortuous are those of the Congress less so?

If appears to me it is high time people should speak out their minds freely and frankly if the great National organisation is to be saved from a fatal downfall.

Yours etc.,
Veerbal H. Mehta.

THE TRADITIONAL HOME OF THE SANDALWOOD TREE.

It is in perfumery that the greater proportion of Sandalwood Oil is employed at the present day and to discriminating buyers, such as perfumers and soap manufacturers must of necessity be, it is hardly necessary to extol the virtues of the East Indian Oil which is without equal, both as a fine perfume base and a fixative for the increasingly popular bouquets of the Oriental type. In addition it is now being used extensively, and with marked success, in the creation of some of the more delicate perfumes in which the Sandalwood odour is not required as a predominant character.

A few trials will convince the perfumer who has not taken full advantage of the odour-value of this oil, that is of the greatest use to him, not only for predominant Sandalwood odour where required, but also a modifier and a fixative for other odours. This is true for liquid perfumes, soaps, creams, powders and all other cosmetic preparations. It will be found invaluable to those up-to-date perfumers who pride themselves on their own "creations."

NOTES.

Mrs. Munshi's Monogamy Bill :—The demand for prohibiting by law polygamous marriages, is becoming insistent among the women of India. There are two Bills pending before the Indian Legislature, Mrs. Subbarayan's in the Legislative Assembly and Mr. Govindlal Shivlal's in the Council of State. There is a similar Bill pending in the Punjab. Last week, Mrs. K. M. Munshi got her Bill circulated for opinion to the public after the first reading in the Bombay Legislative Assembly. The Home Minister of the Government of Bombay accepted the principle of the measure on behalf of Government. This is the first occasion in the history of Legislative Assemblies when wife and husband have cooperated in carrying through social legislation. Another noteworthy feature was that an objection raised by a member to a Muslim member speaking on the Bill as it related to marriages among Hindus, did not find support either from the Speaker or from the general body of members. Social legislation, although it may be found expedient for the time being to confine it to one community, has always an educational value for all communities; and, therefore, no restriction should be placed on members participating in legislation on the ground of caste or creed. This is especially important in the case of legislation affecting Hindus, because the social progress of the Hindu community, which forms the largest single community in the country, has a strong indirect influence on all communities. The progress of Hindus on right lines is thus the concern of all communities, so much so that Hindu social legislation may be said to be intended for the whole country and all communities. Both Mrs. Munshi and the Home Minister made out a very strong case for the measure and several other members also spoke in its support. There was some criticism on the ground that the right of divorce is to be given only to women. As we pointed out last week in our comments on a similar objection of Sir Nripendra Sircar to Dr. Deshmukh's Bill in the Indian Legislative Assembly, there is already relief available to the Hindu husband tormented by a flighty wife, while there is none for a wife tied to a husband who takes another wife and leaves her helpless.

Parsi Women and Prohibition:—The proceedings of the meeting of Parsi women in Bombay last Sunday to protest against the introduction of Prohibition, will be read with astonishment all over the world. For Prohibition is an integral part of the women's movement. The incidence of the liquor habit bears most banefully on women and children. We have not come across all these years a single instance of a women's organisation having stood up against Prohibition. In the United States every women's organisation supported Prohibition. The Dowager Lady Cowasjee Jehangir who presided spoke of the services rendered to the country by Dadabhai Naoroji and Sir Pherozeshah Mehta. Not the least part of their services was that they were persistent critics of the Government's Abkari policy and, as we said the other day, they would have been, were they alive today, the staunchest supporters of the Prohibition policy. In any case, the value of their services, which is acknowledged by all, can not be set off against the demoralisation and ruin wrought by the liquor trade in the countryside and among the masses generally. Surely, Lady Jehangir will not urge that nothing should be done to stop this as the first step in redeeming the poorest of our people from the hardships and misery of their daily life. If Prohibition must come, she said, let it come gradually. Evil habits are never broken gradually. They must be broken at once or not at all. And they cannot be broken unless the environment which favours them is quickly and completely changed. So long as the liquor trade is allowed to flourish it is futile to expect that the hard-worked illiterate worker will have sufficient strength of mind to resist temptations. The President and other speakers criticised Mahatma Gandhi and appealed to him to stop the introduction of Prohibition. It is as well for them to be reminded that, while Gandhiji has certainly done much to bring Prohibition in the range of practical politics, it is no longer in his power to prevent it should he wish to do so. The momentum of a long tradition will carry it on until the curse of drink is utterly destroyed.

The Rajkot Muddle:—When Sir Maurice Gwyer's "advice" regarding the legal interpretation of the Thakore Sahib's notification and letter to Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel on the constitution of a Reforms Committee, was published, Gandhiji expressed his opinion that he and his friends were completely vindicated and that they had all that they wanted. Gandhiji returned from Delhi to Rajkot to submit a list of seven names to the Committee. Before he could do this, he was confronted by the Bhayats or clansmen of the Thakore with a letter of his in which Gandhiji had promised to have the group represented on the Committee. The Muslims of Rajkot also made a similar claim. Dr. Ambedkar on behalf of the scheduled castes urged that they should have proper representation on the Committee. To meet these demands Gandhiji proposed that the membership of the Committee should be increased from 10 to 14 or 15 and that the three official members should be deprived of their votes in order to ensure the Parishad seven being a majority! Sir Maurice, however, had distinctly laid down that the number of the Committee should be ten and this the Thakore Sahib considered to be binding on him. After protracted negotiations, no agreement was found possible and Gandhiji sent a list of seven men to the Thakore Sahib for nomination to the Committee. Here he encountered another obstacle. It was a condition that the seven should be subjects or servants of the State. Rajkot is itself a small State but owing to its being the headquarters of the Political Agent of the Governor General, persons from all the Kathiawar States are congregated there. The advisers of the Thakore Sahib on scrutinising Gandhiji's list, apparently had no difficulty in finding that all but one of the seven were neither subjects nor servants of the Rajkot State. The Thakore Sahib has, it is understood, requested Gandhiji to produce the credentials of the six to establish their claim to be his subjects. Gandhiji maintions that his promise to Bhayats had implicit in it certain conditions which, not having been realised, the promise falls to the ground. Unless the non-realisation can be shown to be due to the action or omission of the Bhayats, this argument has no force. The Bhayats have requested the Viceroy to refer Gandhiji's to Sir Maurice Gwyer for interpretation. Gandhiji is agreeable to a reference but he thinks that a Judge of the Bombay High Court would do for the purpose. The Bhayats however, may insist that the same mind which interpreted the Thakore Sahib's notification should be applied to Gandhiji's letter. For other reasons too, we think it desirable not to add to the already heavy calls made on the Bombay High Court for extra-judicial tasks.

The Paramount Power:—The Paramount Power is not playing a straight game in the Rajkot affair. Recent pronouncements have established three propositions. The Paramount Power does not stand in the way of Indian Princes introducing constitutional reforms. It does not at the same time surrender any part of its right as Paramount Power. It is for a ruler himself to decide what reforms should be introduced. The rights of paramountcy being undefined, it is no easy matter to determine whether any particular scheme of constitutional reform will or will not impinge on them. The British Government has to go to Parliament in order to get the Government of India Act amended so as to empower the Central Government in an emergency to assume control over the Provincial Governments. So far as the States are concerned, no Parliamentary enactment is necessary or possible. The Paramount Power can do it in virtue of its paramountcy. The rulers well understand the position and themselves offer to place themselves and all their resources at the disposal of the Suzerain when such occasions are even remotely in prospect. They cannot do this if there is a Constitution, as the term is generally understood, except by suspending it; and they should have the power to do this if they are to fulfil their obligations to the Paramount Power. In order to avoid this situation which will certainly provoke a political crisis, rulers of States will do well to frame their schemes of reform in consultation with the Paramount Power or at least not promulgate it before securing its approval. The Paramount Power may simplify the situation by taking the initiative and transmiting to the States a model scheme answering all requirements, which may be adopted in each State with suitable local modifications. What seems to be queer is that the Paramount Power should require the ruler of Rajkot to have the scheme for his State formulated by a Committee the majority of members to which are to be nominated by a political leader in British India. The Paramount Power might and, in our opinion, should itself advise the Thakore Sahib, to adopt what it considers would be a suitable scheme of constitution for his State instead of involving him in a controversy which can not but have the effect of undermining his authority with his subjects. If the Paramount Power thought that the Thakore was not competent for his position, it has the right to depose him and to appoint a regency with the Sardar himself as the President, if he cares to accept the responsibility. What is unintelligible is that the Paramount Power should make a stalking horse of Gandhiji and tie him down to Rajkot while all India questions of grave importance are being held up, amongst others the question of Federation.

Absentee Legislators:—There was an interesting debate on Wednesday 12th April in the Bombay Legislative Assembly on a solution moved by Mr. M. M. Patel from Ahmednagar, calling attention to the steady fall in the attendance of members and suggesting as a remedy that, instead of the present monthly allowance of Rs. 75, the old practice of a fee for each day of attendance should be reverted to. The discussion turned almost entirely on the monetary attractions of membership. The Prime Minister maintained that the monthly allowance was not inadequate having regard to the general economic conditions. He thought a more convenient arrangement of the hours at which the Assembly sat, might attract more members. We agree with Mr. Kher that the question of allowances is not the primary issue. We do not think that the change of the hours of the sittings of the Assembly would appreciably improve the attendance. The real cause of the large proportion of absentee members is that the debates in the Assembly have no reality. The policies of Government are decided upon by the party organisation. However valuable the suggestions of non-party members may be, they have little chance of making any impression on the predetermined course of Government. It is sheer waste of time for members to study questions, attend the Assembly and make speeches. The average mofussil member finds more to interest him in the streets than in the Council Chamber. So far as his influencing the course of legislation by his presence goes, he may as well remain at home and give a standing proxy to some local inhabitant who has a seat in the Assembly. Unless the proceedings of the Legislature become effective in moulding legislation policy, membership will cease to attract any but party hacks who will have to be hired by the hour, like mutes at a funeral.

Prohibition in the U.S.A. :—Once a country has had experience of Prohibition, there is little danger of the people completely abandoning the policy. The Rev. John Haynes Holmes commenting on the decision of the network of National Broadcasting in the U. S. A. not to allow liquor advertisements from their stations, remarks that it is the beginning of the re-introduction of Prohibition in America. He writes in Unity :

> The fight against the indecencies and dangers of liquor marches on. Thus, the great National Broadcasting Company has just issued the following announcement: "The National Broadcasting Company will henceforth not accept on its networks any advertising for beer or light wines, and this new regulation is an extension of the company's ban against liquor advertising." The next step is the Columbia network. Then the newspapers! Step by step back to Prohibition—for, of course this action of the N. B. C. is Prohibition applied to the vast courses of the air!

This is not surprising. The repeal of Prohibition was possible mainly because of a feeling that lawlessness would be checked if liquor was allowed freely in the United States. That hope has proved to be unfounded. The American problem, however, is greatly complicated by the growth of vested interests round the liquor trade. When Indians talk of crores invested in liquor, they mean no more than that so much stocks of liquor are lying with them. The licensing system adopted here by which every year the shops are auctioned, has prevented the growth of vested interests in the liquor in India, and that is a great advantage which no prudent Government will throw away.

Indians in British Guiana—Indian Opinion, official organ of the British Guiana East Indian Association, publishes a broadcast address by Mr. J. D. Tyson whom the Government of India have deputed to assist Indians in the West Indies to present their case before the Royal Commission which has been appointed to investigate and report on the administration in that part of the world. Mr. Tyson's views on repatriation are inspired by a spirit of genuine sympathy with the Indians past middle age who feel a longing to return to the mother country. But his knowledge and experience of the lot of repatriated Indians in this country, constrained him to advise them against being lured by the free passage to which they are entitled, to think of repatriation. A deputation of Indian women waited on the Secretary for Education at New Delhi to plead for measures to help repatriated Indians. We do not know what he told them but it will be a mistake if the impression gets abroad in Guiana or elsewhere that there are many openings here for repatriates and that it is the remissness of Government that prevents their being made available to them. Mr. Tyson's advice to the Guiana Indians was both wise and timely. Indian Opinion alo prints the Memorandum of the British Guiana East India Association submitted to the Royal Commission. It is a careful and business-like document. In the forefront of their wants, Guiana Indians place the urgent need of the appointment of an Agent of the Government of India to "harmonize conflicting view-points and to present our difficulties and problems authoritatively and without prejudice to any particular interest." The memorandum refers to the existence of Agents in South Africa, Ceylon and British Malaya "where it has been of undoubted service to the Indian community" and expresses the opinion "that similar benefits will accrue to our community if such representation be granted."

Mussolini's Reply:—Signor Mussolini has replied to President Roosevelt's indictment of his aggressions and exhortation to repent and be saved with the economic co-operation of the United States. He repudiated the charge of aggression. He maintained that what he had taken and may take yet were but Italy's just rights of which she was violently robbed by her rivals in the Empire business. Signor Mussolini's reply was made in the course of his speech to the members of the organising Committee of the Rome Universal Exhibition of 1942. The Duce's tone to the President was that of a schoolmaster pointing out the spelling mistakes of an elementary schoolboy in his first exercise.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER
BOMBAY, April 22, 1939.

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

President Roosevelt's personal "message" to Signor Mussolini and Herr Hitler offering them America's economic cooperation if they would give him a pledge that their armed forces would not attack a number of independent countries which he specifies, came upon us as a complete surprise. The President has himself and through his Secretaries slanged the Dictators to his heart's content. Even so recently as on the 14th April he had, in his address to the Board of the Pan-American Union at Washington, ridiculed and condemned them, though this time his language was somewhat less unrestrained. He compared the methods of the Dictators by implication to those of Huns and Vandals 1500 years ago. The very next day it was announced from Washington that the President had requested the two European Dictators to give him the pledge, offering as an inducement his help in their economic reconstruction. The countries for which the guarantee is sought are: Finland, Esthonia, Latvia, Lithuania, Sweden, Norway, Denmark, Spain, Switzerland, Leichtenstein, Luxumburg, Poland, Hungary, Roumania, Yugoslavia, Russia, Bulgaria, Greece, Turkey, Iraq, the Arabias, Syria, Palestine, Egypt, Iran, Holland, Belgium, Great Britain, Eire, France and Portugal. The President does not mention in his list Ethiopia, nor Czechoslovakia, Memel and Albania, which have already been absorbed. Nor does he mention Danzig which is at present a bone of contention between Germany and Poland. The President has also omitted South Africa, Australia and New Zealand which are self-governing Dominions of the British Commonwealth like Canada which is covered by a special declaration made by the Prsident some months before, and Eire. Does the inclusion of Eire and the omission of Australia, New Zealand and South Africa, mean that the President regards the Free State as having an independent status which the others have not? It can not be that he thinks aggression on the last three Dominions would not affect his scheme for ensuring world peace. The omission of India is, of course, because India has no independence to lose. But would an attack on India be regarded as an aggression on Great Britain? What about Kenya, Uganda and Tanganiyika? Are these also to be regarded as forming part of Great Britain? Would an attack on Singapore come under the definition of attack on the independence of Great Britain? Why has not the President addressed a similar request to the third member of the Axis, Japan? There are other questions. Does the President expect that by giving economic assistance to the Dictator countries he would manage to get rid of the Dictators? If not, what is his object in helping to strengthen the Dictator regimes which he has several times denounced as a menace to Democracies? Or has the President come to realise that, menace or no menace, the Dictatorships have come to stay and that as the head of a big business community he had better come to terms with them? That the President's request is a lowering of the flag which he had flaunted before goes without saying. That he should do so when Great Britain and France have discarded the Chamberlain policy of appeasment and have themselves offered guarantees to several of the European countries included in the President's list, only adds to the perplexity caused by his unexpected invitation to the Dictators to an international banquet. Along with the annexations of Ethiopia, Austria, Czechoslovokia, Memel, the President is apparently also prepared to swallow the anti-Jew policy of Germany which he has also denounced in unmeasured terms.

Mr. E. Lindley in an article headed "What is American Foreign Policy?" in the New Statesman (March 25) observes:—

> Those Americans who believe that the role of the United States is to defend right against wrong everywhere in the world, to oppose aggression everywhere, to defend international morality, favour one kind of foreign policy. Those who believe that the proper role of the United States is to defend only itself and its neighbours to the North and South, believe in another kind of foreign policy. The President has never clearly stated in which of these two policies, or in which variant of them, he believes. Or rather, he has talked at times as if he favoured one and at times as if he favoured the other. The pronouncements issuing from the State departments seem to me to have been equally confused and contradictory.

Recently, however, Mr Lindley says, the President has moved farther towards the ideas of the internationalists and even of the interventionists. In the speech at the Pan-American Board, the President spoke emphatically on this point. He said:—

> The American family of nations may also rightfully claim now to speak to the rest of the world. We have interests wider than that of the mere defence of our sea-ringed Continent. The economic functioning of the world becomes increasingly a unit. No interruption of it anywhere can fail in future to disrupt economic life everywhere. The next generation will be concerned with the methods by which the New World can live together with the Old. We have a right to say that there shall not be an organisation of world affairs which permits us no choice but to turn our countries into barracks, unless we are vassals of some conquering Empire.

If this means anything it means that the Dictator organisation of world affairs is a menace to the freedom of the New World and should be put an end to by the latter for its own protection. How is this consistent with the request to the Dictators to enter into a pact which would let them grow and prosper with the economic cooperation of the United States? According to this doctrine the duty of the American Republics is, under the President's leadership and in alliance, if possible, with the European democracies to undertake a crusade against the Dictatorships and destroy them root and branch. Does Mr. Roosevelt think that the pact he now proposes will be a means to that end?

He does not want them to relinquish what they have already taken. He does not evidently mind Germany taking Danzig. Italy, Ethiopia and Albania are not in the President's list. Their independence has been lost before the President thought of his message. Or did he wait to launch his message until the countries which, in his view, did not deserve independence, had lost it? Italian claims against France remain. But the President's request that the Dictators should not attack the independence of France is capable of being interpreted to mean that Tunis and Djibuti are outside the geographical limits of France and that the interests in the Suez Canal belong legally to Egypt and if France and Great Britain can share them, Italy too may rightfully get her finger into the pie. Of the countries which are now subject to the countries whose protection Mr. Roosevelt is concerned to get the Dictators to guarantee, the message says nothing. The President's sole object is to maintain the status quo as at the moment of his delivering message. But what of China in the Presidential list? Germany and Italy are not the most likely aggressors in her case but Russia and Japan. The latter indeed is already in possession of a large part of the country. It is not to be expected that Germany and Italy will require the third member of the Axis, the most important too in view of the fact that it is the President of United States who has issued the message, to give up China. Incidentally, the message amounts to an implicit recognition of Manchukuo.

One was admonished in one's school days to beware of the fallacy of many questions. The typical example was "Have you left off beating your mother?" If the answer was 'Yes' it was an admission that you were beating your mother. If it was No, it meant that you would continue to do so. The logical Latin mind has quickly seized upon this fallacy and declared that the President's message is a crude and clumsy effort. The Dictators have postponed their reply till the end of this month. But it is clear that they do not mean to accept the imputation that they have been using, or intend to use, force except in self-defence. The fact that the President does not want them to give up Austria, Czechoslovakia, Memel, shows that the President is not prepared to challenge their plea as regards what has happened. Why, then, should he assume that they would wantonly attack the other countries except in the interests as they claim of "world peace." It is a good rule not only for private persons but also for statesmen to so conduct yourself with your opponent as if one day he were to be your friend. Finally, the revelations before the Senate Committee of the actual facts, apart from the professed ideals, which led the United States to enter the last War on the side of the Allies, can not be shaken off from the mind in speculating as to the causes which lay behind the dramatic appearance of the President on the European stage.

THE WAR IN CHINA.

At the outset of the Sino-Japanese War, Western diplomats were certain of a quick victory for Japan and planned accordingly. It was essential from their point of view that, whatever happened, their influence should suffer no abatement. Partly with this object and also doubtless inspired by a distaste for violent strife particularly in an area where so much British investment was tied up, British diplomats gave the traditional advice to China to make its peace with Japan instead of looking to the League of Nations or any other third party. In China the suggestion happened to be good. Curious that this standard advice should be refused in Abyssinia and in China, and be taken up in Czechoslovakia where political education is well advanced. In international affairs sometimes the obvious course is also the best defensive. A change came over Europe's political attitude to the conflict as it was realised that Japan would have to struggle hard for her Chinese laurels and that a Japanese victory would certainly not mean a continuance of trading rights for Europeans in China. The solution, it was felt, lay in a long war in which both parties would be exhausted. China was in no position to repel the invaders. Japan was not strong enough, nor were circumstances favourable, for her to consolidate her gains in China; in the course of events, Europe would be again re-established in influence, even if not in prestige in China. The last stage was that in which realising that their only hope lay in a grateful China, both the U. S. A. and Britain advanced useful loans to General Chiang Kai-shek's Government. This does not in itself mean, however, that the U. S. A. has ceased selling arms and munitions to Japan. "It was indeed sad for an American to realise," says Mr. Mowrer in his book on China (published January 1939), "that this daily slaughter of innocent non-combatants with the single purpose of terrorism, was largely being accomplished with materials supplied by American companies for a price." So far as trade with Japan is concerned, American cotton in the last quarter of 1938, as contrasted with a similar period in 1937, registered an advance of 302 per cent. India, it is well to mention, which was no whit behind other countries in politically condemning Japan's aggression, was second only to the U. S. A. in pushing forward her sales of cotton. As an index of the great difficulties that prevent an economic enforcement of political feeling however strong, this fact cannot be ignored. No account of the attitude of foreign Powers to China would be complete without a word as to the attitude of the Chinese to the different Powers. Russia by reason of her ever ready assistance with food and arms, as well as by the fact that the toughest resistance in China as in Spain was from the Communists, has established a claim to Chinese affections. The French maintained their prestige by their stand for rights in Hankow, in Shanghai and Tientsin.

Only in recent months have the Chinese people looked on Americans and Britons as possible friends.

The present war in China started over the five Northern Provinces—Hopei, Shantung, Shansi, Chahar and Suiyuan—which the Japanese hoped to detach from the rest of of China and unite into an "independent" regime. General Chiang Kai-shek took up the task of uniting China under one Government. The rapidity with which Japanese overran the doomed provinces and drove the Nanking Government out of the coastal provinces was astonishing. Their further advance was checked to a large extent by the geography of the country. The writ of the Nanking Government ran until the war only in the coastal areas; in the interior provincial administrations generally under some warlord were left to themselves. General Chiang Kai-shek, after several attempts to unite the independent rulers under his leadership, found that the bogey of Communism was not so effective after all. In persuading the Generalissimo to accept Japan as the common enemy, the Communists won the first battle. Japan's offensive in China has reached the conclusion of one stage. The objective of their attack has been more than achieved. It is obvious that if the Japanese army could rest at that, it would be glad to do so. But a new factor seems to have arisen. In retreating into the interior General Chiang is now able to enforce his rule over the western provinces. The old China started from the coastal Chiang-governed districts, shading in the centre and to the West into the Communist influenced and Communist provinces. The China of Chiang has for the moment fallen into Japanese hands. The only difference between the Japanese occupation of Chiang's China and her conquest of Manchukuo and Jehol, is that the latter was given up without a struggle on the advice of General Chiang himself. "Chiang Kaishek who wanted to avoid war at all costs," writes Edgar Snow, "urged non-resistance, withdrawal, reliance upon the League of Nations.....the sacrifice enabled the Generalissimo to hold his own tottering regime in Naking." The "New" China which General Chiang is now leading against Japan is the only barrier between Soviet Russia and war in the East. It is to put off a direct conflict until the German-Italian forces are ready to assist in the West, that Japan is drawing in her arms.

We publish this week an article by Dr. Foley describing at length the transformation of a little inhabited city into the cultural and administrative centre of China. The courage of the Chinese in rebuilding after such heavy losses surpasses even the staunch resistance of the Spanish Republicans. The Generalissimo for the time being represents the national resentment of politically minded China against the aggressions of Japan. But it seems extremely doubtful if with all the support in the world that they can possibly expect, Chiang's forces can thrust back the invaders from the provinces they now hold. The reports from China for the past three months have been mainly of towns conquered territory, won back by the Chinese and lost again. At present the main fighting is in the south-east round Canton and both sides have scored, as well as suffered reverses. Japan in her project to enforce conscription in Manchukuo reported recently, is launching on a new experiment which might prove her undoing or, if successful, turn out to be a grave menace to world peace.

THE INDORE MARRIAGE

(By J. M. Ganguli, Calcutta.)

When asked sometime back to write something in the autograph book of a revered and very cultured and thoughtful old lady closely related to a Prince I had written on the sin of Rajas' wasting their subjects' money.

> Waste is always bad and sinful, but when a working man misuses or wastes the money earned by his own labour, it is not so bad and sinful as when a raja wastes and misuses money. For, a raja does not earn money by his own labour, but from the labour of the poor, ill-fed men working hard on his field in all weathers under sun and rain. It is these cultivators who produce wealth out of the earth for the raja. When the wealth is produced the raja takes it, not even leaving enough for those people to maintain themselves with. A raja should have the picture of those half-clad, hungry people, unable even to give food to their crying children, before his eyes whenever he spends their money.

The secret marriage in Europe of the Maharaja Holkar of Indore makes me think today of writing, if I could, in the autograph books of all young Princes that on ascending the gaddi a Prince loses much of his own reckless freedom while he takes in hand the sacred protection of the freedom and interests of his subjects. And, perhaps more than in other respects his individual freedom of action in marriage has to be restricted. For, while marriage to none should be of purely individual concern but should be looked upon as having considerable social significance, in the case of a Prince it is of tremendous importance to his subjects, to his dynasty and also to his own self as a ruler. The holy institution of marriage is not to be viewed by him as a thing of passing fancy that can be indulged in at self-pleasure, but as an act that is full of responsibilities for him in his dual capacity as individual and as the custodian of the welfare and ideals of his people.

It is a great pity indeed that Princes in India as all countries have to be reminded of the above, for here in this land the great Ramachandra set the example of exiling his beloved wife Sita and of personally suffering greatly from her separation simply in order to save the standard of public morality. Sita was virtue herself no doubt, but as soon as Rama realised that his taking her back as wife after her imprisonment at Ravan's place was likely to be taken advantage of by others even in case of women not having the moral strength of Sita, and that it could thus lead to a lowering of public morals, he at once discarded all considerations about his happiness to keep public moral sense on a pure and high level.

Now in the land of Ramchandra a Prince goes abroad, secretly marries a girl in contravention of his own and of his State's religious and traditional customs. He forgets that his subjects are not only vitally interested in his upholding the religion and traditions of the State and in the life he leads, which must be above all possible reproach, but also in the line of succession that he procreates. When a Prince ascends the throne he automatically and by virtue of his position as protector of all interests of his subjects assumes full responsibilities to look to their interests. The incidental and automatic assumption of such responsibilities of a king with his accession is not unique in this country, but is also the rule and convention in the western countries, where a king cannot marry according to his fancy and where his marriage must have the approval of his ministers. King Edward VIII was forced to abdicate rather than be allowed to marry a woman that he was enamoured of. And by thus forcing him to abdicate the British Ministers and the British public showed their high sense of public morality and their insistence on a king having adequate strength of mind to overcome impulses for frolicsome romance. A king who lacks strength, ought better to leave the sacred responsibilities of kingship into others' hands and have thereafter the liberty to run after the woman or women who interest him more than the faithful discharge of his high duties and responsibilities.

That is a well-recognised principle based on very good reasons and but for its very unfortunate overriding by some Princes it should not have been necessary to stress it today. The young Indore Maharaja has not only unceremoniously violated it, but while evidently taking inspiration from the Duke of Windsor's apologia for his conduct for writing his own, he has not deemed it necessary to take into account the firm attitude of the British Cabinet and the British public towards the Duke. That because he feels he can with impunity ignore the feelings and sentiments of his weak subjects.

What answer to such conduct of a Prince are the States subjects and their leaders going to give?

It is indeed an issue not only affecting a single Central India State, but all States in general, for it involves the principle of consulting ministers and the public in important matters like a ruler's marriage a principle recognised and respected in all civilized and responsible governments. Indian States subjects are agitating for making their rulers responsible to them, but that they cannot do simply by inviting some Congress leaders or by prevaling on Gandhiji to lend his support to them. They have also to show their own sense of responsibility by bringing to a head any flagrant violation of vital principle of rulership by their rulers. The Indore marriage ought to provide an issue on which all States subjects should examine to have it definitely settled in conformity not only with age-honoured Indian traditions, but also with the accepted conventions in other countries as exemplified in the Windsor case. The raising of such an issue on the unlicensed liberty of Princes in their private life would also be, to some extent at least, effective in curbing their gallivanting tendencies in foreign countries, which seem to be increasing and becoming the habit of several Indian Princes, and which eat away a good deal of the State revenues, as also the vitals of the Princes themselves.

Meanwhile by interpellations in the Central Assembly some M. L. A. may bring to light important facts as to whether the Government were consulted by the Indore Maharaja before the marriage; where, when and under what law he contracted it; and with what stipulations regarding succession and maintenance; and as to the family history and connections of the lady, who is now the Maharani of the State.

THE MAHARAJA OF INDORE.

The Illustrated Weekly Times of India of the 16th April publishes the portrait of Miss Margaret Lawler, his marriage with whom was announced by the Maharaja of Indore recently. The lady is described further as an American girl, whom the Prince met when he was ill in Los Angeles in 1936; she was formerly married to Mr. John Paul Branyen. Hindu law does not recognise divorce but a Hindu Prince has not had to abdicate in order to marry a foreign woman who has been evidently divorced by or had divorced her first husband Our Princes are apparently going ahead very rapidly.

FEDERATION AND THE STATES.

(By K. CHANDAY, COONOOR.)

The review of Mr. M. K. Varadarajan's book on "The Indian States and Federation" published in your issue of 8th April, 1939 gives rise to certain reflections, which, I trust, might be interesting to your readers.

Several people have been cited as the parents of the Federal idea; and I have read in more than one biography that the idea had been considered and perhaps advocated, by some eminent British Indian administrators very many years ago. I am not aware, however, that any person has contradicted the claim made by me that I was the first to suggest in print more than ten years ago that the promises made in Parliament, and in India, could be adequately fulfilled only through a federation of British Indian Provinces and the Indian States, and that for establishing such a federation, a conference between the British Cabinet and representatives of the Princes and of British Indian leaders was essential. My arguments were published in the Hindu of Madras and some other South Indian papers. A collection of them with the rough outlines of such a federation was sent to some leading British Statesmen and Indian politicians and to a few Indian Princes, and also to the Secretary of the Simon Commission. Among those to whom I sent personal letters are the Marquis of Linlithgow before he became Viceroy, Lord (then Sir Malcolm) Hailey, Mahatma Gandhi, the Rt. Hon'ble Srinivasa Sastry, and Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru. My scheme had the full approval of two eminent experts, viz., Principal Shiraz and Dr. P. J. Thomas. One of them wrote to me recently that he still considers that my scheme was feasible, and was in fact the only method available—that is for fulfilling the promises made of establishing Dominion Status.

It should be remembered that these articles were published and the rough outlines drawn up and circulated long before the announcement of the Round Table Conference; and in one of the articles, it was surmised that Lord Irwin's visit to England must be for advising the Cabinet to call together such a conference.

How and why the Maharajah of Bikanir made his historic pronouncement, I do not know. The arguments showing the need for it had been sent by me for publication in Sir Albion Banerji's journal long previously, but it was published, I believe, subsequently. This article contains succintly my main arguments.

Very briefly stated, it was that the terms, 'India' and 'British India' had been both used in the various pronouncements of British authorities, and that whatever was in their mind (it is now clear that British India only was contemplated) it is simply impossible for Britain to fulfil its promise to India unless and until the States are also included in a joint Federation :—this is for the simple reason that

Defence and Foreign Affairs are included in Dominion Status. States will not agree, and there are no grounds ethical or political why they should agree, to the Nehru scheme of political subordination to a self-governing British Indian government. The only other solution is a Federation between the Provinces and the States.

The Government of India Act as it has finally emerged contains a dozen coincidences with the scheme adumbrated by me, but it does not give control in India to Defence and Foreign Affairs, and so the main argument for federation is not there. Politically a responsible and unitary British Indian government without Defence and Foreign Affairs would be only, as had been pointed out, a magnified form of local self goverment, and could not lead at any time to Dominion Status. Those who advocate it apparently do so either from want of a proper appreciation of the political facts which enter the situation or in the hope that after gaining an inch, they could take an ell.

I am not concerned with 'practical politics' of this nature; and I do not wish to weary your readers with the proposals for giving control in India to Paramountcy, Defence and Foreign Affairs—arguments which, I heard at the time, had the general approval of the Government of India also.

It is necessary, however, to say a word more about a question which is very pertinent today, viz. the question of the grant of responsible government in the States as a preliminary to their entering the Federation.

If the framers of the Government of India scheme had borne in mind 'the bearings' as they existed at the time, the subsequent exaltation of their status which has made federation with the States more difficult would not have occured.

Your review of Mr. Varadarajan's book has invited attention to one important difference to which reference had been made by me also in more than one contribution. Under the old scheme the Governor-General in Council, which included Indian members, acted as Agent of the Crown, in the case of the States. Sir C. P. Ramaswamy thus at one time was a part of the 'Paramountcy' over the State of Travancore. Now it is only the Governor-General who is the Agent. This was a vital change to which attention should have been invited by friends of India. In my humble scheme this difficulty had been foreseen, and the Agent of the Crown would have been the Viceroy advised by Privy Councillors appointed by the king; these Councillors would necessarily have included representatives of the Princes for Paramountcy, and their representatives as also of the Provinces for Defence and Foreign Affairs. Such a scheme, the experts had told me, was quite feasible. That ground is now lost; and until the Act is changed, the Governor-General would be the sole Agent.

There is, nevertheless, scarcely any difficulty concerning the entry of the States, provided the Crown representatives and the Dewans both advocate it and advise the Princes. The difficulties which some administrators have been raising are easily answered, if attention is directed to actual facts.

Paramountcy and treaty obligations are awe-inspiring phrases; but on analysis, the difficulties involved in those terms tend to disappear. What do the terms amount to? Good government, payment of tribute, if any, no entry into Foreign affairs except through the Agent of the Crown, and stipulated help if any for Defence against foreign foes on the part of the Ruler of the State, and interference by the Agent in cases of grave misrule, and military help by the agent when necessary against foreign foes and serious civil disorder: these are the main features of all treaties.

As a matter of fact, the Crown has tolerated government which is not good, i.e., so far as the people's interests are concerned, to an extent that is impossible or scarcely possible under any form of popular government. The people of none of the States and not even the National Congress are likely to object to the reservation of powers in the Ruler and in the Crown whenever popular rule breaks down or is in danger of breaking down in any of these matters.

The difficulties are thus of the nature of a mare's nest; and it is hoped that serious thinkers, well-intentioned Princes and friends of India's progress will refrain hereafter from creating difficulties which do not exist or are so easily remediable.

CHINA'S INDUSTRIES IN SZECHUAN.

(By Walter B. Foley)

By November 1, 1938, more than 63,400 tons of machinery and office appliances representing 387 industrial plants in coastal and Central China had been removed into the Southwest areas where, under the direction and co-operation of the Central Government, a monster reconstruction programme was being carried out, according to a report by the Minister of Economics, Dr. Wong Wen-hao, a graduate of Louvre University, Belgium.

Of that total, over 31,600 tons or nearly one-half were connected with the transfer of the cotton mills. Mining ranked second with 8,600 tons. Other industries, according to their tonnage, were: Machine and metal shops, 8,000 tons; glass and pottery works, 3,400 tons; electric and radio plants, 3,200 tons; food factories, 3,100 tons; printing plants, 2,800 tons; chemical work, 2,200 tons. Aside from those mainly private enterprises, the Government has also shifted in the interior many arsenals, from iron and steel foundries, chemical factories, airplane assembling plants and other wartime industries whose total value ran into billions of dollars. The transfer of the furnaces of one iron works alone saved plant worth $ 1,00,00,000.

Szechuan with its innumerable natural resources leads all other interior provinces in accommodating these "refugee" industries. Over 50 per cent of the industrial plants have been already installed in this largest and richest province of China. Shensi Province in the Northwest, for years known as an industrial centre of great potentialities for China, holds the second place with close to 10,000 tons of factories removed. Hunan comes a close third with about 8,000 tons of machines imported; while Kwangsi, the gateway to the Southwest, represents 2,500 tons in the grand total. The distant province of Yunnan close to French Indo-China, where a number of large-scale government and private projects are being started and the rugged but little-developed Kweichow province take up the balance of the total tonnage in this vast industrial westward movement.

As early as July, 1937, when Japan first invaded North China, the Government had already taken a keen interest in evacuating important factories from the coastal provinces. The Shanghai Factory Removal Supervision Committee was then organized by the order of the Executive Yuan. In April, 1938, it was renamed The Mining and Industrial Readjustment Commission of the Ministry of Economics, and has henceforth been playing a very important role in rescuing Chinese factories from Japanese destruction. In the period between the fall of Shanghai in November, 1937, and January, 1938, the Commission helped to ship more than 4,000 tons of machines re-representing over forty factories in the coastal cities to go through Hankow. The total number of industrial plants removed from Shanghai thus far is registered at 150, while that from Hankow is given at 140. It was through the efforts of the Commission that most of the industrial plants had been shifted to the safer places in the farther inland prior to the withdrawal of the Chinese forces from the Wuhan cities.

Besides assisting the factory owners in transportation and negotiations for new sites, the Commission further subsidizes them with $32 for the removal of each ton of industrial property from the danger zones to the interior. The Commission has already lent $1,500,000 to the industrialists for consolidating their capital while another $3,500,000 have been advanced for their orders of raw materials and machines for the next year's operations. All those industries that have already moved to their destinations, are being pressed by the Commission, with its new headquarters in Chungking, the wartime capital of China, to resume operations within specified time limits.

Meanwhile, the Government is not neglecting the industries already existing in those interior provinces. Credits to the extent of over $6,000,000 have also been given to the Hunan Zinc Manufacturing Company, the Chungking Cement and Electric Works, the Kiating Paper Factory, the sugar refineries and alcohol manufacturing plants in Kwangsi Province, and others. In addition to aiding the private or semi-government enterprises, the Commission is further playing an important rôle in encouraging mine owners to exploit more rich deposits in the Southwest. In many cases, the Government is taking the initiative in excavating these potential mines, one of the most outstanding examples being the exploiting of gold mines in China's westernmost province of Sikong by the Ministry of Economics, the Natural Resources Commission and the Sikong Provincial Reconstruction Commission.

CHUNGKING—CHINA'S WARTIME CAPITAL.

Since the removal of the Chinese National Government from Nanking to Chungking in November, 1937, this key town to south-western China has jumped into the limelight of world's attention as China's wartime capital. For this "mountain city," built on the precipitous cliffs by which the Kialin River joins its mighty parent, the Yangtze, at Chungking's doorstep, has become the nation's commercial, industrial, cultural, and financial centre. And there is evidence everywhere that the city will retain its present importance and prosperity even when the Government moves back to Nanking after the war is over.

Chungking, though formerly little known to the outside world, is in fact an old town of conisderable importance and historic interests. It boasts a history of more than 4,200 years. It is well known in Chinese history as the birth place of the Imperial Consort of Emperor Yu who reigned over the Empire of Cathay in the 22nd century B. C. A temple now crowns the peak of Tu Shan, on the south bank of the Yangtze River, in honour of this famous Emperor and his queen. When Emperor Yen, the second Emperor of the Chow Dynasty, 1121-316 B. C., became the supreme ruler of China, he made a member of his family the Viscount of Pahtzekuo, ruler over the territory now called Chungking and its nearby towns. It was proclaimed a kingdom at about 340 B. C., and became a minor power in the upper Yangtze. One hundred years later, when the Shih Huang Ti of the Tsin Dynasty conquered and unified China in 220 B. C., Pahtzekuo became a county of his Empire. Since then Chungking had lost its independent character except for two abortive insurgent attempts to establish this "mountain city" as a separate country, once in 1367-1368 at the end of the Yuan dynasty by the insurgent General Min Yu-chen, and again in 1645-1651 at the end of the Ming Dynasty by the bandit leader Chang Hsien-chung.

The city was opened as a treaty port in accordance with Sino-British Treaty of Chefoo in 1876, and the Treaty of Peking in 1890. The Sino-Japanese Treaty of Shimenoseki, the peace treaty ending the first Sino-Japanese war of 1894-1895, gave Japan the right to establish a concession in this city, and the settlement was duly established in 1901 at the South Bank. When the present hostilities began, however, the Japanese Concession in Chungking was taken over by the Chinese authorities.

Chungking was created a municipality in 1928 by the Szechuan Provincial Government in view of its importance as the key town to southwestern China. Since then the city has grown by leaps and bounds as a modern metropolis. In November, 1937, the National Government moved from Nanking to this mountain city, and Chungking began to find her rightful place among the country's leading cities.

The Municipality of Chungking, with a territory of 93.50 square kilometers, has a population of about 550,000 at present, compared with a pre-war figure of a little more 200,000. It comprises the Chungking city, the North Bank across Kialin River which flows into the Yangtze River at Chungking, and the South Bank, across the Yangtze. It is known as a misty country as fog and mist are common throughout the year. Summer weather in this town is warm and pleasant. And the green hills and rivers close by make Chungking a place of of considerable scenic beauty.

The city could be reached from Shanghai, before the close of the Yangtze by the Japanese, by steaming upriver for more than 2,000 kilometers by boat, with stops at Nanking, Kiukiang, Hankow and other Yangtze towns. Further up river, Kiating, leading town in western Szechuan by the bank of Yangtse, 500 kilometers to Chungking's west, can be reached by steamer in summer, and Chinese junk in winter. With the Yangtze and Kialin Rivers at its disposal, and more than 70 steamships of different sizes, about two thirds of them flying the Chinese flag, calling regularly at its wharves and about 5,000 junks, Chungking's place in river communication is self-explanatory. The Min Son Industrial Company, the $10,000,000 upper Yangtze shipping concern with headquarters, in the "mountain city," has been playing a very important part in the navigation of southwestern China's waterways, especially in the present crisis.

For overland traffic, Chungking is the centre of eastern Szechuan's highway system. Besides a number of local highways connecting the city with its nearby towns, it is connected with Chengtu, provincial capital of Szechuan on the scenic Chengtu plain, by the 350 kilometer Chengtu-Chungking Metre-road. It is also linked with Kweiyang, capital of Kweichow Province, by the 450 kilometer Szechuan-Kweichow metre road, an engineering master-piece which took several 5,000 ft mountain peaks in its stride. An extension of the highway runs through to French Indo-China, a territory that will also be linked by rail with Chungking when the line to Kunming in Yunan Province is completed. Besides, the Chengtu-Chungking Railway is now under construction with the view of connecting the two important Szechuan cities by rail.

Furthermore, Chungking is now one of the main centres of China's air communications, from which business men can fly to America within five days and to London within a week, with a choice of two lines—Imperial Airways or Air-France, for the latter route. The China National Aviation Corporation, established jointly by the Chinese Government and Pan-American Airways has had its headquarters here since the war broke out. The Eurasia Aviation Company, a joint concern established by the Chinese Government and the German Lufthanza Company, also maintains a station in this city. Air services to Hongkong, Chengtu, Kunming, Ichang, important commercial centres in western Hupeh, and Kiating, trading town of upper Yangtze, all have their terminations in Chungking. And Hanoi, in French Indo-China, Sian, capital of Shensi Province, and Lanchew, capital of Kansu Province, can also be reached by air from this city. Traffic on the city's aerodrome, with facilities for the landing of both land and amphibian planes, has been increasingly heavy since the city became China's wartime capital.

Culturally, Chungking, since the beginning, has been eastern Szechuan's centre of education and learning. With the arrival of the National Government, many universities, libraries, and other institutions of learning have been added to this city, together with the great migration of the brains, beauty and wealth of China from the war areas. Shapingpah, Chungking's beautiful suburb, 15 kilometers from the city, has become an educational town. The National Central University, formerly in Nanking, the Chungking University, Nankai Middle School formerly in Tientsin, the National Technical School, the Szechuan Girls Vocational School, the Szechuan Provincial College of Education, the National Pharmaceutical College formerly in Nanking, are all established in and around that former village. The Futan University of Shanghai finds itself in a small riverside town 50 kilometers to the north of Chungking. In all, Chungking has now ten universities and colleges, nine vocational schools, thirty-five middle schools, and about one hundred elementary schools. Of these, except the elementary schools, about half came from the various educational centres now under Japanese domination like Shanghai, Nanking, Tientsin, and Hankow.

The "mountain city's" place as a commercial and industrial centre was well known long before the present elevation of its political status. As the gate to the south western provinces of Szechuant, Kweichow, Yunnan, and Sikong, import and export trades of these provinces, in most cases, had to pass through Chungking for shipping to the outside world. And now, with Shanghai and Hongkong under Japanese military occupation, Chungking has become China's export centre. The province's leading products like tung oil, hide, silk, gold, bristles, and other mineral and agricultural products are in most cases exported from Chungking by the overland route to the outside world. The city now has 21 modern banks, including the Central Bank, the Bank of China, the Bank of Communications and the Farmers' Bank of China, and 36 Chinese native banks to help finance the various new industrial and commercial enterprises.

Industrially, Chungking is now progressing in long strides. Its suburbs, especially those on the North Bank, the South Bank, and Tzechihkow, 15 kilometers to the northwest of Chungking city, are rapidly becoming pleasant havens for Chinese factories. They are provided with easy river transportation and a cheap coal supply, and new factories have sprung up like mushrooms in these places. They include iron and steel works, cement, brush, soap, spinning and weaving, and many, other factories. Water works, power plants, and the telephone exchange have also been modernized to meet the demand of the rising population after Chungking had become the nation's wartime capital. Chungking can even boast of air conditioned theatres.

These developments and improvements are not of temporary nature. Fundamentally they are not wartime measures, being the natural progress in step with China's reconstruction since the end of 1938. The schools, factories, bank, commercial concerns and other cultural, financial, industrial and business enterprises will stay in this, intrinsically richest of all China's provinces, even when the Government moves back to Nanking. In Chungking and its mighty hinterland the industrialists and business men of north, south and east China have discovered an almost untapped gold mine of gilt-edged resources.

INDIANS IN BRITISH GERMANY.

MR. TYSON'S RADIO ADDRESS.

I turn to three topics that are of interest mainly to East Indians listeners. In my remarks over the wireless the Sunday after I arrived in the Colony I said that the East Indian had in British Guiana "equal political rights with other elements of the population." That remark seems to have been misunderstood in some quarters. I was dealing with the constitutional position and I pointed out that, while the Government and people of India inevitably took a lively interest in the welfare of of Indians overseas, it was to the Colonial administration rather than to India that the East Indian citizens of this Colony must ultimately look for relief, aa they enjoyed equal political rights with other elements of the population. By that I did not mean that all was well with the East Indians here or that in every walk of life they actually enjoyed complete equality, social and economic, with every other element of the population. Had that been the case, the Government of India would not have sent me or my predecessors Messrs. McNeill and Chimanlal, Messrs. Tivary and Keatinge, and Kunwar Sir Maharaj Singh to examine and report upon the conditions of East Indians in this Colony. What I had in mind, of course, was the statutory position of East Indians, in this Colony and elsewhere in the West Indies, as compared with their position in some other parts of the British Commonwealth where Indians do not enjoy statutory equality,—where indeed almost the first steps taken when the Colonies were given "responsible government" were to deprive Indians of the Parliamentary and even of the Municipal franchise. There is no such statutory discrimination here. The intention of His Majesty's Government, as I understand it, has always been that there should be no discrimination against East Indians, statutory or otherwise. That is not to say that all matters at present stand in the Colony, you enjoy equal opportunities and facilities in every walk of life. Clearly you do not. But there is no statutory bar to your doing so; it is rather a matter of lack of opportunity; and it is with a view to helping you to attain a position in which you will have equal opportunity to co-operate with other elements in the Colony for the welfare and progress of the Colony that I and my predecessors have been sent from India. I mention this as a "point of personal explanation" though I do not think that many people were in any real doubt as to what I meant.

I turn now to a matter of greater importance, namely, repatriation.

There are, I am told, upwards of twenty thousand persons in this Colony who are entitled to a passage to India partly or wholly at the charge of the Colonial Government. It is the right of these persons to be repatriated, and the Colony has both a legal and a moral liability to repatriate them if they press their claim. From time to time during my stay here I have been approached, by persons who wish to claim this right, with the request that I should take up their case with the Department concerned with repatriation. There is evidently after all these years, an element, still among the older generation, that desires to return to India. I have every sympathy with that desire. Times are hard in the Colony at present and with advancing years those who are finding work difficult to obtain or beyond their powers to perform naturally find their minds turning to the Motherland which they left, perhaps, in the heyday of youth. As I have said already, I fully sympathize with the desire they feel in the evening of life to "go home." But as, after a few years in India one forgets the cold and the fog and the snow and the mud of England or Scotland, so after twenty or thirty years in British Guiana these people have forgotten the heat and the dust and the poverty and, to those who are outside it, the narrowness of Indian village life,—restrictions of caste, restrictions of custom, restrictions of outlook. They have the right to go back to India and the Colony which has profited by their services during the best years of their life, has an obligation to send them back. But times have changed and conditions have changed, and it is open to very serious question whether repatriation nowadays would really confer any benefit on many of those who have a right to claim it. The right to repatriation was introduced as a clause in the labourer's contract to strengthen his position as against those who brought him here, the general idea being, I imagine, that the right would normally be exercised, if at all, within a measurable time after expiry of the ten years which the labourer was compelled to spend in the Colony. It is now well over twenty years since the last batch of labourers was brought to this Colony and a man or woman who has been twenty years or more outside the circle of the family and the village in India, does not readily settle down to village life on return there. A few who have saved a little money have and who have sufficient shrewdness to retain that money and utilize it profitably in different surroundings mey "make good" on their return to India. Others again may have kept in touch with their relations in the home land and may be assured of a welcome on their return. Bnt most of those who can claim assistance towards their passage to India are hopelessly out of touch, by this time, with the realities of Indian village life and are doomed, if they return to India, to add to the number of destitutes and "down-and-outs" who hang round the sea ports and beg to be sent back to Africa, or Trinidad or British Guiana or some other Colony. It is generally those who are "down on their luck" here who want to go back and it is just those people who are least able to make good at the other end. The demand for repatriation naturally increases when times are bad in the Colony and conversely any improvement in the lot of the East Indian population here tends to reduce the number seeking repatriation to India, Therein lies the best remedy for a difficult situation, and any amelioration in the general position in the Colony that may result from the visit of the Royal Commission or from any other cause will help to reduce the number of those who seek escape by the method of repatriation. A reasonable measure of prosperity for them here is from every point of view—the immigrant's, the Colony's and India's—preferable to the repatriation of people who, on arrival in India, are destined to become a misery to themselves and a reproach to British Guiana and India alike. The best service that men of influence in this Colony can render to these people—and I would appeal particularly in this matter to East Indians of influence—is to dissuade the very poor from claiming their right of repatriation, especially if we can offer them, for example by land settlement schemes—whether offered in lieu of a return passage or otherwise—some prospect of better conditions as an incentive to remain here.

There is one other subject upon which I should like to touch before I finish. I have been struck since I came here by the extent to which the mother tongues of Northern India, Hindi and Urdu, have been lost by the rising generation and, on the other side, by the strength of the feeling that favours their maintenance or their revival. Many causes have contributed this feeling—not least I am told the local radio and cinematographs which show films produced in India and depicting characters who speak in Hindustani and stir the audience with memories of the great epics of Indian history and mythology. The request is constantly made for increased facilities for children to learn the languages of Northern India in the schools of British Guiana. I have every sympathy with the desire to keep alive the cultural and religious links with the Motherland, and the improvement of the teaching of Indian languages in schools where East Indians are numerous, is a matter that has been engaging the anxious attention of the community's leaders here. We hope to secure that improvement but, if we are really serious (as I am sure we are) about the object in view, I must say that I doubt very much whether any amount of school teaching that can be given will of itself attain the object at which we aim. To East Indians who are parents or grandparents I would say,—if you want to keep alive among your young folk the languages and traditions of India, you must speak Hindi or Urdu in your homes. The children will speak English in the schools and among their friends and English is the language which they will mostly employ in their daily life in this Colony when they come of age. With the best teaching in the world they will only learn Hindi and Urdu as dead languages unless they are constantly made to hear them and speak them out of school hours. If you wish your children to acquire or retain sufficiency of your Mother tongue to be of any real use to them, you must make it the medium of conversation in the home.

GERMANY TO GO "DRY"?

The Berlin Correspondent of the Bombay Chronicle writes :—

Herr Hitler has decided that the time is ripe to take the first measures towards the fulfilment of one of his greatest dreams : to make Germany "dry".

All manufacturers of cognac-liquors and other highly alcoholic spirits have been ordered to cease production. They may sell out their present stock, and shops and inns also may dispose of [illegible] supplies, but must not renew them. Even the manufacture of liquor-filled chocolates is forbidden.

Party officials will watch keenly and report the people's reaction.

If this is not too violent, then beer, the German citizen's favourite drink, will also be banned. In its place will be substituted a sort of "near beer", like that used during the war, light and practically non-alcoholic.

Hitler himself, a fervent teetotaller, has already forced most of his party chiefs to renounce alcohol at least in public.

For years he was afraid to attempt to introduce prohibition, fearing that, while the German citizen would tolerate shortages of butter, meat, coffee, eggs, fruit etc., he might revolt if his beer were limited.

Now Hitler feels himself strong enough to risk even this revolutionary measure—tentatively at first, but with the intention of making Germany completely 'dry' eventually, if possible.

GERMANY UNDER SCHACHT.*

The very noticeable increase in international tension and in the nervousness of world markets during the past week is a convincing tribute—through perhaps a grudging one—to the respect in which Dr. Schacht's competence and ability were universally held. General Franco's approach to Barcelona and its strategic consequences now at last realised in quarters hitherto obstinately blind—have played a part in the creation of anxiety. But a victory for the Spanish rebels has so for long seemed an ultimate, even if not an immediate, probability that its effects ought by now to have been discounted. Dr. Schacht's dismissal from the presidency of the Reichsbank, on the other hand, was unexpected. In any circumstances it would have been unwelcome news. But in the exact context of the present it is a disturbing proof that the last links that bind Nazi Germany to commonsense and moderation are being snapped. Just as 1938 opened with the departure of the "moderate" Generals and the replacement of Baron von Neurath by Herr von Ribbentrop, with what consequences we all know, so 1939 begins with Dr. Schacht's dismissal and still further steps to subordinate the Army to the Party. The parallel is not comforting.

That Dr. Schacht should have retained, in such degree, the respect, if not the admiration, of foreign bankers and statesmen is in itself a remarkable achievement. Admittedly, he stored up for himself a substantial reserve of confidence in the years when he was putting Germany's finances to rights after the havoc of the inflation. But his differences with the republican Government over the Young Plan had far more politics in them than is usually permitted to bankers. Moreover, since 1933, Dr. Schacht has been a mainstay of the Nazi regime. It is he who has driven such hard bargains with the standstill creditors. It is he who has pushed Germany's default on her foreign debts (many of them borrowed on the security of his own earlier policies) up to the very verge of commercial retaliation. It is he who has been the chief technician of the Nazi trading methods, whose ingenuity is admired in foreign countries as much as their immorality is reprobated. It is he who has been the financier-in-chief of that German re-armament which now threatens the lives of us all and weighs like an impenetrable cloud on all business enterprise. A man with achievements such as these is not a man who, in general, could expect to be liked in foreign countries. Bue whatever Dr. Schacht has done, it has always been clear that the real Nazis had they been in his place, would have done worse. And so his going is a signal for despondency.

Dr. Schacht has himself described his policy as "elasticity in method and persistence in fundamentals." It is an apt characterisation. For a man who scored his first great success by insistence on the full rigour of the rules of orthodoxy, he has shown a very remarkable power of mental adaptation. There is dispute over the precise share he had in evolving the plan for stabilising the mark in 1923. But there can be little doubt that it was his forceful personality that created the necessary conditions of confidence in the new currency and his rigid insistence on the virtues of economy and orthodoxy that prevented a relapse once the immediate danger was past. In the years from 1923 to 1929 there was no leading banker in the world who more fervently preached balanced budgets, adherence to the gold standard, the removal of restrictions on the free movement of capital and the rest of the elements of the orthodox faith.

This past of rigid orthodoxy did not prevent him when he returned to the Reichsbank In 1933 from pursuing à outrance precisely the opposite policies. The Reichsmark is still on the gold standard only in the most emptily formal sense, while there is an ever extending range of special marks by using which the German exporter is given the advantages of depreciation at the expense of the "blocked" creditor or the persecuted Jew. The Budget is as fully unbalanced as a budget can be. And the free, liberal capitalistic economy has disappeared beneath the structure of Nazi controls. State spending and State control have gone much further than Dr. Schacht originally intended or now approves, and he has never tired of proclaiming his hope that Germany may some day return to her place in an integrated world economy. But the fact remains that Dr. Schacht has played the leading role in the actual development of Nazi economic policy. What is more, judged by the results to date, it has been a remarkably sucessful policy.

If the story stopped at this point, with Schacht the High Priest of orthodoxy converted into Schacht the Witch Doctor of expansionism, he could be put down as no more than a very able technician who changed his views as he turned his coat; he would find his place in history alongside the Vicar of Bray. But his dismissal last week shows that there is more than mere time-serving in Dr. Schacht. Behind his elasticity of method there is a persistence in fundamentals. The fundamental fact for him, indeed for all of us, is that finance is no more than clothing for the stark limbs of economic reality. In 1923 he proclaimed that what is not economically possible cannot be accomplished by any monetary magic. In 1933 it was the other facet of the truth which needed emphasis: that if a thing is economically possible, financial means for carrying it out can be found. In that sign Herr Hitler has conquered. But for a year or more Dr. Schacht has been pointing out with growing insistence, that conditions have returned to 1923 and that to pursue any further the financial policies that served their purpose five years ago is to set the financial machine a task it cannot possibly solve.

We do not know the exact occasion of Dr. Schacht's dismissal or why affairs came to a head on January 19th. But the main substance of his disagreement with the Party authorities is clear. He has offered to Herr Hitler the advice that finance cannot obscure or override economic facts. And the advice has been distasteful, as it always has been, and always will be, to heads of spending governments.

NOTES.

After Albania:— On Good Friday, Italy marched against Albania and took over the little Kingdom after a brief resistance. A day previous to this Mr. Chamberlain had expressed the official British view that Britain had no special interests in Albania. Signor Mussolini has all along been conceded by the Western Powers a special sphere of influence in Albania. The reason for his sudden action is rather obscure. "The minority situation in Poland and Italy today," wrote Mr. Arnold J. Toynbee in Foreign Affairs, "is not unlike that in Czechoslovakia before September. In each country there is both a German and one or more non-German minorities of a nationality which Germany might choose to make common cause with her i. e., the Yugoslavs in Italy and the Ukrainians in Poland." Poland had proved after the Anglo-Polish pact a difficult proposition for Germany to handle. In view of the consultations that took place between Italian and German leaders, it is highly probable that the Italian move in Albania was conceived as a reply to the attempts at forming an anti-Fascist front. By this Yugoslavia is reduced to impotence and the turbulent minority of Macedonians in Yugoslavia and in Greece might well prove uncontrollable. Italy with her control over the Adriatic Sea now becomes a valued partner of the Axis. An attempt has been made to rouse Muslim feeling against Signor Mussolini for his aggression on a State which was two-thirds Muslim. The British press points out that Signor Mussolini can no longer expect to be recognised as the Champion of Islam. Seeing, however, that no Muslim took the Duce's title to leadership of Muslims seriously at the time he first made it, this is no more than a debating point. The Sultans of Arabia are not likely to be rushed into a war on such arguments and, if they do side with either Fascist or Imperialist, they will be more careful this time in the promises they obtain and the measures they take to ensure fulfilment. Profiting by the troubles in neighbouring territories, Bulgaria, it is reported, is pressing for concessions from Roumania. The projected formation of a neutral block of Balkan States is not reassuring; in the event of war, neutrality; in South-East Europe must be futile. The presentation of German demands to Poland relating to the "Corridor" Danzig and certain territories claimed by the Reich, add to the threats to European peace. News comes through on Friday morning of the announcements of Mr. Chamberlain in the House of Commons in Britain and of M. Daladier in the French-Chamber of an anti-aggression pact concluded with Greece and Roumania. The Roumanian guarantee, it is said, was the result of French insistence. The omission of Bulgaria and Yugoslavia and the restriction of the Anglo-French guarantee to assist Greece or Roumania in opposing aggression, indicate the next step of the Axis powers. Negotiations are on hand with Turkey and Soviet Russia.

Delhi Meeting on South Africa:—Swami Bhavani Dayal, President of the Natal Indian Congress, came to India last month in order to impress on the public and the Government of India the serious consequences which will ensue if the proposal to impose by law a policy of Segregation of Indians in South Africa is carried out; and to get them to exert all their influence to avert the contingency. He spent a few days in Bombay, met the members of the Imperial Indian Citizenship Association whose representation to Government on the subject was widely published in the Press. The Swami went to Delhi and he had no difficulty in enlisting the sympathy and support of all parties in the Legislature and of the Government of India. The proposal is a flagrant violation of the principal term of the Cape Town Agreement and of the Settlement with Gandhiji in 1914. We can not think that the Hertzog Government seriously intend to put it on the statute book. There is very great pressure on them to do so by a section of the White population which has adopted Nazi ideology. In passing, we hope that this section will note that Dr. Schacht is now in India and that, in his first interview, he reminded the people of this country of the long-standing appreciation by Germany of India's culture and civilization. Swami Bhavani Dayal's leadership has been marked by a spirit of conciliation and he has been successful in enlisting the sympathy and support of fair-minded Afrikanders to the Indian cause. But he is out of touch with the distracting elements in our public life here today and this led to an unpleasant incident at the public meeting convened at Delhi on Sunday last, which, we are afraid, might have serious consequences in directing the Indian attitude to Indians overseas on political and communal lines. Mrs. Sarojini Naidu was in the chair. She knows the South African Indian problem from A to Z and, while being one of the Congress High Command, she is persona grata also with the Government of India. She enjoys besides the confidence of the Mahomedan community to a larger extent than any other Hindu. The occasion was a non-party one and she invited as a matter of course Sir Syed Raza Ali, lately Agent-General of the Government of India in South Africa, to move the principal resolution. His appearance at the table was the signal for an uproar. The Arya Samajists in the audience—Swami Bhavani Dayal is himself an Arya,—shouted at him and would not allow him to speak, because, forsooth, he made a speech a few days ago in which he condemned the Arya Samaj Satyagraha in Hyderabad State. Sir Raza Ali in an interview to the Press has exaggerated this unfortunate incident into another communal issue, as if we have not enough of them already. This should be a warning to delegations from Overseas coming to India. They are naturally anxious to get their grievances redressed and they are impatient of advice which does not breath blood and thunder. But in the long run they are doing harm to their own cause by identifying themselves with our political and communal quarrels. Not only that but they are making the position of those who seek to advance the interests of Indian Overseas in less sensational ways, extremely difficult.

Dr. Hjalmar Schacht:—In the ordinary course we should not have felt called upon to notice the arrival on Monday in Bombay of Dr. Hjalmar Schacht, for over sixteen years President of the Reichsbank, on an unofficial visit to India. But the hysterical outburst in the Bombay Chronicle on Tuesday, obliges us, for the good name of Indian journalism, to refer to the career of this remarkable man whose genius saved his country from complete economic collapse at the hour of her direst peril. The magnitude of the problem which confronted him when he was charged with the responsibility of redeeming the Mark from the abysmal depths to which it had sunk, is thus described by George Glasgow in his introduction to the English edition of Dr. Schacht's great book "The End of Reparations." Mr. Glasgow writes:

> . . It was the historic German financial collapse of 1923 that first brought Dr. Schacht into prominence. The problem was that the mark had totally cut itself adrift from realistic values. The exact figures are meaningless. The par exchange with sterling being twenty to the pound, the mark did actually [illegible] 150,000,000,000 to the pound, a figure which [illegible] does not convey any recognizable meaning to [illegible] mind.....Dr. Schacht at once established in Berlin [illegible] gold Bank which was to be the basis of his [illegible] That plan he prosecuted steadily, unremittingly, [illegible] as it were with eyes shut and his teeth clenched [illegible] succeeded. He reformed the Reichsbank, held Germany [illegible] on the very edge of the precipice, and pulled her back. It was a thrilling achievement.

Whatever one may think of [illegible] politics, one can not but hold in [illegible] admiration a man who has such [illegible] magnificent achievement to his credit. Dr. Schacht was appointed President of the Reichsbank ten years before Herr Hitler came to power. The fact that he was retained in office under the Nazi regime shows that he was recognised as the one man who could guide the financial affairs of his country. He was relieved of his job a few months ago and he has come to India without any official position. To attack him not merely violently but with vulgar savagery on the ground solely of his nationality, is [illegible] against the innate courtesy of Indian culture. The Chronicle writes:

> For, in all honesty, there is no Indian, with [illegible] that distinguish man from the animal, who can pretend to any sense of pleasure at the "honour" which Dr. Schacht has done us.

No one need feel pleasure but certainly [illegible] one is called upon to foam at the mouth at Dr. Schacht's choice of India for a holiday trip. Dr. Schacht has not claimed to have done a "honour" to India by coming here. The Chronicle's sentiments are not those of every Indian. There are hundreds and thousands in this country who do not share the Chronicle's blind antipathy to Nazis and Nazism. Among them are Sheth Govind Das, the Chairman of the Reception Committee of the Tripuri session of the Indian National Congress, Mr. M. S. Aney, leader of the Democratic Swaraj Party in the Indian legislature, and the Hon. Govind Vallabh Pant, Premier of the United Provinces, all of whom spoke in appreciative terms of Herr Hitler and Signor Mussolini, the first named going so far as to identify Gandhiji's position in relation to the Congress with that of the two leaders to their respective parties. We do not remember that the Chronicle raised its voice in protest against Sheth Govind Das's eulogy.

Nazi Propaganda not Wanted:—While we strongly deprecate unseemly attacks on the distinguished German visitor to our shores, we would at the same time and equally strongly deprecate attempts to carry on propaganda in favour of Nazism in this country. The demonstration in Bombay, with the object evidently of making Dr. Schacht the centre of a movement to propagate Nazi ideas, have been in extremely bad taste, to say the least. In view of the [illegible] minate relations between the British and German governments at the present moment, ostentatious exhibitions of Nazi prowess, however correct, are lacking in [illegible] decency. Dr. Schacht is here as a guest while he is entitled to the traditional hospitality of India, his compatriots are expected not to make his position embarrassing by exploiting his presence to advance their party aims. We read somewhere that the aim of the demonstrations is to remove misconceptions about the Nazi regime. If Dr. Schacht would read the proceedings of the Nagpur Congress, he will see that there are not only no misconceptions but that there is a discriminating appreciation of the authoritarian principles and a desire to learn from them among the leaders of our largest political party. Perhaps, he has seen them in Europe and has been encouraged by them to visit this country. For another reason, too, there is no need to propagate Nazi ideas here. It will be carrying coals to Newcastle as some of the distinctive Nazi doctrines were anticipated centuries ago in this country. The Hindu conception of the function of the State as the protection of Dharma, is in clear contrast to the utilitarian basis of modern democracy, the greatest good of the greatest number, and may be said to bear an affinity to the totalitarian State. Protection of minorities is a very recent innovation in the West and it is still inadequately conceived and carried out. Equalitarianism has been discarded by the authoritarian States, Communists as well as Fascists and Nazis, as it was in Hindu polity ages ago. Race purity is another idea which the Nazis have, perhaps unknowingly, borrowed from Hindu sociology. The essential difference between Indian and Nazi ideology, is that, while in this country political and social theories were founded in a firm and stable metaphysical and religious basis, there seems to be no such foundation to regulate Nazi institutions. Religion in India was the dominating influence. Religious culture had permeated to the masses and the State was as much under its control as society. There was never a royal caste in India. The king was as much subject to his caste rules as the humblest manual worker. Dr. Schacht might learn something in India which the West has forgotten. He will do well to discourage the overzeal of his compatriots while he remains with us.

Philippines Independence :—Our valued contributor at Manila sends us the important radio talk to the Philippine nation given recently by President Quezon. There are many suggestive points in it which deserve the attention of Indian publicists in view of the general similarity of industrial and economic conditions in the Philippines and in India. The President recently issued a decree recommending that the restrictions on Asiatic immigration in the Philippines imposed under the laws of the United States, should be removed as the Filipinos are Asiatics themselves. The present transition arrangements should end in about seven years when the Philippines will become independent under the law passed by the American Congress. In view of what has happened to Austria, Czechoslovakia, Memel and now Albania, we wonder if the Philippines will be allowed to enjoy their independence for long. The Asiatic member of the Berlin-Rome-Tokio-Madrid axis is keen on finding outlets for her over-flowing population and the removal of the bar on Asiatic immigration will, no doubt, be largely availed of by the Japanese. In a few years, there will be a strong Japanese minority in the Islands and Japan might find that their interests can be protected only by making the Philippines part of the Japanese Empire. This is inevitable whether it happens immediately and forcibly or in course of time by peaceful penetration.

The Law Member on Dr. Deshmukh's Bill :—The speech of the Law Member of the Government of India on Dr. Deshmukh's Bill for securing Hindu women the right of divorce on certain conditions, was remarkable for its irrelevancy to the central idea of the measure. This and not the drafting of the Bill was the principal issue in the motion to refer it to the Select Committee. Sir Nripendra's main point was that, while the Bill gave the right of divorce to the Hindu wife, it did not provide a corresponding right to the husband. The husband can and often does marry a second wife and leaves the first one to her fate. He may give her a nominal maintenance but that is no compensation for a wrecked life. Even this, however, can not be secured without resort to courts, for which the discarded woman has neither the means nor the inclination. We do not deny that there are cases in which the Hindu husband's life is made miserable by a flighty wife and that, by not having the right to divorce, he is obliged to tolerate her or to make her live apart with a maintenance allowance. But this is a very small grievance compared to the plight of the discarded wife who cannot marry another man so long as the first husband is alive. Dr. Deshmukh's Bill was intended to redress an evil which cries aloud for redress and which cannot be redressed without legislation. He was, moreover, keeping close to the injunctions of the ancient texts which provide the right to wives only, for obvious reasons. There were many gaps in the Bill but there were other Bills awaiting consideration which deal with the matters left out in this Bill. Dr. Deshmukh's Bill has, as he rightly said, made the issue a live one and though the present Bill may not be passed, his efforts have brought the needed reform within sight. That itself is no mean service.

Bhopal and Prohibition :—We publish this week along with other Prohibition news, an item relating to the demand for Prohibition in Bhopal. The legislature threw out a resolution demanding the re-introduction of Prohibition on the ground that the State could not afford to sacrifice the revenue. This is the more unfortunate as the liquor revenue is only a recent income in Bhopal State. The last ruler, Her Highness the Begum of Bhopal, had enforced a policy of strict Prohibition in the State and for long Bhopal led India in this matter.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER
BOMBAY, April 15, 1939.

SCIENCE AND POLITICS.

Is Politics a Science? Or is it simply the art of managing men? Mr. Franklin Roosevelt when he was elected President of the United States for the first time, believed that it was a science and started with the purpose of infusing the scientific spirit into the government of the great Republic. He collected around himself a number of intellectuals, University professors, journalists and authors, who came to be known as his Brain Trust. One of them was Mr. R. G. Tugwell. The Brain Trust was soon dissolved as the President found that it hampered more than helped him in the day-to-day administration. Some of the Brain Trustees became the sternest opponents and severest critics of the administration. The great majority of the intelligentsia was against the re-election of Mr. Roosevelt for a second term. Most of the newspapers were opposed to him. But he was re-elected by a huge majority. Several explanations were advanced at the time for the landslide. The Press, it was said, had passed under capitalist control and had ceased to exercise influence on public opinion. The Radio had, it was explained, broken the power of the platform. Political meetings were sparsely attended as the candidates could command the whole country for audience through broadcasts. The international situation was another factor which was thought to have influenced the electorates. Mr. Tugwell in an article in the Political Science Quarterly for March leaves these reasons aside and deals quite objectively with the basic fact that politics are still largely outside the influence of scientific methods. His paper bears the heading "Notes on the Uses of Exactitude in Politics." Towards the end he refers briefly to the failure of the Brain Trust. He writes:

> Those who made up the "brain trust" might have felt themselves ill-used if they had been less well-read in recent political history.....They might have felt worse, also, if they had not been educators. Being teachers, for the most part, they knew how little education had prepared a citizenry to understand its crises or to sacrifice its prerogatives. They knew that the nation was schooled in orthodoxy and individualism; and they knew the penalty for dissent.

Mr. Tugwell notes as symbolic that of all the important spheres of modern life, it is in politics alone that great issues are relegated for decision to the ballot box. The dislike of precision in politics is not confined to the masses. It is strong even among people whose sense of exactitude is most highly developed in their own personal lives. These too are opposed to the application of exact methods to politics. "Men of precision in government," Mr. Tugwell remarks, "are called bureaucrats by those who do not like them." The bureaucrat, he goes on to say, is attacked by those who want to do what he is doing and make money at it. State competition with private enterprise is one of the shibboleths of the laissez faire economics which is exploited in his own interests by the capitalist. Bureaucrats are hated by those whose life they in the discharge of their duties are required to regulate, and by professional politicians "who act wholly on hunches and who hate precision because it limits them revealing the shortcomings of the hunch as a deliberate method."

It seems to us that if the exact and precise methods of science have not penetrated to politics as readily as to other spheres of human activity the reason must be sought elsewhere than in the inertia or perversity of human nature. This is especially necessary as men who have imbibed the scientific spirit, as Mr. Tugwell himself admits, resist the application of scientific methods to social and political problems. Is it not possible that there is some defect in Science and its methods which make it unsuitable and that if and when this defect is removed the difficulties in the way of their application to the social sphere may disappear? In Nazi Germany they have sought to direct social and political life with characteristic scientific thoroughness. In India we have made a fetish of heredity while the West has completely or nearly completely ignored its influence on political and social relations. In his "Heredity and Politics," J. B. S. Haldane points out that "in a society which was based on a knowledge of human biology it would be realized that large innate differences exist, and men could not be given tasks to which they were congenitally unsuited." He adds: "We must no more forget heredity when we are trying to improve environment than we must forget environment when trying to improve heredity." Germany is trying to rectify the mistake of western civilisation in totally ignoring heredity by drastic sterilisation laws. The basic ideas behind these laws are explained in an article in "Germany Speaks" which is the latest and most authoritative exposition of Nazi ideology. The Nazi regime, in fact, is founded on the doctrine of racial purity carried to an extreme which ancient Hindu lawgivers did not contemplate. Professor Haldane in his book points out the unfairness of sterilisation laws. "Sterilisation of all certified defectives," he observes, "would in our society be a class measure." The fault of both Enveironmentalists and Eugenists, is that they both regard human beings as animals leaving out the spiritual which is the most important part of our nature. Our politicians who are mostly imitators, "born followers" as some one has said, of the West have blindly adopted the conclusions of Western Science with its most glaring defects. Instead of seeking to improve upon our models we have—the most nationalist of us—made them our goal! In no sphere is this more pitifully evident than in the agitation to force the Parliamentary system on petty Indian States.

FASTING, COERCION OR CONVERSION?

Writing immediately after his Rajkot fast, Gandhiji, who is sometimes aware of the possible repercussions of his policy, set down seven conditions for a satyagrahi. Judged by these tests we do not think anyone on earth can enter on satyagraha and obviously the Congress had to allow movements with very much weaker material. There are rules of chastity mingled with theistic principles and khadi and spinning and truth and non-violence. Lest anyone might escape these restrictions, Gandhiji added a last clause that these qualifications were only illustrative. The meaning is obvious: No one could be a satyagrahi, let alone start a fast, unless he had the prior sanction of Gandhiji. We think this is a very salutary restriction and Gandhiji has always made it clear that no one can ever expect to obtain his approval. If we could be persuaded that Gandhiji's fasts had a certain sanction behind them, apart from the man, which set them on a different footing to other men's fasts, we would be ready to accept the inevitable. But it has been difficult to find out what Gandhiji has thought he could achieve by his fasts which more patient methods and a greater understanding could not bring about. And judged by results the position is even worse. Gandhiji has laid the greatest stress on changing the hearts of his opponents rather than on coercing their actions. He wrote in a recent article:

> It is too often forgotten that it is never the intention of a Satyagrahi to embarrass the wrong-doer. The appeal is never to his fear; it is, it must be, to his heart. The Satyagrahi's object is to convert, not coerce, the wrong-doer.

Mr. Mahadev Desai who has often to rationalise the instinctive reactions of his leader, has come out in the Harijan with a defence of the fast which intensely sophisticated lacks conviction. Mr. Desai's entire thesis is astoundingly weak. One feels on reading his article that Mr. Desai had his own doubts of the soundness of Gandhiji's fast and had taken them to Gandhiji, that discussion having failed to carry conviction, loyalty and reverence for his leader had induced Mr. Desai to expound a case he did not understand. Replying to the contention that neither the Thakore Saheb nor the Viceroy were converted, he writes:

> .....that the Viceroy simply yielded to the exigencies of the hour. Quite likely. Full conversion may not always accompany an act of justice. It can only mean that more suffering was needed to bring about the conversion. Is it not enough that it is a fast and not a bomb or a revolver that, to put it at its worst, compelled an act of justice affecting the welfare of 75,000 people? You stand between your sister and a brute wanting to violate her honour or you impose starvation upon yourself. If the brute desists, but is not fully converted, is your act of self-immolation or starvation rendered futile or coercive thereby?

Mr. Mahadev Desai is one of the few politician writers of whom it cannot be said that he does not know the full implications of what he says. When he puts on paper a piece of writing which from any other pen might be dismissed as nonsense, we can but infer that he is deliberately confusing the issues. There are a number of questions which arise out of these words which Mr. Desai has not gone into. If "more suffering" was needed to bring about a change of heart and if the purpose of the fast was conversion not coercion, why was the fast abandoned at the time it was, when it was evident that no one's heart was changed? The reference to bomb and revolver is on a par with Mr. Chamberlain's defence of the Munich coercion of Czechoslovakia as satisfactory because it was achieved by "negotiation" and not by war. Only there is something ludicrous in applying it to the apostle of non-violence. Then again if the desired end was an act of justice to 75,000 badly treated people then what was wanted was not a fulfilment of a promise but what any other leader would have demanded, deposition of the ruler. A man who stands between "a brute" and his sister, we may assure Mr. Desai, would be a brute himself if his immediate object is not to save his sister's honour, but to convert the brute. For so much dispassionateness is not human. We admit that we are not well versed in the literature of civil disobedience but if Mr. Desai could tell us of any case in which a rape was staived off by the suicide or the hunger-strike of the victim's brother we would be surprised. If it has succeeded, we congratulate the unique interventionist not on converting the brute but on saving his sister's honour. That unless he were a freak would be his sole object and the only reason he desisted from the natural human reaction can be excused him.

Mr. Desai seems to argue that the fast was democratic in so far as he says that the welfare of 75,000 people was at stake. Yet this is what he expressly denies earlier in his article. He writes:

> The question of democratic principles does not arise when it is recognized that it was not to "wrest democratic government" out of unwilling hands that the fast was undertaken, but to seek fulfilment of a promise. Democracy cannot be endangered when the victim seeks redress through suffering even involving death. It is endangered when he employs force against the wrong-doer.

Mr. Desai cannot have it both ways. He cannot answer critics who protest against the undemocratic method of fasting by saying that it was meant to change the Thakore Saheb's heart; and then turn round and meet the argument that it has not changed his heart by urging that it has brought about the welfare of 75,000 people. The last two sentences seem to imply that a man who is prepared to die for a cause cannot endanger democracy. If Lord Linlithgow who has the cause of Federation at heart, declares "a fast unto death" tomorrow would it make the Federation more acceptable? If Mr. Jinnah decides to go on hunger-strike for the abandonment of Vande Mataram, will that make his object any more reasonable? If Sir Byramji Jeejeebhoy keeps off his food because he objects to Prohibition, will the sale of liquor against the wishes of the majority become a desirable thing? We are surprised that Mr. Desai who represents the Congress intelligentsia should think of democracy in terms not of the intelligent votes of his electorate but of superstition and emotionalism. Mr. Desai realises the absurdity of the position. Therefore in the last paragraph he throws the entire responsibility on God and to those who cannot agree with him he retorts with the charge that they are lacking in faith. Mr. Desai's argument boils down to this: No man will enter on a fast unless he knows that he is in the right; therefore the very fact of a man fasting must mean that he is the right. An argument which makes no distinction between belief and actuality. A more complete return to the trials by ordeal and other superstitions which have given way in educated minds to ration devices to enure justice cannot be found.

A valued friend writes from London, "I want to tell you how very much I appreciated the notes on the fast appearing in your issue of March 11. They almost exactly represent my own views. I cannot resist describing the method employed as a kind of spiritual blackmail. Even if the Thakore Saheb had been entirely right, it might have been impossible for him to have summoned up courge to appear responsible for Gandhiji's death, had he stood out to the end. It might have been even ludicrous had he too decided to resort to a fast. In that case, apart from any reference to a third party, the victory, if any, might have fallen to the more physically fit, irrespective of merits. Apart from this, I have no doubt that cases have occurred where bad people have fasted upon their opponent's doorstep." But the third party is never out of the calculation of Congress leaders. The respect Bishop Blougram was suspected of feeling for men of sense, Congress leaders have for the representative of British Imperialism as the ultimate wielder of power in India:

I pine among my million imbeciles
... aware some dozen men of sense
Eye me and know me, whether I believe
In the last winking Virgin as I vow,
And am a fool, or disbelieve in her,
And am a knave—approve in neither case,
Withold their voices though I look their way.

GAMES AND POLITICS.

The argument advanced by Mr. J. Chinna Dorai and supported by Mrs I. J. Pitt in this week's Reformer, is based on a misconception. India is advised by both these writers to try to win swaraj through sports. The reason for this, it is seriously argued, is that the British public can only be moved by prowess in games and that, to persuade the Government of Britain that India is fit for home rule, we must first persuade the British that we can play games. Mrs. Pitt goes even further. In the spirit of the famous admonition to seek first the Kingdom of Heaven "and all else will be added unto you," she points out how Indians will improve beyond recognition if they followed the advice. All this, we repeat, is entirely misconceived, and the error is due to three fallacies: The first is that Britain can only be persuaded to relax her grip once she holds to a thing. The second seems to be a vague feeling that the old heroes of Eton's playing-fields are still governing Britain. The third is the idea that, instead of the rest of the world being right in its attitude towards sport, Britain has the true gospel and will convert the world to her view.

We have seen in recent years the error of these beliefs. So long as Britain had to bargain and negotiate with other countries in which the aristocratic, leisured classes had control, she could successfully apply the principles her statesmen had picked up in their playful moods. But after the War the position changed. First Russia changed over from the old methods. Britain has never forgiven Russia and has refused, till recently, to play any games in which Russia is a party. Then Kemal Ataturk took up this revolution and Britain found it difficult to manage Turkey. Then Signor Mussolini who, so far as the public knows, never played any games. Last of all Herr Hitler who was prepared to play any game provided he made the rules and changed them to suit his convenience. And why not? After all games are made for men, not men for games. Herr Streseman was often reported to be playing golf with one statesman or another. He might have won at golf but in politics he never had a chance until death and the rise of Herr Hitler made him appear more acceptable to Anglo-French statesmen.

India too has her lesson from politics. The Liberals were not good at games but they were fond of sports. It never struck them to start a new game in which they could make a few rules. They lost heavily as a consequence not only in their games with Britain but even in India itself. When under the guidance of Gandhiji the Congress reversed the rules and, to use a homely phrase, made the ladders into snakes and the snakes into ladders, the British were dismayed. Now that with the advent of responsibility Congress leaders have retained some ladders as ladders and changed others into snakes, and have not told anyone which is which, they seem to have all the circumstances in their favour. Nowhere is this more true than in the case of the Indian States.

The Indian Princes are many of them good sports men. In fact if cricket teams were to be drawn from British Indian first-rank politicians and matched against a Princes team, the result would be a win for the latter. Yet British public sympathy lies with the Indian democrats. That was when Mr. A. G. Gardiner inferred from seeing the Jam Saheb at cricket that his State was happily administered. The Jam Saheb did not get much out of this appreciation, it is true, but there was a certain kindliness towards him which concentrated on his cricket and forgot his administration. In Rajkot today we are sure the Thakore Saheb has played many a game in his time while Gandhi only records one hand at a card game in which he took part. Yet the Government of India in looking into the Rajkot question has failed to take note of the runs or goals scored by the Thakore Saheb. The Gwyer decision has gone to Gandhiji.

If one wants to know why the importance of an individual to British statesmen today lies not in his "ability to play the game" but in his capacity to create trouble, one must seek it in the change that has taken place in the type of men who administer Britain. So long as British Labour was not seeking office, politicians in Britain rested easy on the confortable belief that each party must have its innings and that, if the Liberals batted today, the Conservatives would come in tomorrow. In this belief, the rules were maintained unchanged. But when Labour threatened to come in and there was a fear that they might alter the rules in their own favour, the old aristocracy had to turn to business for support. Business gradually assumed control first in the country, then over the Empire. Mr. Neville Chamberlain might have played cricket, golf or tennis in his youth. In fact, the public is aware in recent times of his having played musical chairs at Clivedene one week-end which proved politically disastrous. But the games have left little impress on him while his business life has left a deep mark on his personality. Politics has become a more serious concern today; no longer do the good-at-games imherit the earth.

If the one chance of winning home rule should be prowess in games, we do not know whether political dependence would not be better. Mrs. Pitt complains of the whining of Indian politicians. This is inevitable when one is faced with conditions which can be changed but not by oneself. Germany was very like India before Herr Hitler took charge. But today Britain is reduced to whining. Mr Chamberlain's speeches since Munich have been one continuous lament on the bad faith of those who will not do as they are told by him. The only way the whining can be eliminated is when power and courage combine in the hands of the "whiners." Mr. Chamberlain has the power but he fears to go out against an opponent who might be stronger than himself. Other British leaders have the courage but they have not the power. An unwilling or diffident David against a Goliath feels futile and impotent and not unnaturally whines. If Herr Hitler's aggression brings Britons to see the causes of whining, the achievement would have been well worth all the agonies of recent months. As for proficiency in games bringing about a change of outlook in a man we would inform Mrs. Pitt, if she does not know it already, that an Indian cricketer of world-renown has recently, like some of his less sporting fellows, married a second wife in the lifetime of his first; that many of our clubs have introduced the habit of drinking alcoholic drinks into homes where it would have been, and still is by the more "backward" members, despised as an obnoxious vice.

RELIEF OF AGRICULTURAL DEBT.

(By Vaikunth L. Mehta)

There is scarcely any subject in the realm of Indian economics which has engaged so much attention as the relief of agricultural debt. It is by no means a new problem, for in the Bombay Deccan it was responsible for an acute agrarian crisis so early as in 1873. Committees and Commissions, provincial and all India, have investigated the problem, administrators and economic thinkers have propounded solutions. Legislative and administrative measures have been forged and yet the problem has baffled solution so far. The intensity of the burden of debt was gravely aggravated by the world economic depression which bore most heavily, statistical evidence leads us to deduce, on all primary producers and particularly on agricultural producers. Alone among the countries with a modern system of administration, the Government of India lagged behind in evolving some plan of campaign to meet the devastating effects of the depression. Nevertheless, in several provinces even the pre-Reform provincial Governments were moved to enact legislation for the control of money-lending and for the relief of debt. The province of Bombay was unique in that its Government refused officially to take cognizance of the growth of this economic menace and failed to adopt any legislative or administrative action to meet it.

It was only with the advent of the Congress Ministry, that for the first time since the enactment of the Dekhan Agricultural Relief Act, a plan of action was drawn up in Bombay to afford relief to the peasantry from the growing burden of usurious debt. Pending the introduction of debt legislation, a Small-Holders' Relief Act was passed last year, the object of which was to protect small-holders from eviction or loss of property resulting from the execution of decrees of civil courts. A Bill was also introduced for the regulation and control of transactions of money-lending, and this as well as a Bill for the grant of protection to tenants are both before the legislature. Essential as both these protective measures are, it may be hoped that they will be soon put on the statute book.

To complete the scheme of legislation the Hon. Mr. A. B. Latthe, Finance Minister who is also in charge of the portfolio of Rural Development, has introduced during the current session of the Bombay Legislative Assembly a Bill for the relief of agricultural debtors in the Province. This Bill is a very comprehensive piece of legislation, even more far-reaching in its scope than the Madras Agriculturists Relief Act of 1938 which created such a furore in South India when it was enacted last year. All the same the aim of the Bill is modest and its framework simple. The proposed law will apply to agriculturists who cultivate lands personally and whose debts are less than Rs. 15,000 and more than Rs. 100. Debtors are called upon to submit application for debt adjustment boards, which will be set up in all parts of the province and which will be charged with the duty of inquiring into the history of the debts, of examining accounts and scaling down the outstanding liabilities to within the paying capacity of the debtors. Prior to the scaling down on the basis of the paying capacity, the claims will be subject to a reduction on account of the accumulated charges of interest; allowance will be made for simple interest at 6 per cent on debts incurred prior to 1931 and at 9 per cent on those incurred subsequently and there will be a further reduction, if necessary, in accordance with law of Damdupat.

The paying capacity is to be limited to 80 per cent of the value of the property held by a debtor, distinction being made between secured and unsecured debts and including in the term property, assets other than the lands cultivated by the debtors. The debt adjustment boards will pass awards after the debts have undergone the process of scaling down; these awards will be registered and can subsequently be made recoverable, in the event of default, as arrears of land revenue. Until the awarded amounts are repaid in full, there can be no alienation of the property concerned by the awards. The parties are permitted to arrive at mutual agreement and get such settlements certified by the boards. Debts which are not reported to the boards for adjustment within a period of one year from the date of their establishment of the boards are liable to be declared as having been discharged. The debt adjustment boards are expected to function as independent bodies, but will be subject to the control of the First Class Subordinate Judge of their respective areas; and there is also provision made for appeals being preferred against the awards of the boards. While it is necessary to provide for some kind of supervision over the working of the boards and to grant a restricted right of appeal, care has to be taken to ensure that the working of the boards is kept as free as possible from the intricacies and technicalities of civil court procedure. This is the reason why in many provinces professional lawyers are debarred from the proceedings before the boards and their awards are deemed final.

These provisions and the additional provisions in respect of rural insolvency, though differing in certain respects from corresponding provisions in enactments in other provisions, do not depart materially from the procedure of debt relief followed elsewhere. The radical features of the proposed law are in its constructive aspects. With the forethought of a statesman, the Hon. Mr. Latthe has attempted to build for the future within the framework of the very legislation that may sound the death knell of the present credit agency in rural areas. To scale down debts, to make them repayable in instalments, to reduce the burden of future interest on the scaled-down debts, to transfer them to the State or to the land-mortgage banks and even to extinguish them, do not afford a solution of the problem of agrarian debt in India. To protect is not enough, it is necessary to prevent the growth of further usurious debt and it is still more necessary to apply the cure and bring about a state of balanced rural economy which is the deep-rooted cause of most unproductive debt.

Recognizing the need for preventing relapse into the self-same condition of abject indebtedness from which agricultural debtors are retrieved—not an imaginary fear as experience elsewhere amply bears out—the proposed legislation provides that no debtor will have an award made out in his favour unless he is or becomes a member of a co-operative society the object of which is to provide resources required for the pursuit of industry. It is further provided that if, after the grant of an award, a redeemed debtor ceases to be a member of a co-operative resource society, the award will be deemed to have been cancelled. The co-operative resource society is expected to arrange for the current crop finance required by the redeemed debtors who become its members. To facilitate the smooth working of the proposed arrangements for the grant of short-term credit through co-operative agency, there is a further provision that the standing crops of a debtor will be deemed inalienable without the permission of the cooperative resource society to which he is indebted. It will only be as an exception, apparently, that the Provincial Government may authorize, in any local area, any individual or body of individuals to advance loans to debtors whose debts have been adjusted.

These provisions while they enhance considerably the status of co-operative societies also increase their responsibilities in a thereefold manner. Along with other creditors, co-operative societies too will be called upon to agree to the scaling down of the liabilities due to them, although in their case the machinery for debt adjustment will be internal. Secondly co-operative societies will have to devise arrangements for the provision of crop finance promptly and adequately and to supplant effectively the existing individualist credit machinery. Thirdly they will have to organize immediately an efficient system of marketing to enable the members to sell through their agency the agricultural produce on which there is the lien in favour both of the outside creditors and of the credit societies themselves. The first of these responsibilities, co-operative societies will have to shoulder in their own interest even if not in the interest of their debtors. Unless loans due to co-operative societies are brought within the purview of the debt adjustment operations, the unencumbered assets and the aggregate paying capacity are apportioned among the other creditors and cooperative societies may be unable to recover their dues. The admission of redeemed debtors on a wholesale scale to the membership of societies will present some difficulty. Easily a bare ten per cent of the agricultural population have so far come under the influence of co-operative societies and to manage satisfactorily the financing of large numbers of agriculturists with whom there has been no previous contact is by no means an easy undertaking. Even with the indirect lien on crops that co-operative societies will secure, agricultural credit for all and sundry will have to proceed with caution and, therefore, while one welcomes the desire that the co-operative societies should recruit new members and have a practical monopoly in the field of rural credit, one only hopes that the accretion to the membership of existing societies and the increase in the number of societies will not be so great or so sudden as to put an undue strain on the mechanism. From this point of view there is much to be said in favour of Government assuming responsibility, albeit provision for the grant of credit for crop requirements is authorized under the existing Agriculturists Loans Act of 1884. If the cooperative credit organization reaches only a tenth of the rural population, the numbers affected by existing cooperative marketing agencies is still small. For this reason the third aspect of the work before cooperative societies is likely to prove extremely arduous. It cannot, however, be shirked because it is through his hold over the crop that the money-lender has established his thraldom and no credit agency can supplant the money-lender which does not assist in bringing about a satisfactory disposal of the marketable produce.

This exhausts only one aspect of the curative programme. The constructive aspect as the Hon. Mr. Latthe observed in his Budget speech, is no less important. A mere adjustment and scaling down of debt and the provision of cheap easy credit cannot suffice in achieving the object in view. Rural economy has to be refashioned radically before it can convey a message of hope to the rural population. The rural development organization that Government wish to set up, will be expected to take in hand all the diverse factors that have a vital bearing on rural economic life. The improvement of agricultural production by popularizing scientific and co-operative methods, the provision for the economical marketing of agricultural produce through the regulation of marketing in general and through co-operative marketing in particular, the organization of supplies to the rural population through the agency of cooperative stores and through the organized co-operation of rural or cottage industries—these, as the Hon. Mr. Latthe summed up, are the main items in the immediate rural economic programmes of Government. It is not a day too soon that the Government of Bombay have embarked on this policy of rural development. This "drive" is as essential for the well-being of the rural population as the introduction of prohibition is for the urban and industrial population. We have had no recent inquiries conducted in the Province of Bombay into the problem of agricultural indebtedness. An inquiry conducted in Madras five years back showed the total aggregate indebtedness of the peasantry to be Rs. 200 crores, an increase of Re. 50 crores over the estimate in 1929-30 by the Provincial Banking Inquiry Committee. The gross value of the crops in the Province of Madras was computed at Rs. 165 crores which value was reduced by one half with the fall that occurred in commodity prices. A corresponding estimate of the total value of the agricultural production of this Province inclusive of Sind made by the Provincial Banking Inquiry Committee in the pre-depression year put the figure at Rs 132 crores. Deducting the value of the agricultural production of Sind and making an allowance for the falling commodity prices, the present figure of the gross value of the crops will be somewhere between Rs. 60 to Rs. 70 crores; against this, we have the total volume of debt as computed by the Provincial Banking Inquiry Committee at Rs. 81 crores, or excluding Sind at Rs 58.40 crores. That was the estimate of the pre-depression year. As in Madras the figure may have gone up during the last ten years; at any event the incidence has been nearly doubled. This is too tragic a state of things merely to weep over, which is almost all that Government in our Province have done in recent years. The programme that the Hon. Mr. Latthe has unfolded may not be revolutionary and his remedies may not be drastic but that it is bold in its conception, ambitious in its scope and heroic in its methods, none can deny. If it succeeds—and all who are interested in rural welfare should cooperate to ensure its success—we may well hope to see a new horizon opening before our long-suffering fellow-citizens in the countryside.

PROHIBITION IN THE NORTH WEST FRONTIER PROVINCE.

All districts in the North-West Frontier province would shortly go dry, according to a statement made by Qazi Ataullah Khan, Education Minister, in the Frontier Assembly in course of the central discussion on the budget. Prohibition was already in force in Dera Ismail Khan district and the Minister added that the results achieved so far had been encouraging.

LABOUR PROBLEMS IN THE PHILIPPINES.

(By President Manuel L. Quazon).

Industrial conflicts and agrarian troubles which have arisen during the last few months have reached a point where I deem it necessary that I address the people of the Philippines and particularly the inhabitants of the provinces of Central Luzon, stating, in as plain and clear a language as I can command, the policy of the Government in reference to these industrial and agrarian conflicts in order that no one may have any doubt as to how the Government shall act in every case that may confront it.

That there is need of improving the working and living conditions of the wage-earner in the Philippines, be he a factory or a farm labourer, can hardly be disputed; that in many instances injustices and abuses are being committed against the workingman and the peasant, is an undeniable fact; that the income of the labourer is too low to permit a substantial improvement of his living conditions is generally admitted. To correct these injustices and abuses and to ameliorate the lot of the masses is the prime concern of my administration. But as I have repeatedly stated on every opportune occasion, it is impossible to accomplish these objectives in a short period of time, because we are dealing with a complex and complicated problem, which is the result of traditional practices in the treatment of labour by capitalists and landowners on the one hand, and on the other, the lack of the habit of continued and sustained work among the workingmen. Moreover, production methods are generally unscientific and inefficient, particularly in agriculture.

A legislation fixing a minimum wage is easy enough for the National Assembly to enact, but unless such a law takes into consideration the effects that it will have upon existing industries and their continued progress, as well as upon the creation and development of new ones, it might result in greater hardships for the labourers themselves for it might cause the closing of factories aleady in operation and thus increase the number of the unemployed. Besides, a minimum wage for the workingman, to be economically sound and also fair to capital, can only be justified if the service rendered is actually worth the minimum wage fixed.

The strict enforcement of the present Tenancy Law alone will not automatically solve our agrarian problems. Certainly not in so far as the situation of the tenant or farm labourer himself is concerned. With the enforcement of the Tenancy Law, it will also be necessary to provide credit facilities, not only to landowners, but to the tenants as well. In addition, new methods of farming must be adopted to increase production and insure the maximum benefits that the land can yield. Moreover, the tenant must learn, and have an opportunity, to work through-out the year, for generally no one can earn an income that will be sufficient to properly support himself and his family all the year around if he works only for a few months.

I am mentioning but a few illustrations of the complexity of the problem that we have at hand. So that those who expect to be benefited by the policy of social justice which we have proclaimed may understand fully why they must have patience and should not expect immediate results. Even if the Government were to take every foot of arable land in the Philippines and distribute them without compensation among the tenants, these tenants would find in the end that their situation had not been materially and permanently improved, and in some cases they would perhaps find that they were in a worse condition, unless they were at the same time granted better credit facilities and they themselves worked harder, more consistently and intelligently than they are doing at present. Of course, the Government cannot take the lands from their present owners and give them away to the tenants, for under the Constitution, no person can be deprived of his property except for a public purpose and with just compensation. The confiscation of land by the Government is, therefore, out of the question in the Philippines. Indeed, it is my inescapable duty to protect property rights and I shall use all the powers of the Government in the discharge of this duty. This should be made clear to the tenants so that they may give no credence to those who tell them that the Government has the power to confiscate privately owned land and to distribute it among those who are working it. Nor should these tenants believe that should they become landowners, the mere fact that they are no longer tenants but landowners, will greatly alleviate their present condition. They will have, I repeat, to learn to work more efficiently during the whole year and use methods that will make, the land yield much more than at present.

Again I want to reassure the masses of my determination to do justice to them and to improve their lot. The National Assembly, I am certain, will enact the required legislation to carry out the policy of social justice. Such laws as experience has demonstrated are necessary to improve or supplement existing labour and tenancy legislation, will be enacted. Greater credit facilities will be given to industry and agriculture; the establishment of new industries and the use of modern methods in agriculture will be fostered, and labour and tenancy laws will be strictly enforced.

But in order to carry out the social justice programme there must be, first of all, peace and order. And so I am determined to prevent and suppress all kinds of violence and lawlessness, and all attempts to sabotage the programme of social improvement approved by the Government. In this determination, the whole government is united. This is evidenced by the promptness with which the National Assembly has granted my request to appropriate five hundred thousand pesos to be spent at my discretion for purposes of law enforcement. I am calling, therefore, upon every law-abiding citizen to cooperate with the Government in its efforts to maintain peace and order and to carry out the social justice programme. I advise everybody to refrain from carrying on any movement through propaganda or otherwise that might result in arousing the people to commit acts of violence or lawlessness, or even to make threats to do acts of violence or lawlessness. I warn those labour leaders who are engaged in this kind of activities that their continuance in this pernicious agitation is done at their own risk. I know that there are so-called labour leaders who have engaged in the provocation of labour troubles as a means of livelihood, and I know who they are; and I want to tell them that, although the Government has heretofore tolerated their activities, it is because they have been adroit enough to walk on the borderline of legality without transcending it. The consequences of their activities now, however, are such as to warrant the Government, in the exercise of its police power, henceforth to deal with them drastically and with the severity which the circumstances demand and the law authorizes. As for the misguided people who follow these false leaders with the full knowledge of the consequences of their acts, I want to tell them that I am laying a deadline beyond which any man or group of men may go only with the certainty that they will be met by the forces of the government.

I bespeak the cooperation of the labour leaders who are honestly interested in the welfare of the labouring class aud are not seeking their own selfish ends. They should counsel patience to their followers and to use only legal means to secure redress for their grievances. The strike is, of course, lawful, but there would seem to be no occasion for employing it now in the Philippines. The Department of Labour and the Court of Industrial Relations have been created precisely to afford labour the right, and the sure and effective means of securing justice from capital. The labour leaders who would resort to strikes rather than to these instrumentalities created by the government will not have my sympathy. On the contrary, and so that they may be advised of what they will have to face, I want to tell them that if a strike is declared by any labour organization before the labourers have presented their grievances to the Department of Labour, or before the Department of Labour has had time to act thereon or to submit the matter to the Court of Industrial Relations, the Government will protect by force, if necessary, any individual or organization that may offer to do the work of the strikers. And if the strike concerns those public services that immediately affect the well-being of the people, should the situation demand it, the Government itself will assume the responsibility of providing the men needed to take the place of the strikers. I will particularly take precautionary measures against general or sympathy strikes which may menace peace and order and the public welfare.

With regard to the controversy between tenants and landowners, the practice of force in taking crops, either by a tenant or a landowner, without the consent of the other party, must be stopped. If necessary, I shall use force to prevent it in the future. The gathering of armed men will be considered as a threat to commit violence, and any such groups will be dispersed by force in case of resistance or refusal to obey the order of authorised government agents.

If any tenant should have grievances because of the violation of the Tenancy Law, or because he has otherwise been deprived by the landlord of his just participation in the crop, such tenant should at once go to the nearest public official, be he a teniente del barro, councillor, mayor or governor, fiscal or public defender of the province, to submit his complaint. These officials are directed to hear these complaints and to render to the tenant the help that may be necessary forthwith to bring the case before the Court. From my conversations with tenants during the trips that I have been making through the provinces, I am convinced that some of the agrarian conflicts which have arisen are due to the fact that these poor tenants, lacking the means to present their case before the court, have felt that the only remedy for their grievances was to take the law into their hands. For this reason, I command every official of the government and request public spirited citizens to pay immediate attention to the complaints of these tenants and give them assistance so that they may be convinced that by appealing to the constituted authorities and through legal means, they can secure justice and redress for their grievances. Failure on the part of these officials to give prompt assistance to the tenants will be considered a grave dereliction of duty and dealt with accordingly.

Once more I urge the people to be patient and to abide by the law. Once more I urge them to have faith in the ability of their government to right the wrongs which they suffer, to redress their grievances and to administer justice promptly and fairly.

AN INCOMPLETE MESSAGE TO THE WORLD.

(By J. M. Ganguli, Calcutta.)

Through an interviewing American journalist, Mahatma Gandhi has sent a message to the world on the present European problems, which seem to be heading towards a crisis. The message is a brief one advising the democracies all to disarm so as to make such a deep moral impression on the Dictators as to make them feel uneasy in mind and heavy in conscience when thinking of attacking them.

The message is a good one, and should not necessarily make its giver a laughing-stock, as Gandhiji apprehends, but it is essentially incomplete. It is quite possible to disarm Himsa by Ahimsa; to overcome violence by non-violence; to melt cruelty by kindness; and, in short, to impress a sinner by virtue. But for all that the necessary condition is that there should be genuine sincerity on the other side. If I am full of himsa and violence freely loosening my muscles against those weaker than myself and wresting possessions of others at will, I cannot hope to make an effective impression on my attacker by quickly throwing away my weapons and looking innocent like a harmless lamb. In the ashrams of great Indian saints there was no himsa, no fear; serpents went by without biting; a goat drank water with a tiger at the same place without fear. That was because those saints were absolutely free from any fear or himsa, which even in others could not survive in their presence as darkness could not stay with light. Pretension of ahimsa or even its practice under stress of circumstances will not, however, avail in dispelling violence or in removing cause of fear.

That truth must be very deeply impressed on those, who are given the prescription of non-violence against an attack of violence. They must further be advised honestly to undo their past wrong acts and make adequate amends for them so as to give genuine indications of their repentence for the past and of their sincere determination to be unselfishly fair to all in future.

What is, however, the position in Europe today? There are some powers who are organising themselves under the leadership of some inspiring personalities to wrest from the hands of others whatever they can of the advantages, economic, territorial or influential, which the latter have already secured to themselves by their previous adventures enterprise or by their successes in former wars. The latter powers in the full enjoyment of their possessions and privileges want to maintain the status quo if not also to remove the possibility of future danger by keeping the rising powers in check. Thus, though these powers have been called totalitarian and democratic states because of some formal difference in their political and constitutional organisational there is little difference in their political or moral outlook. Either side believes in physical strength and imperialistic domination over weaker people and particularly over non-European races.

"If Europe is still not worthy to fulfil her colonizing mission to the world, then the hour of her decadence is irrevocably sounded," said the Italian Dictator when crushing Abyssinia to fulfil that European colonizing mission; and he haughtily asked if the League of Nations was to be the tribunal before which "Negroes, savages and backward races could arraign the great nations which had revolutionized and transformed humanity."

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Those arrogant words of a pride-blinded individual not only represent the feelings and the philosophy of the Fascists and the Nazis, who have at least the virtue of outspokenness, but of other European powers also, who are more guarded and diplomatic in their language. The preaching by one group of them, therefore, of non-violence or of the blissful virtue of ahimsa to fellow human beings cannot impress the other group that wants to share with it the exploitation of the weaker people. And even if acting on the advice of Gandhiji, though of course they will not, the members of the first group were to dramatically pose to disarm, with tears streaming down their cheeks and arms raised prayerfully in all innocence to the Heaven and lips all the while repeating the ten commandments of the Son of God, they cannot impress those of the other group, who will justifiably detect more shrewdness than sincerity in such affectations. And, as Germany has recently done in the Czecho-Slovakia annexation if the latter reject the appeals and holy protestations of the former as being "without moral basis," and all the more forewarn themselves against such clever moves to stifle their efforts to raise themselves as powerful rivals, they cannot be criticized and their conduct cannot be damned as sacreligious under present European moral or political philosophy.

If, therefore, Gandhiji's suggested remedy is to succeed in the ever-recurring European disease of strife, jealousy, and warfare, it has to be supplemented by an essential prescription to all imperial powers to disgorge all that they have already swallowed, withdraw their claims in all their extra-territorial possessions; and to realise the folly of indulging in a sense of racial superiority that hurts its sufferers more in as much as it blinds them to the beauty, goodness and grandeur, which in one form or the other, manifest or latent, are to be found in all creatures of God. For adjustment of all claims and natural rights not only of the European powers but of all peoples and countries of the world, free or under the domination of others, a great tribunal consisting of representatives of all, each having absolute equality of status, and actuated by the highest ideals of liberty, equality and equity should be formed to administer world justice. Not the spirit to disarm under force of circumstances against superior power, but the spirit to call such a tribunal and to unreservedly submit to it all gains, possessions and imperial acquisitions to such tribunal for disposal and dispensation, will cure the European or rather the colonization and imperialism disease of the Europeans and solve the problem of lasting world peace.

But I am dreaming of an age that is yet far from coming to come; and if Gandhiji fears to become the world's laughing stock by proposing a remedy in part, must I not feel sure of becoming the same by offering it in its whole? And yet it is a hard truth that this sure remedy for all human and world problems has to be given and taken in its entirity. Dr. Wilson, the war-time President of America, had a faith of the idea, but his League of Nations scheme failed because behind it were feelings of victor and vanquished and the arrogance of Europeans towards the rest of human beings whose existence on earth could not claim their consideration except as creatures for exploitation. That was an attempt to try the remedy not in its entirety but piecemeal and in a perverted manner. Gandhiji's message, essentially incomplete as it is, would also prove to be unefficacious, even if given a trial. I therefore offer the message in its indispensable fullness to all thinkers of the world, not because I have any hope of its being accepted, but because a far-visioned on-looker often loves to share with others the pain and sorrow that he feels in his immediate surroundings and the beauty, peace and bliss that he discerns ahead. "Come, let us go there," says he.

INDIAN LEADERS AND POLITICS.

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer,

Sir,

In a leader of March 4th, "The Political Goal," you recall the words of Mr. Gokhale in 1905 when for the first time he "prescribed a goal for Indian politics." He said, "The goal of the Congress is that India should be governed in the interests of the Indians themselves, and that in course of time, a form of government should be attained in this country similar to what exists in the self-governing colonies of the British Empire.....That advance, moreover, can only be gradual, as at each stage of the progress it may be necessary for us to pass through a brief course of apprenticeship before we are enabled to go to the next one; for it is a reasonable proposition that the sense of responsibility required for the proper exercise of the political institutions of the West can be acquired by an Eastern people through practical training and experiment only.....also of Dadabhai Naoroji, and Sir Pherozeshah Mehta." Reflecting upon these great personalities one is overcome by two waves of feeling. First of almost awe-struck admiration—"there were giants in those days." Second, of inexpressible regret and deep sadness. All were of equal stature of greatness, but having been privileged to the friendship of Mr. Gokhale, my remarks will be confined to him. What an intellect was his! which could envisage a future for India founded upon reality. What startlingly correct political sense which had grasped the very essence of the democratic government, the "gradual advance," the progress by stages of "apprenticeship," the acquisition "through practical training and experiment only." Startling when we compare these words with the "progressive realization," "method of trial and error," "working out their own salvation" of the laid down principles of the India Act. Here was a man with unclouded eyes: a prophet. Had he lived, would he not have rejoiced to see in the India Act a fulfilment of his dearest hopes? Here was the door open at last! the pathway revealed, by walking along which the goal of freedom would be reached, and accompanied by no "violent tornado and uprooting" as lamented by Lord Irwin, but instead the gentle sunshine of goodwill, trust and friendship with the British Government.

What deep sadness must overwhelm me, that these true Mahatmas have passed away, and that unfortunate Mother India has fallen under the dominance of those lacking the qualities of great and sound leadership.

* * * *

I am so much struck by Mr. J. Chinna Durai's article "A Primrose Path to Freedom," in your issue March 11th that I cannot refrain from making some remarks on it. First, I hope the article will be taken in all seriousness. There is a very great deal in all he writes, even more than he may be conscious of himself, and which could be apprehended only by one of the race of good "sports." To a foreigner at superficial glance it will seem even grotesque that the British make sport of so great importance. But sport is inextricably mixed up with all that is best in British character, that which could make the true Briton give his life for his Democratic Government, and find the totalitarian State intolerable. Mr. Chinna Durai enumerates some of the good qualities necessary for the sportsman, "give and take, tolerance, self-sacrifice?" honourableness, loyalty, sense of responsibility, co-operation or the team spirit, self-control and abstemiousness, good humour, all these could be added. Now-a-days sporting terms even stand for these qualities "don't hit a man when he is down," "don't hit below the belt," "be a sport" and many others and to say "it isn't cricket" means it is not worthy of a gentleman, used with its highest implication. In India you were surprised when the British bureaucrats co-operated with the new Congress governments in all friendliness. But we should take their conduct as a matter of course, as we always expect the Briton "to play the game." It is quite true that if Indians highly distinguished themselves in sport in such numbers as could not fail to be remarkable to the British Public, that Public would say to itself, how is it that India is not yet a Dominion when Indians are like this. They, the Public, would mean being good sportsmen they are fit for full self-government, and they should have it and if India were a nation of good sportsmen with strong bodies, they would have clear minds, and instead of moaning, groaning, and whining that they are still poor downtrodden, frustrated subject people, they would have the sense to see that they are actually no longer a subject people, having their feet off the ground of the past, and set upon the first rung of that ladder which is named freedom !

Do they so revel in self-pity that they love to hug their chains while all the time those chains exist only in their fevered imagination—those chains that have actually been lifted from them ? "But there are none so blind as those who won't see."

TEMPERANCE IN MYSORE.

Sir Mirza M. Ismail, Dewan of Mysore, received a deputation of the members of the Mysore State Temperance Federation on April 5.

The deputation consisted of Capt. A. J. Moss, Mr. J. R. Isaac, Mrs. M. R. Marler, Mrs. L. Gill, Mr. A. F. Legg, Mr. G. T. Bridges, Mr. T. Ramachandra and Mr. R. Gopalaswami Aiyar. Mr. K. V. Anantaraman, the Second Member of Council, and Mr. P. H. Krishna Rao, Secretary to Government, Local Self-Government, were also present.

A memorandum was submitted to the Dewan who discussed with the members with interest and sympathy the points raised in the memorandum and said that he would favourably consider the requests made by the deputationists.

In the course of a long statement, the signatories to the memorandum state, after thanking the Dewan personally for the generous help that was being given by the Government of His Highness the Maharaja of Mysore and for the sympathy and generous help he had always given as Patron and the interest he had shown in the work of the Federation:

"As you are aware, the Federation has been in existence since 1914 and we shall be completing our Silver Jubilee by the end of this year. The Federation is carrying on an intensive educative propaganda in the urban slum areas inhabited by labouring population, as also in the rural parts, through the help of a band of devoted workers drawn from various affiliated organisations. We are glad that our work has been made possible through the Government grant as well as support from the public and personal voluntary service.

"Our coloured posters are used intensively not only here but throughout India and in the West. Our specially prepared Temperance film and the projector and magic lantern slides are constantly in demand. We organise exhibitions during important fairs and festivals. It has been possible that this year, thanks to your kind and personal interest, their Excellencies the Viceroy and the Vicereine visited one of our Temperance stalls at the Closepet Rural Exhibition.

"As members of the Federation working for the ideal of total abstinence, we feel very glad that the whole country is taking up the programme of Prohibition which is being attended with quite an amount of success. We are equally glad that, in our own State, His Highness' Government is sympathetic towords this ideal and has taken up necessary steps towards the same. In this connection, we desire to request that the following special measures may kindly be adopted :—

'The Closepet Prohibition Area be enlarged into two or three taluks and that all drink and drug shops in the area be completely elminated, and Prohibition be enforced on a systematic basis.'

"To help the labouring classes from the immediate temptation of drink and wasting their hard-earned wages of the whole month on the pay days, Government may be pleased, as a first step, to close the drink shops in urban areas like Bangalore City; Kolar Gold Fields, Mysore, Bhadravati, Davanagere and Mandya during pay days. The management of industrial concerns, including Government factories and also municipalities, in response to the appeal sent from the Federation, have very kindly consented to co-operate in such a measure by synchronising their pay days. It is now for the Government to sympathetically consider this request and include this as one of the conditions of the auction of liquor shops.

"The Federation, through the leaders and members of the International Order of Good Templars, K.G.F., have been able to achieve a good amount of educative propaganda amogst the labourers in the Mining area, and now there is an increasing demand for more workers, suitable literature, posters, slides, etc., to carry on an intensive day-to-day Temperance propaganda in the field. Towards this intensive educative propaganda work, we request the Government to kindly give us an additional grant of Rs. 500.

"The Government's sympathy towards attempts at Prohibition by the neighbouring provincial governments encourages us to request the Government to be pleased to declare a dry area belt on the border of the Prohibition districts, and close the liquor shops situated within about 10 miles in the border all round. This, we are sure, will not entail the Government any great loss, while it will create for the Government a large amount of sympathy and establish confidence as a generous response."

NO PROHIBITION IN BHOPAL.

In the Bhopal Legislative Assembly a resolution by Pandit Chatar Narain Malaviya to introduce total Prohibition in the State was rejected by an overwhelming majority. The mover said that during the reign of Her Highness the late Begum, there was total Prohibition in the State and so, now that Prohibition was being introduced in almost every Province in British India, Bhopal also should revert to the policy adopted by her late Highness. The Government moved an amendment to the effect that a Committee be formed to go into the matter, as total Prohibition meant a loss of Rs. 8½ lakhs in revenue. Pandit Malaviya refused to accept it.

THE TRADITIONAL HOME OF THE SANDALWOOD TREE.

It is in perfumery that the greater proportion of Sandalwood Oil is employed at the present day and to discriminating buyers, such as perfumers and soap manufacturers must of necessity be, it is hardly necessary to extol the virtues of the East Indian Oil which is without equal, both as a fine perfume base and a fixative for the increasingly popular bouquets of the Oriental type. In addition it is now being used extensively, and with marked success, in the creation of some of the more delicate perfumes in which the Sandalwood odour is not required as a predominant character.

A few trials will convince the perfumer who has not taken full advantage of the odour-value of this oil, that is of the greatest use to him, not only for predominant Sandalwood odour where required, but also a modifier and a fixative for other odours. This is true for liquid perfumes, soaps, creams, powders and all other cosmetic preparations. It will be found invaluable to those up-to-date perfumers who pride themselves on their own "creations."

NOTES.

The Return to Collective Security :—Unlike the Bourbons who never learnt anything, Mr. Neville Chamberlain has profited by his Munich experience. Immediately after Munich Mr. Chamberlain expressed his faith in diplomacy supported by armed strength. Even that seemed unavailing this March, when Herr Hitler showed a tendency to annex without warning and without giving Mr. Chamberlain any opportunity of negotiating. The British Premier is, at any rate in Europe, a man of peace. That he has declared times without number. He is building up an enormous British army to threaten but not to fight. But "armed diplomacy" with anxiety to avoid war, is of no avail after an annexation. To meet this new menace, an old method discarded by Britain as impracticable since the last general election, has been revived, collective security. Last week marked a notable development in European politics. The democratic worms were turning. The French Premier declared his determination on March 30 to resist Italian threats. A day later Mr. Chamberlain announced in the House of Commons that Britain and France would support Poland in fighting any threat to her independence. This statement was less definite than it could well have been and two such political extremes as the London Times and Moscow officials agreed in the opinion that a guarantee of independence did not mean a guarantee for every strip of territory. While Moscow seemed to be pressing for something more definite, the Times' comment appeared startlingly like an inspired hint to Germany which she would, as in the case of the Sudetens, follow up at once. Mr. Chamberlain, however, was not content this time with an emphatic repudiation. He gave a specific assurance that he meant resistance to aggression.

Encirclement :—It is rather difficult to appreciate how British speakers can object to their policy being called one of "encirclement" of Nazi Germany and at the same time urge that Mr. Chamberlain means to stand by what he says. Collective security against Nazi aggression can only succeed if it amounts to encirclement. That the politicians appreciate this is shown by the assiduity with which they are pursuing a policy of bringing in as many states as can be brought into the anti-Fascist alliance. Mr. Chamberlain has been forced into action by his fear of German aggression on British interests and by the strength of British opinion. But with the lapse of time the public memory will fail and once more appeasement will take the place of resistance to aggression. Let us not forget that in 1935 the British Premier was an enthusiast for the League of Nations and for collective security before a general election, and that a general election is expected next year in Britain. It is also worth remembering that in May 1938 general mobilization in Czechoslovakia and her close co-operation with Britain and France prevented Nazi aggression at the time and solved one crisis, only to hand over the Republic in less than a brief six months into Nazi hands. Today Poland, ideologically in a much weaker position, is preserved by her mobilization and the strong declarations of French and British support. Herr Hitler who slowed down his campaign against Czechoslovakia last May, can the more easily do so now as his prestige has been enhanced in Germany by his "conquest" of Czechoslovakia and of Memel, and his economic treaties in the South-East. Only a policy of "encirclement" can meet the danger and consolidate the position. The present Government in Britain sees the position clearly enough. But the tortuous diplomacy or Mr. Chamberlain seeks to form a "defensive" alliance against the Fascist powers without provoking the anger of Germany and Italy. In doing so his methods resemble with a startling resemblance the tactics of the German Social Democrats in the early days of Herr Hitler's rise to power. There is moreover the need to preserve the appearance of continuity in foreign policy. It is but natural that the Premier should still publicly commend his Munich policy as a success. What surprises us that he is able to convince his public of this. The absence of anything more than futile and diffident opposition in Britain at the present time, is the greatest and perhaps the sole strength of the Government party.

Sir M. Gwyer on the Rajkot Papers :—Sir Maurice Gwyer's opinion on the papers submitted to him relating to the dispute between the Thakore Sahib of Rajkot and Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel, was published in the daily press on Tuesday. Some press comments refer to it as the award of the Federal Court. It is nothing of the kind. Sir Maurice Gwyer is the Chief Justice of that Court and has the prestige of that great position. But in this case, to use his own words, "doubts having arisen as to the meaning which should be attached to these documents, my advice was requested (by the Crown Representative) as to the way in which they should be interpreted." The opinion expressed in the statement, therefore, has the character of advice only. There were two points on which Sir Maurice's advice was immediately sought. The first was, did the Rajkot ruler give a blank cheque to the Sardar to recommend any seven persons (being subjects or servants of the State) and undertake to nominate all of them to the contemplated Reforms Committee, whatever his own opinion and that of his councillors may be of the merits and capacity of the persons recommended? The second was whether the Chairman of the Committee was to be nominated by the Thakore, was included in the ten members mentioned in the Notification or might he be the eleventh of the Committee? On both these points Sir Maurice has advised the Crown Representative that the contentions of the Thakore are, in his opinion, untenable and that those of the Sardar commended themselves to his legal judgment. Sir Maurice says that there is no single principle which regulates cases where one person recommends and another appoints. One of the analogues which he has cited, namely, appointments to Universities in India, is rather a slippery one. Owing to the restricted character of the reference, precluding his taking into consideration any but the strictly legal connotation of terms, Sir Maurice Gwyer could not consider whether any ruler, with a due sense of his responsibility, would give a blank cheque of this character to a political leader whose friends and followers at the time of the negotiations were, many of them, in his prisons or before his courts, and from whom some, perhaps all, of the seven men to be recommended might be drawn; and whether, after giving such a blank cheque, he would follow it up next morning with a letter expressing his gratitude to him who has taken the blank cheque. As for the number of the Committee members, it is generally found convenient to have an odd number in order to avoid the possibility of a tie. If the Chairman was to be one of ten, he will have either to have his right to vote restricted, or be given a casting vote, in case of a tie; the notification did not do either.

The Hussein-McMahon Letters:—It is at last admitted that the Hussein-McMahon correspondence bears out the Arab contention rather than the British. The Spectator observes: "The publication of the McMahon letters, though they are admittedly open to two opposite interpretations, suggest to the average plain man who reads them that Syria was in fact excluded from the Arab territory promised to the Emir Feisal by Sir Henry McMahon and that Palestine was not." The Economist is more precise. It says: "The wording is—perhaps deliberately—obscure. But if it was intended to exclude Palestine from the Arab Kingdom, the least that can be said is that the drafting was culpably lax. The more obvious meaning of the words would be more in accordance with the Arab claim." Independent observers had never any doubt that the Arabs had been deceived. Hocking in his "Spirit of World Politics" cited the conclusive fact that when Feisal hoisted his flag at Damascus and other towns in the conquered territory Allenby asked him to take down his flag only at Beirut. While the English Press recognises that the Arab interpretation is right, it seems to think that the fact has no bearing on the Palestine problem at the present day. The Balfour Declaration has also been understood in two different senses by the British Government and the Zionist leaders. The least that should be attempted now by the British Government is to shape its interpretation of the Declaration as far as possible in accord with the Arab interpretation of the McMahon pledge. The Spectator thinks that it is impossible to find a solution acceptable to both Jews and Arabs and that Federalism seems to offer the best course. But would the Jews and Arabs accept a Federal solution? Evidently not, in which case it is no solution at all.

Gandhi and Hitler:—The Economist writes: "The Mahatma without a single gun to back his diplomacy, presented his ultimatum and mobilised his forces of personal prestige and will power. He was as successful as any Hitler. It is true that the terms on which he was persuaded to demobilise were not those that he had stipulated when he began his fast unto death. But this is likely to prove as deceptive as the seeming fact that the Munich Conference gave Herr Hitler less than he had demanded at Godesburg. There is a general feeling that Gandhi's interviews with the Viceroy cover a wider field and might lead to more important results than the Rajkot settlement. In India, too, there is a similar feeling though it takes another form of apprehension. The Modern Review, for instance, affirms; "Whether hereafter the Congress accepts, recognises and works the British-made Federation scheme or not, a part of that scheme already stands recognised by the supreme leader of the Congress." This is not correct. As we point out in the Note on the Gwyer statement, the Federal Court is not in the least involved by the fact that the gentleman who was requested to advise as regards the correct legal interpretation of the Thakore Sahib's composition, happens to be its Chief Justice.

misapprehension would and should have been avoided by selecting some other personage to interpret the Thakore's words. The President of the Indian Legislative Assembly would have been quite as competent an authority on the legal aspect of the subject and he would have had the advantage of being well-acquainted with the mental processes of Princes and politicians in this country.

Lessons of Tripuri :—Much has been and is being written on the lessons of the Tripuri session of the Indian National Congress. Three of our contributors state their impressions, approaching the subject from different standpoints. Mr. Ganguly, we are afraid, is unjust to the so-called Rightists. The difference between the Rightists and Leftists in the Congress are precisely that between the right hand and the left in the majority of men who are neither ambidextrous nor left-handed. The left hand is equally useful as the right but it has not the same power to grasp things as the right. Indian Leftists are Rightists in the making. They have not the experience and cunning of the Rightists. The latter, while making the masses believe that they are more fearsome enemies of Imperialism than the Liberals, are also able to make Imperialism believe that they are its true friends and allies. The Leftists are more literal but Tripuri has taught them their first lesson in diplomacy. The wholesale manner in which they abandoned their President to his fate, when they found that their bubbles would be pricked, has taught another lesson to the public, not to take the Leftist at his face value. Not love of power as Mr. Ganguly unjustly thinks but fear of collapse of the hugh ramshackle structure which they had reared and its damage to their own personal safety and prestige, is responsible for their sudden stampede at the election of Mr. Subhas Bose in spite of their expert horsepulling. Mr. Bose would have gained greatly in personal prestige as well as in his physical health if he had followed the precedent of Ranade who in 1895 waived the right to hold the Social Conference in the Congress Pandal, after he had secured it against Lokamanya Tilak from a majority of Congress Committees. The lesson of Tripuri to the man in the street is that although 52 elephants may be in readiness to draw the President's chariot, if the Presidential succession is upset not all of them can induce him to occupy the chariot. The 52 elephants chariot is a revealing fact about the methods by which the Indian people are educated and interested in democratic politics. This is merely the old simple jatra converted into a Congress mela : the great thing evidently is to collect a crowd. This at present can be done only by means of crowd most by its 52 elephants. The Tripuri Congress will be remembered.

Christian Support to Prohibition :—We reprint elsewhere the comments of the Indian Witness, Lucknow, the organ of the Methodist Church in India, on the inauguration of Prohibition in Bombay. The reference to the two thousand years old tradition, was relevant because it is still in force with a considerable section of the population. As we observed last week, the practice of total abstinence by the middle classes as a whole, makes it necessary to adopt special measures to bring home to them the vital importance of Prohibition to the classes lower down in the social and cultural scale. It was also important as differentiating the position in this country from that in the United States where, owing chiefly to the absence of such a tradition, Prohibition failed. The failure of Prohibition there has been constantly advanced by opponents against its adoption in this country. As for the exemption of Europeans, the Bombay Government's Press Note which we reprint, explains that it is due to the fact that while the use of liquor is alien to Indian culture, it is not condemned by Western civilisation. If a large proportion of Europeans in Bombay refrain from applying for permits, as we trust they will, that will be evidence that the exemption is unnecessary; and Government, we are sure, will be only too pleased to drop the exemption clause. The exemption of sacramental wine, is in accordance with the principle of respecting religious scruples. Here again, the Churches are not obliged to take out permits and we believe that the Protestant Churches will not need them. The Catholic hierarchy in this country seems also to be favourably disposed but it remains to be seen how the lesser clergy will react to the call of abstinence.

Succession in States :—Apropos of the statement by the Maharaja of Indore that the question of his succession remains unaffected by his marriage with Miss Lawler, the position is thus described by Mr. Varadarajan in his book, "The Indian States and Federation," noticed today on another page :

> As a result of representations made by the Princes, it is now admitted that, when there is a natural heir in the direct line, he succeeds as a matter of course, and the claim that such succession requires the sanction of the Paramount Power has been abandoned. But the claim that such succession requires the recognition of His Majesty the King-Emperor still holds the field. Such recognition is conveyed by an exchange of kharitas of a complimentary character between the new Prince or Chief and the Viceroy or other high authority concerned.

This was the procedure followed in the accession of the present Maharaja Gaekwar to the Baroda gadi on the death of his grandfather.

> In the case of successions other than those of the direct natural heir (Mr. Varadarajan continues) the announcement of recognition is made by a representative of the British Government either at a durbar held for the purpose or at a formal visit of the Prince or Chief.

Mr. Varadarajan is needlessly vague here. If there is no direct natural heir, the Paramount Power practically appoints the successor. If there is more than one claimant, it selects the one who succeeds.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER
BOMBAY, April 8, 1939.

THE ETHICS OF POWER.

Sir Girja Shankar Bajpai struck new ground in his address at the seventeenth annual Convocation of Delhi University. He left severely alone such conventional topics as overproduction of graduates, unemployment, the Wardha Scheme and basic English. There has been of late a little too much of shop in Convocation addresses and Sir Girja's departure is welcome and refreshing. He took for his thesis Power, particularly Political and Economic power. Political power, he said, has existed since the beginning of history, while economic power is a modern phenomenon. He briefly defined Power as the ability to produce an intended effect. In this he differs from Bertrand Russell who in his "Power: A New Social Analysis" published a few months ago, maintains that "the fundamental concept in social science is Power, in the same sense in which Energy is the fundamental concept in Physics." The difference between Sir Girja and Russell is, that Power like Energy has no necessary relation to intention to produce any effect. The difference is important because according to Russell "Power, like Energy, must be regarded as continually passing from any one of the forms into any other." No better illustration can be found than the power of Gandhiji which is religious at one moment, economic in the next, political in the next after that. You never know when the fasting, praying Gandhi passes into Gandhi the consummate political tactician and when the latter turns into the stern moralist of Truth and Non-Violence in their most absolute, uncompromising form. This elusiveness constitutes at once the charm and despair of this extraordinary personality. Sir Girja Shankar himself observed that Power is good or bad according to the uses to which it is put. The aim of Power, he said, was to secure to each individual the fullest opportunity for self-expression: Totalitarian Power failed to satisfy any rational standard. Democratic States, on the other hand, depend on the consent of the governed. Sir Girja is obliged to admit that totalitarian, or as they prefer to call themselves authoritarian, states are also based on the consent of the governed. "No government," he says, "can for long pursue an aim which a majority of its subjects do not desire or are unwilling to work for. Totalitarian states are as much subject to this law as democracies, in the last analysis. The common man can be master of both." But the common man, if there is such a person, has no definite views as to what he wants his government to be or do. The "common man" is not a good judge of complex political issues. The majority view is not always the right or the moral view, although it may not, as Carlyle said, be mostly fools. Morality, in fact, is not determined by a majority of votes. The power of the majority is not different from brute force unless it is controlled and inspired by moral motives. The individual conscience is the seat of morality and therefore the majority, unless it is led by high principled men, is liable to be as oppressive as the most despotic tyranny.

Power in the animal world and among primitive men, is physical strength. The strongest man is the man of power as the bellwether of the flock is the stoutest goat. To prevent one strong man from dominating the mass, several men less strong physically combined to put him down. When men ceased to live by hunting and fishing, and took to breeding herds of cattle and cultivating land, physical strength ceased to be the main criterion of leadership. Some men were more fortunate than others in breeding sheep or growing corn, and they became economically stronger than their fellows whom they were able to hire to do their fieldwork while they concentrated their attention on consolidating their authority. The power of the priest preceded the power of both the men of muscle and the men of wealth because it had its roots in the imagination of the people. Not till the advent of the machine age did the power of the priest and that of religion finally give way to the economic power. The authoritarian states are a reaction against the overweening power acquired by the plutocracies under the guise of democracy. The fact is that what makes a system good or bad is the existence and the willingness to work it of men of high character and sound principle. Where such men do not exist or are unwilling to devote their time and energy to public service, however excellent a system may be in the abstract, in actual practice it is bound to be a failure. The European countries which have turned away from democracy, had experience of democratic systems of Government and have found them lacking in honesty. The authoritarian State came into existence as the result of dire necessity. It is the function of Universities to train men to think clear of labels. It is also their function to train men to serve their country or community in ways in which the exercise of power is strictly subordinated to the influence of example and persuasion. If we had a voice in the matter, we would insist on every member of the Legislature and of Government taking a pledge of total abstinence side by side with the introduction of Prohibition. Sir Girja Shankar thought that Acton's dictum that "Power corrupts" was an over-statement. Power used for a good purpose does not corrupt, he thinks. Acton, however, had the whole vista of ancient and contemporary history before him when he made the generalisation. And it is true. A man can do good to himself and others only if he exerts no power save moral power. The secret of influence, observes Santayana, is suggestion not force. Power, implying as it does the possession of the right and the means to compel its force, and liable to the reactions of force. The aspirant of yoga acquires certain supernatural powers in the course of his practice but he is sternly warned not to be seduced by them from his true goal. They are the temptations which assailed Buddha and Jesus Christ. These two and Pythagoras and Galileo are the four men whom Bertrand Russell selects as the men who have wielded more power over men than any others.

No one of these had the support of the State until after his propaganda had achieved a great measure of success. No one of the four had much success in his own lifetime. None of the four would have affected human life as he has done if power had been his primary object.

We may add that the support of the State to the sects of Jesus and Buddha led to their corruption and downfall as spiritual empires. Power corrupted them. "We have taken the world's pay," lamented Cardinal Newman, "and must not grudge its yoke."

We are tempted to say a few words about freedom for individual self-expression as the end of the ideal State. With the implied qualification that one individual should not be allowed to express himself at the cost of another, the maxim is fairly sound. But qualifications are apt to drop out, especially when they are of a negative character. A positive ideal, therefore, must be found. And we have not to go far for it. The Bhagavad Gita declares that the Cosmic Power incarnates whenever the moral order decays and the forces of evil gain the upper hand. It is the function of the State to uphold the rule of right against the rule of might. Whether it is government by one man, or by a group of men, depends on the circumstances of each period and the needs of each society. Self-expression by itself is a dangerous doctrine to be taught in a University. Every one of us has two selves: The higher self can not express itself except by the lower being severely curbed. Youth is the period of revolt is another sentence in Sir Girja's address, which at the present time is apt to be interpreted to mean that youth has the right to revolt and that if it does not exercise it, it will not be youth but senility. What youth have to be reminded of at this time is rather the old saying that he cannot wisely command who has not learnt to obey.

TWO BOOKS ON FEDERATION.

"The Indian States and Federation" by Mr. M. K. Varadarajan (Oxford University Press, price Rs. 6d) has a foreword by Lord Lothian. "I am glad" he writes, "that he recognises that the advantages of the scheme of Federation overwhelmingly outweigh the anomalies and inconsistencies which at present any form of Indian Federation must involve." If Lord Lothian had said "which the scheme of the Government of India Act of 1935, implies," he would have been within his right. It is not to say that no scheme can be conceived at present which does not involve all the anomalies and inconsistencies of this scheme is to confess more the inadequacy of British statesmanship for the task than to describe its magnitude. In any case, there was no need to undertake a task so much beyond the capacity of British statesmen. India did not ask for Federation. British India asked only that the promise made in the Declaration of 1917 should be fulfilled. There was nothing in that Declaration about Federation though it has since been authoritatively declared that that Declaration had definitely in view responsible government in British India. The true story of how the idea of Federation as an immediate possibility came to be sprung at the first Round Table Conference, is yet to be told. Mr. Varadarajan does not throw light upon it though he fully recognises that the Maharaja of Bikaner's announcement was dramatic and unexpected. The paternity of the idea has been attributed to Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru. Sir Samuel Hoare at one of the congratulatory functions said that when the proposal was made, no one knew anything of Federation except Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru. The Prime Minister, Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, who presided at the Round Table Conference, lost no time in declaring the view of His Majesty's Government to be acceptance in principle of the Maharaja's offer. Those who are conversant with the routine of the British Government as disclosed in memoirs and other records of similar Conferences, will be slow to believe that there was no stage management behind the scenes in all this. To the man in the street it seemed that the scheme of Federation as an immediate possibility was a move to take the edge off the British Indian demand for responsible Government at the centre which had been put off with a denial that the promise has been made but which has since been found to be undeniable. The Princes were to be introduced in order to sterilise responsible government even in the highly diluted form in which it was to be conceded at the centre. The Princes lost nothing by entering the Federation. If there was any doubt on the point, Mr. Varadarajan removes it once for all. He writes:

> To a great extent defence, external affairs, railways, posts and telegraphs, currency and coinage, customs, salt and opium, were already federal subjects, administered by an all India service. In respect of all of them a common policy applicable to British India and the States alike was determined by the same authority, viz; the Governor-General in Council, who in the case of British India exercised his power under the Government of India Act, and in the case of the States acted as the Agent of the Crown.

This process of unification was necessary as much in the interests of the States as of British India. It was certainly just that the States should be given a voice in determining these common factors. But was it necessary for that purpose to break up the unity of British India? Mr. Varadarajan is as hazy on this point which to us has from the first seemed crucial, as others who have writen or spoken on the Federation. The impotence to which British India was reduced by the dissection, is feelingly described in "Federation versus Freedom" by Dr. B. R. Ambedkar published by the Gokhale Institute of Politics and Economics, Poona.

> If British India could have secured responsible government, Dr. Ambedkar laments, it might have been in a position to dictate which State should be admitted and on what terms. It would have been in a position to make the reorganisation of the States territory into tolerably big units as a condition precedent for their entry into the Federation. Unfortunately British India has no responsible government. Indeed its right to responsible government at the centre is denied and made dependent upon the entry of the States. 'No States, No responsible Government' has now become the fate of British India.

Dr. Ambedkar was a member of the Round Table Conference but it is not known that he exerted himself in any way to avert this contretemps.

Mr. Varadarajan in his concluding sentences exposes the weakness of the Federation owing to the indeterminate position of the States in it. He points out how a single State can bring the whole mammoth machinery to a dead stop unless forced by the Paramount Power to discharge its obligations. He writes:

> The Act imposes several obligations on the rulers without conferring corresponding rights on the Federation to enforce such obligations. If a ruler disregards his constitutional duties, the Federation stands helpless. Within the limits of the constitution there are really no sanctions at all for enforcing such obligations. The Governor-General will have to appeal to the Crown Representative (the same person in another uniform) in cases of such recalcitrance, to use his good offices and persuade the ruler to fulfil his obligations. Paramountcy is thus made the Federal sanction, and on its exercise depends the smooth working of the Federation. Without paramountcy a ruler might bring the federal mechanism in relation to his State to a standstill by refusing to carry out the instructions given to him by the Governor-General with regard to the administration of federal subjects and render the judgement of the Federal Court wholly abortive by neglecting to give effect to them in his State.

On a rather important point Mr. Varadarajan and Dr. Ambedkar take diametrically opposite views, Mr. Varadarajan is of opinion that the States once they enter the Federation can not come out of it. Dr. Ambedkar on the other hand holds that they can if any change is made which alters or extends their Instrument of Accession. Here as in the matter of obligations no legal or judicial machinery is provided in the Act by which this claim (to leave the Federation because of a change in the Instrument of Accession) could be prosecuted by the States. It is left to be determined by negotiation between the State and the Crown. Writes Mr. Varadarajan:

> The ruler of the State will have to appear perhaps as a suppliant before the Crown praying to be released from the federal tie on the ground that the basis of the constitution to which he originally adhered had been changed to his prejudice without his consent. British constitutional precedents, however, do not encourage one in the hope that such prayers would be granted.

Dr. Ambedkar on the other hand, maintains that Federation would limit the power of Parliament to make such changes as transferring defence and foreign affairs to responsible Ministers, because such changes may be claimed to affect their Instrument of Accession by some States, and as, notwithstanding Federation, the States are technically foreign States Parliment can not legislate for them. It is these and similar anomalies that Lord Lothian considers indispensable for the well-being of India at the present time!

THE KINGDOM AND THE CHURCH.

(By Paul Santamurti, Lucknow.)

To understand clearly the respective places of, and the exact relationship between, the Kingdom of God and the Church of Christ, one has dispassionately to read and honestly to interpret the New Testament. Jesus studied the conditions of the people of Palestine. The masses were ground down by the ecclesiastical formalism of the rapacious priests, the economic exploitation of the grabbing money-leaders and greedy tax-gatherers, and the political oppression of the heartless Roman Imperialists. The three sections of the exploiters often acted in perfect co-operation to the detriment of the oppressed Jewish population.

The people, who were always in despair, were ready to revolt whenever any inefficient and short-sighted leader instigated them to rebel. But before the highly disciplined and well-equipped phalanxes of the Roman Army they were often scattered like dry leaves and butchered with great ferocity. The hopes of any successful revolution through human efforts was almost extinct and the Jewish race was looking up to the heavens for a divine warrior who would descend and complete his threefold business of exterminating all those who oppressed the Jews, setting up the Jews as the rulers of mankind, and enslaving the races that did not belong to either of the above groups and making them the servants of the Jewish people for eternity.

In fact, there were several prophets who had predicted the coming of such a leader and, with the exception of those who for their own selfish reasons did not want the Messiah to come, the whole Jewish nation was in daily or hourly expectation of the deliverer. Nor was there any paucity of impostors who pretended to be the Messiah they were waiting for. These false leaders so often misled the helpless Israelites into conflicts with the Roman soldiery sometimes with most disastrous results that when Jesus came he actually had to grieve at the pitiable condition of the oppressed people saying that they were "as sheep not having a shepherd."

The Jewish nation's noblest patriot was also the world's greatest statesman. He did not see any meaning in encouraging a political rebellion against the Romans merely for the purpose of getting rid of their yoke unless the Jews were prepared to free themselves from all their individual and national sins because those sins landed them again and again into bondage as often as they freed themselves from slavery. With their deep-rooted desire to have all the Gentiles as their slaves they were not fit to be free. Besides the mere attainment, by any nation, of political freedom from foreign domination will not help that nation to retain its independence for long unless and until all the causes that led to its repeated loss of freedom are carefully and completely rooted out.

Now the causes of any nation's fall may be many and various, but the chief of them all is the want of unity among its various sections. The unscrupulous few who coerce others to acknowledge their real or fancied superiority; the greedy few who care neither for the laws of God nor for the misery of man in their attempts to get rich at the cost of their less crafty and more honest brethren; the wicked few who want to monopolise for themselves all the power for all the time, in order that they may use it for their own personal or class advantage; the proud few belonging to the so-called cultured classes who instead of helping their less fortunate brethren by educating them, use their learning as instruments for oppressing the ignorant, bring about disunity most potently. And at the root of all these diverse distempers are found selfishness, want of love, want of purity in heart, want of honesty in thoughts and deeds, in a word, the sin of living apart from God and His divine law of love. Jesus saw that all these factors were at the back of the Jewish problem and He decided that, if they were ever to live peaceful, free, happy and brotherly lives, there must first of all come a right royal change of heart which he called repentance. Jesus and, before Him, John the Baptist and several prophets before him sounded the same note,—the clarion call to repentance—individual and social.

While the prophets and John the Baptist wanted the people to repent and change their hearts in order to escape the wrath of God, Jesus wanted them to repent and change their hearts in order to prepare themselves for the bringing of the Kingdom of God on earth. His "Kingdom of God" was the solution of all the problems of the age, indeed of all ages. It comprised an intellectual Emancipation from all ignorance, superstition, illiteracy, fear, religious formalism, respect for dead customs that have ceased to have any meaning. It comprised a Spiritual Reaffirmation in which the ultimate ends of existence, the summum bonum, is clearly defined. The means of its attainment or obtainment is definitely marked out and loyalty to the leader is specifically and ultimately affirmed. It implied a Social Reconstruction under which all the distinctions between man and man is finally abolished and no respect is shown to anyone save on the ground of righteousness, wisdom, and social usefulness. It emphasised an Economic Redistribution by virtue of which it will be decreed that there shall be no poor save the poor in spirit, and no rich save the rich "in hunger and thirst after righteousness," none idle because every one will have opportunities for work and find the joy of living in doing, none overworked and broken down as the fair distribution of work will lighten the labour of each, and the whole earth will be turned into a veritable abode of bliss where men will be untrammelled by want and suffering. And it foreshadowed a Political Revolution by which all the nations and races of the world will be perfectly free and equal, none ruling the other or being ruled by the other, but all marching together, shoulder to shoulder, towards the establishment of universal Peace and Brotherhood on earth. It is the all-round Regeneration of Man and Mankind. These are some of the mighty contents of the divine concept of the Kingdom of God. Jesus fully knew that this Golden Age cannot be brought about by men with their old hearts of lead and he rightly laid his emphasis on repentance, on change of heart, on ceasing to live for self and its comforts and living for God and His Kingdom.

In his mind the Kingdom of God was the one and the only remedy for all the ills of mankind. Love and self-sacrifice were his sole weapons for the establishment of the Kingdom. He wanted a body of disciples who not only accepted his goal but also pledged themselves to follow his own methods to carry on his work. He trained his disciples as no other teacher ever trained his followers. The knowledge that Jesus was the Christ, the Son of the Living God, was the central rock upon which he wanted to establish his Kingdom and when Peter made that momentous declaration Jesus was satisfied that he had found the rock to build his church upon. This Church was to be the nucleus of the Kingdom. The burden of carrying forward the work of Christ after he left them was entrusted to this infant Church. In fact the Kingdom was to be the goal and the Church was to be the instrument to bring about that goal. The Church was not an end in itself. Jesus took his place among, and identified himself completely with, the miserable sinners, outcastes and the publicans. He championed the cause of the economically disinherited against the rich exploiters, the cause of the oppressed against the oppressors, the cause of the helpless against the powerful with the inevitable result of being hung up on the cross. It was and is his desire that his disciples, individually and as a body, the whole Church, should also stand for truth against falsehood, for right against might, for liberty against oppression.

There are few orthodox religionists, whose number is happily becoming smaller day by day, who assert that Jesus had nothing to do with social affairs, economic problems and political struggles and that the only business of a true religious man is to "say his prayers" and count his beads, to be obedient, docile, submissive, subservient and to spend all his time in putting on a sanctimonious appearance and preparing himself for the next world. How can the Church descend to such levels? If Jesus was what these professional religionists represent him to be, the Princes and Priests and company of Palestine would have taken very little notice of him. It is an important matter to be stressed over and over again, that the teachings and activities of Jesus with reference to his Kingdom of God movement, began to cut across and cut deeply too into the social, economic and political interests of the privileged classes that the priests, princes and plutocrats formed themselves into an unholy alliance for the purpose of committing the murder of the noblest, the purest, and the loveliest man that ever breathed.

The psychology of the exploiting classes all the world over, call them by whatever name one may, Capitalists, Imperialists, Nazis, Fascists, National leaders, is still exactly what it was nineteen centuries ago and the disciples of Christ, if they are to be true to his name, have to resist these evil ones, even as he resisted, with all the Truth, Love and forgiveness they could command and die, if need be, even as he died on the cross. By seeking to escape from the dread duty laid upon us, by the Master, saying that we seek the Kingdom in the next world we are only betraying the Master.

The Churches have a special responsibility laid upon them in this respect. It is a matter of deep regret and indelible shame that in the past our churches have turned quite right about and have been seeking to gain the favour of the mighty oppressors by helping them to keep the oppressed down. They have preached a kind of opiate in the name of Christ and lulled the disinherited into submission and aquiescence to despotism by assuring them that they would have in heaven all that they had missed or lost on earth. This caricature of Christianity has done enough harm to the world and it is high time to stop it. The Soviet decrees banishing Churchianity from Russia and the Indian attitude of approving Christ and rejecting Christianity are the direct results of preaching pseudo-religion by the dupes of imperialism sent out as missionaries of Christ. But Jesus Christ, all honour and glory to him, preached good tidings to the poor, and the only good news that is of any good to the poor is the assurance that they need be poor no more.

If we read the Nazareth manifesto, the Magnificat, the declarations of the aged Simeon, the prophecies of St. John the Baptist, why for the matter of that, all the Gospels carefully and prayerfully, we will find that he waged an unrelenting war against sin and sickness, slavery and selfishness, privilege and poverty in order to establish the Commonwealth of God. The Sermon on the Mount, the teachings about love, about forgiveness, about humility, were all directed towards the attainment of a particular goal and that goal was a new Social Order, the New Age, the New Race, the Kingdom of God. One has to read the New Testament dispassionately to be convinced of this.

In this connection let us concentrate our attention for a while on the scriptures and see what they have got to give us. In the days when different portions of the New Testament were written it was not so easy as it is nowadays to write and publish books. Very few people wrote books. Besides as all the books that were written had to be copied by hand, nobody cared to make copies of them unless there was something original and worth having in them.

The writers of the New Testament books had a distinct message which they wanted to convey to the readers. Therefore in any attempt at finding the message of the Gospels it is necessary that we carefully examine (1) the principal thought with which the book begins, (2) the new and original topic which the author expresses and which was not familiar to readers before, (3) the predominant subject to which the author again and again reverts by means of frequent repetitions, (4) the central message that is sought to be left upon the mind of the reader and upon which the author concentrates all his powers, (5) the important idea with which the author finishes his book or teachings, and (6) the immediate results of the author's work upon the people for whom he wrote or whom he taught. As the Epistles were written as answers to particular questions that were raised or for settling temporary disputes, we shall leave them aside for the moment and apply these tests to the Gospels and the Acts of the Apostles.

(1) Both John the Baptist and Jesus Christ started their respective ministries by preaching that the Kingdom of God was at hand and that people must repent in order to obtain it. (2) The idea of the Kingdom of God, as the solution for all the problems of the whole world, is the original and bold idea of Jesus. Though there are references to it before his time, nobody dared to advocate it as the only remedy for all the distempers of mankind. (3) Jesus refers to the Kingdom of God more than a hundred times in the Gospels and he commands his disciples to seek it first so that they might have all other things added on to it. (4) All his parables, moral teachings, activities and, in fact, the whole life is directed towards the establishment of the reign of God. (5) Even after his resurrection, Jesus spent 40 days in discussing the affairs of the Kingdom of God with his disciples and that was indeed his parting message. (6) After his ascension and after receiving his Holy Spirit Pentacost, his disciples did in fact lead the life of the Kingdom in which all man-made inequalities social, economical, political, racial and cultural were at an end. In fact it was only because this Kingdom example, set by his disciples, before the rest of the people was shaking the foundations of the capitalist economy of the Jews and the Imperialistic Social Order of the Romans that the disciples were persecuted.

Thus it is absolutely clear that Jesus intended his Church to be the most potent weapon for the establishment of the Kingdom of God and, if that very weapon is now being used for the purpose of the Kingdom of some one else, there is still time enough for it to repent and come back to Christ. For the Church to forget the fact that it is only the tool, and to claim to be the Kingdom itself, is to resemble the servant who believing that his master would be late in coming began to play at being the master and was at last found out. Like Peter, who followed Christ from a distance, warmed himself at the enemy's camp fire and denied his Lord, our churches too have been following Christ at a distance. They too have long warmed themselves at the enemy's camp-fire and have denied their Lord. Will the similarity end here or go further? Peter repented and wept bitterly and the Lord forgave him. Are the Churches also going to repent and weep bitterly? If they do so he who taught his disciples to forgive each other seventy times seven times, will surely forgive his churches also, and sanctify them for Kingdom ends.

TRIPURI'S MESSAGE FOR CHRISTIANS.

(By Cyril Modak.)

In 1885 the Indian National Congress met in Bombay for the first time. W. C. Bonnerjee was the President. The Congress then was a small body of Indian patriots, who felt it their moral responsibility to articulate the national aspirations of the Indian intelligentsia. What strides the Congress has made in half a century! Today it articulates with fearless determination, the aspirations of the vast majority of the Indian population. Today it is the national organisation through which the Kisan and the bhumijan no less than the educated, women no less than men, carry on the sacred fight for freedom. The pageant of these fifty-two years was aptly symbolised in the presidential procession, led by fifty-two elephants decked in royal trapping, bearing large portraits of national leaders. Indeed, few countries have had such a succession of heroic leaders as India has, during the last half a century. If India has yet not achieved complete independence it is not because of the dearth of high-calibre leadership but because of the fatal conspiracy between illiteracy and religionists. But India is on the march. Reactionary forces are doomed.

The Tripuri Session of the Indian National Congress is considered by some to have been a sorry failure. Others think it was a great success. We have all read the speeches made by Rightists and Leftists in support of, or in opposition to, the various resolutions. There is no need for another report of the happenings at Tripuri. Let us rather try to understand the significance of those happenings, pleasant or unpleasant as they were, and the bearings of those incidents on the Christian community. At Tripuri the glittering curtain was mercilessly torn down. It became amply clear that under the Rightist banner have assembled people of various shades of political and moral opinion, self-sacrificing Gandhians, astute Pateliites, autocratic Ramrajists, and ambitious politicians of vacillating convictions. While on the side of the Leftists are those who belong to the Congress Socialist Party, Royists, some extremists, and a few who have grievances against some pontifical ruling of Vallabhbhai Patel.

The Leftists made it quite plain that they welcomed a united front but would compromise none of the essentials of their creed. With uncanny insight the Leftists discovered the reactionary forces in the Rightist camp. Their challenge to these forces was unmistakeable. The Rightists exerted all their energy to safeguard their conservatism and check a progressive revolutionary movement. The clash revealed that what used to be a vague Socialist tendency has become a vigorous Socialist Movement. And it is bound to grow. Opposition is sure to help it to gather strength. Criticism will certainly spur it on to clearer definitions. The fact that Pundit Jawaharlal Nehru failed to bring about a compromise shows that the Leftists have sufficient faith in their programme and creed to be willing to part company with the powerful Rightists, and Nehru himself if need be. As a matter of fact, the chief complaint against the Rightists is that they have no programme of action commensurate with the desperate needs of the country.

It is wrong to believe that even the most extreme among the Leftists minimize the extent of the progress made so far or the value of the Gandhian philosophy. They rejoice in the wonnderful progress made. But they are not sentimental enough to interpret the present stand-still as progress. They honour Gandhiji and his heroic efforts. But they are not blind to the fact that great as its achivement have been in the past, Gandhiism needs to be tempered in the fire of socialism if it is to be an effective instrument for the next phase of the battle for freedom. On the other hand, one could not return from Tripuri without feeling that the Rightists have been using the magic of Gandhiji's name for small ends. Did the highest interests of the country inspire the obduracy that the Rightists manifested? Did the best welfare of the nation dictate the resolutions apparently expressing confidence in Gandhiji and in the ex-Working Committee? Was it really for the sake of Indian independence that the Rightists gave resolute battle to the Leftists? It would be extremely difficult to find satisfactory answers to these questions. It is evident, however, that what used to be the progressive phalanx of the nationalist movement is now the conservative, for a new and more radical phalanx has arisen and is striving to make its influence felt. The Radicals (or leftists) are using no magical mantrams to gain mastery. They are arousing mass-consciousness on the one hand and implementing consolidation, and on the other hand loosening the props from under the imperialist and capitalist structure. They are convinced, and make no secret of their conviction, that cultural, social and economic reconstruction must accompany political emancipation if that emancipation is to be permanent and worthwhile. Do the Rightists share this conviction?

Harold Laski said in a message to the Tripuri Congress, "The fight in which the Indian National Congress is engaged is of vital importance beyond the frontiers of India. Imperialism is the common foe of all who seek a world in which men and women have an equal claim to the gains as well as to the toil of living. Many of the main problems of India are insoluble save by Indians themselves. They require self-government not merely as a right which no democratic state can deny to them. They require it even more because without self-government the vital economic problems of India will be disregarded..... I hope the Congress will continue to struggle for the right to determine its own relationship to the British Commonwealth. But I hope it will realise also that the attainment of self-government is the beginning and not the end of its effort. I stand with those who, like Pundit Nehru and Mr. Bose, see that without socialism there is no way of freeing the masses of India from their economic slavary. I hope that the new generation of the Congress particularly will give all their mind and energy to assisting Nehru and Bose in the great fight for an India socially and economically as well as politically free." The younger generation of the Congress seems to have anticipated such a message: They are definitely socialistically minded.

The national situation today, has a tremendous challenge for the Christian community. We have long kept aloof under various pretexts from the fighting line. We have long deluded ourselves with all kinds of sophistry. Of course, there have been exceptions, but few and far between. The time has come when Indian Christians must get free from the inhibitions of a century and take their stand alongside of their non-Christian brothers and sisters, and fight shoulder to shoulder for the freedom and honour of the Motherland. Especially all Christian realists, all those whose hearts beat fast at the challenge of radical Christianity, must not lose this opportunity of ranging themselves against the exploitation, of the weak, against the perpetuation of unchristian distinctions, against pharasaism of all kinds, against cowardly compromise. In Jesus Christ, whom we profess to follow, we have the champion of the economically disinherited, of the physically disinherited, of the politically and socially disinherited, and of the morally and spiritually disinherited. Will we be true to Him and bravely meet the Cross for sake of liberating the oppressed, setting free the captives, ensuring that the poor have the same rights as the rich? Or will we shrink and justify by chicanery our disloyalty to Christ?

Are we so deaf that we cannot hear Jesus calling his followers in India to honour him by joining with the progressive forces of the world and of India to the emancipation of the millions held in intellectual thraldom, held in social bondage, held in economic fetters, held in political chains? Are we so blind that we cannot see Jesus pointing to the miserable outcastes, to the poverty-stricken peasants, to the thousands of despondent unemployed, to the unacknowledged heroes of the land in prison and in exile, and saying, "In as much as ye have done it unto the least of these my brethren ye have done it unto Me?" The basic position of radical Christianity should drive us to co-operate whole-heartedly in the reconstruction that the Leftists are undertaking in order to establish a classless society in India, in which every man shall be free to share the fruits of his labour and the responsibility of his citizenship, in which every man shall have equal rights and equal worth, in which, indeed, every man shall be able to love God with all his being and his neighbour as himself. We have a more powerful incentive than the Communists. We have Christ. Surely, we will not waste the power of that matchless indomitable incentive. Surely we shall prove the sovereignty of Christ's matchless power by manifesting His courage by co-operating consistently, creatively, and unflinchingly in the work of emancipation that non-Christians have been attempting to do for the nation.

Loyalty to Christ demands that we get out of our narrow communal trenches and come up on the vast plains of the national struggle, unafraid of hazards, happy to prove the greatness of Him who inspires us. The trenches have restricted our vision long enough. Our comrades of the trenches, native and foreign, have held us back all too long. We must take them along with us to see a larger horizon, fight a bigger battle, serve a nobler cause. We do our Lord grave injustice by behaving in such a fashion as to give people cause to misunderstand Him. Our courageous dedication to liberty, our unfaltering stand for justice and truth, our heroic suffering and sacrifice for establishing the Commonwealth of God with our own borders will convince our brethren of the supremacy of Christ's claims much more effectively than all the wordy windiness of apologists. All the cleverest rationalization in the world cannot absolve us from the stigma of disloyalty both to Christ and the Motherland if we persist in burrowing little holes for ourselves and call it Christian service.

Tripuri declared to the world that a tremendous national revolution is in process. Millions of men and women are passionately interested in the struggle for freedom. They are intensely desirous of participating in that struggle. The slumber of the ages is broken. Men and women, young and old, rich and poor, high caste and low caste are in person registering strong protests against the iniquities of exploitation. What turn will the revolution take? Is the Christian community in India too small to throw its weight into the balances in favour of a spiritually motivated revolution? Certainly not, it is not too small; but is it too hesitant? No arguments can justify timidity. Hesitation at moments of crisis is timidity. A policy of safety-first is landing us into grave dangers. Whereas a policy of Christovert action, even if it costs one generation dearly, will extend the Commonwealth of God and win glory for the Martyr-Messiah, Jesus, the divine Revolutionary. Let us fall in line with the progressive forces of the country and transmit the influence of Christ to the national movement. Let us reclaim what has been lost. Let our hesitancy not drive men away in disgust from the dauntless Christ. Vande Kristam! Vande Mataram!

LOVE OF POWER.

(By J. M. Ganguli, Calcutta).

Love of power is a weakness which few indeed can overcome. And the greater the power the more is is such weakness, which leads people into inconsistencies, disregard of principles and loss of directness of aim and purpose. At Tripuri, however, something more happened; it made leaders eat up their own arguments before the latter had even the barest time to cool down a little after their hot delivery. And that they did in broad daylight, in and out of the open session of the Congress, without a platitude and without even a shrug of shoulder. Love of power, if it brings weakness of a particular sort, also toughens one's sensibility to moral pricks coming from one's inconsistent conduct.

Following Mr. Bose's election the so-called Rightist leaders, taking the cue from Gandhiji's open statement, took their hands off the Congress working machine explicitly for the understandable reason of letting Bose run it according to the mechanics of his own and his outnumbering supporters in the country. There were many in the country, whether or not in the evanescent public limelight, who genuinely regretted such hastiness of sober people in rushing to demarcate so sharply between this and that group of the national organisation as to make out that active and responsive cooperation was not possible and even desirable between the two. The awkward position of the leaders after the unworthy and unsubstantiated reflections, however provoked they might have been, cast on them by an election-fever sufferer was no doubt appreciated, but after Gandhiji's deciding manifesto asking President Bose to get on with his programme and policy without counting on his or his old colleagues' support, no-party thinkers left off thinking over the matter and looked forward to the activities of a new regime said to be inspired by new ideas and more dynamic spirit.

But that would have virtually meant the self-brought-about retirement of many a working leader and their parting with important and influential powers that they had been holding. Such prospects work on the nerve of even strong hearts, and so long as man is not the full master of himself, of his senses, of his sense of ego and the rest, that long he breaks down one way or the other. And so did the Rightist leaders, who beat back on their track, hurdled over the barriers they had themselves raised by their previous statements on their way back to the front line, and canvassed hot for necessary votes to support them. True, the out-going Working Committee members had the modesty not to speak out their mind, but they did not also, even for once, reiterate what they had only a few days ago said about their avowed preference to watch from a distance the new President working out his convictions with a free hand. While they thus behaved knowing well enough that their significant silence, whether they willed it or not, was bound to influence voting in their favour, Gandhiji went to Rajkot on the eve of the Congress, distracted the country's attention from the Congress to himself by his fast, and preferred to ignore beseeching calls from Tripuri to go there even for a day to explain his position and his intentions to people whose mind was set more on divining them than on the issues presented to them. Obviously Gandhiji owed such explanation to himself as much as to the people whom he had set thinking and wondering by his rather hasty statement issued without very sufficient cause on the announcement of the President's election. His Delhi visit should have been postponed; that was undoubtedly of less importance than his presence at Tripuri. Even if it was physically or otherwise impossible for him to present himself and his views before the assembled delegates at Tripuri, it was for him to send a very clear statement of his position to them. The argument that the delegates should be left free and uninfluenced to deliberate and decide by themselves could not hold there, because he had already very strongly influenced them by his very meaningful, though not very direct, previous statement. If he had already advised the President to get on with his programme without reckoning on any active cooperation from him and those of his way of thinking and if he had, at least indirectly, been responsible for the en bloc resignations of the latter, was it not in the fitness of things for him to advise from Rajkot his staunch supporters not to fight again for the positions, which they had under his inspiration thought best to relinquish?

What, however, he actually did was quite different; and if it be true, as has been said, that he rather advised them not to agree to the slightest change in Pandit Pant's resolution, he had unconsciously failed in his experiments with the truth of his own mental psychology, a deep analysis of which might possibly have shown traces of hurt vanity.

One seems to detect such traces again when reflecting on happenings following the Congress session and the passage therein of Pant's resolution. The Congress President is seriously ill; his hands are strongly fettered in an unprecedented manner in exercising discretion in the constitution of the Working Committee; it is the Mahatma who is to do the whole thing, the President only signing at his bidding; and even for this formal act of attesting his signature, it is the President who has to travel and travel to catch the Mahatma. Mahatma Gandhi in the meantime is conferring at Delhi; he can, in spite of his weakness after the fast, go right from Rajkot to Delhi to see the Viceroy, but cannot go in stronger health from Delhi to Dhanbad to see a seriously ill President lying helplessly on bed to tender to him the advice which he has been ordered by Gandhiji's lieutenants to seek from him. From the point of view of humane feelings, of sympathy and tenderness for an ailing colleague, or of showing magnanimity in not hurting the feelings of one who has already been humiliated, Mahatma Gandhi has not acted Mahatma-like in acting as above. That is harsh to say, but I feel I owe it to Gandhiji to express my feelings, though in doing so, I assure him, I feel more pain than he and those who will read this.

And what about the other leaders who are gleeful at their come-back to the former position which they have skillfully effected? They are impatient at the delay in the formation of the Working Committee and are assembling round Gandhiji, instead of caring to go to the side of the sick President. They have asked him to go by Gandhiji's advice, but when he is unable to go himself for such advice it is none of their humane consideration to get that advice from Gandhiji and carry it to the sick man. That is not all; the unkindest cut comes when they ask for a meeting of the All-India Congress Committee not at the place where the President is lying but at distant

Bombay, for the apparently obvious reason that they anticipate criticism and unpopularity at the President's headquarters. But is not such fear to face criticism wholly inconsistent with the courage that is necessary in the doctrine of non-violence? Gandhiji might as well test his leading followers in this respect.

Lest the above comments be misunderstood, I would refer my readers to my article on "The Congress Presidential Election and After" in The Indian Social Reformer of the 4th March in which will be found why I, more than many another, prefer Gandhian leadership in Indian National regeneration to continue to its being displaced by the leadership of not only the so-called Left-wingers but also of most of the denationalised Rightist leaders who, whatever they may think at heart and however they may act in private, pass themselves under Gandhian sail so as to keep themselves in popular political limelight. But for reason of my such preference, I cannot blind myself to things and doings which do not appeal to my head or heart and which leave me pained and wondering at the mis-steps taken by national leaders under impulse of vanity, love of power, jealousy, and like weakness, which disturb our balance of mind, cloud our judgement, and make us do things unworthy of ourselves.

PROHIBITION SCHEME IN BOMBAY.

The following Press Note has been issued by the Bombay Government :

On the introduction of Prohibition in the city and suburbs of Bombay, no licenses will be renewed for the retail sale of country liquor, foreign liquor, toddy, opium or hemp drugs.

More stringent conditions than at present will be imposed on—

(1) denatured spirit,
(2) rectified spirit,
(3) medicated wine,

licenses, and on licenses for the manufacture and sale of—

(1) essences,
(2) perfumed spirits.

It will be obligatory to take out licenses for possession and sale of any spirituous medicated articles and spirituous toilet preparations.

Greater restrictions than at present will have to be imposed on the use of spirits of any kind in industry or manufacture.

All licenses for supply of intoxicants at restaurants, clubs, etc., and the licenses now granted to clubs for supply of liquor to their members will be terminated.

Wholesale dealers in wines and spirits who now have "Trade and Import" licenses will be allowed to carry on their business so far as the supply of goods to customers outside the Total Prohibition Area is concerned under strict Excise control.

When Prohibition is in force it will be illegal for any person, not having the appropriate license or permit, to have in his possession any Country liquor, foreign liquor (wines, spirits, beer, etc.), Toddy, Opium, Ganja, Bhang, Charas, or, unless it has been dispensed by a licensed chemist on the prescription of a Registered Medical Practitioner or registeered Vaid or Hakim, any medicine containing spirit, medicated wine, drakshasava or other asava containing alcohol, brandy for medicinal purposes.

While Government holds the view that the consumption of intoxicants, whether liquor or drugs, is alien to Indian culture, they recognise that such consumption is not condemned by western civilization. Therefore permits for the personal consumption of foreign liquor will be given to foreigners, temporarily resident in or touring in India. Government consider, however, that those Europeans who have made India their permanent home should be willing to comply with Indian sentiment in this matter.

Therefore the issue of permits will be made only to 'persons of Non-Asiatic Domicile.'

Instructions regarding what constitutes domicile will be shortly issued, but, speaking generally, a person born of parents domiciled outside Asia, who was educated outside Asia and who intends to reside permanently outside Asia after he leaves India, may be said to have a non-Asiatic domicile. This will exclude Europeans domiciled in India and residents of other Asiatic countries.

Application for permits will be made to the Collector of Bombay on forms which will be obtainable from any Excise Office after a date to be notified later. Applicants will have to make a declaration of domicile and, if required, to produce evidence to prove that the domicile is non-Asiatic.

Government will reserve the right to refuse the grant of a permit to any person if they think fit, and to cancel any permit issued.

Fuller instructions about the quantity allowed, method of purchase, etc., will be issued later.

Any breach of the conditions of the permit will render it liable to cancellation, whereafter the person concerned will not be entitled to possess, purchase or consume alcoholic liquor.

Government understands that in some religions the use of wine is considered necessary in certain religious ceremonies. Government has no desire to interfere with any religious observances and will be prepared to consider all such cases and to issue permits or authority for such use under proper safeguards through a constituted authority of such religion or community.

Government understands that a number of persons normally keep a small quantity of brandy or other alcoholic beverage in the house for use in case of illness and that apprehension has been expressed that under Total Prohibition this will not be permitted. It may be stated that on obtaining a Registered Medical Practitioner's, Registered Vaid's or Hakim's prescription, it will be possible to obtain from a licensed chemist 4 ozs of brandy and to keep this quantity in the house against emegency.

To prevent the diversion of alcoholic consumption from wines, spirits, toddy, etc., to medicinal or quasi-medicinal spirituous beverages, physicians, chemists and other licensees will not be allowed to supply certain medicines of either Western or Eastern medical systems containing spirit, or medicated wines, drakshasavas or brandy for medicinal purposes, unless the patient has produced a prescription from a registered Medical Practitioner or registered Vaid or Hakim. Such prescription will be filed by the supplier and will be checked by the Excise Department. Steps will be taken to prevent misuse of this privilege.

All chemists who wish to dispense prescriptions containing spirit, or to sell medicated wines, or brandy, etc., for medical use, will under the terms of their license have to keep detailed accounts, the form of which will be notified later, which will be open to inspection by the Excise Department.

Similarly, all physicians who may wish to dispense any of these articles to their patients will have to keep accounts.

The arrangements for the Messes and Canteens of the Defence Forces are under separate consideration.

Such Trade and Import liquor licensees as may wish to continne to supply their upcouutry customers outside the Total Prohibition Area will be permitted to have godowns where their stocks will be kept under Excise Bond on payment of the cost of the excise staff required to supervise the godown.

Any person, who may find on the introduction of Prohibition that he is likely to have in his possession liquor, drugs, etc., for which he will have no permit or license, or in quantities greater than his permit or license may allow, will be allowed to deposit them in a Government ware-house and to withdraw therefrom according to the terms of his permit or license thereafter, or to remove them to non-prohibition areas.

Government recognises that persons habituated to the use of opium and hemp drugs in many cases are not able voluntarily to relinquish such use. Therefore provision will be made for issue to such persons as may produce a medical certificate stating the need for the drug, of 'addicts' permits'. Such a permit will enable the addict to purchase a limited quantity of the drug from a Government Opium and Hemp Drugs Depot. Government hopes to arrange for local Medical Boards in the various wards of the City which will issue the medical certificates entitling the addict to obtain a drug permit.

At the Government Opium and Hemp Drugs Depots the drugs will be sold in sealed packets of specified weights at fixed prices which will be notified later.

The sale and possession of charas will be entirely prohibited, as in the opinion of Government, it is a drug so deleterious in effect that its use must be entirely discouraged. Government proposes to make arrangements that any charas addicts convicted in connection with possession, smuggling, etc., of the drug, should undergo a course of curative treatment while in jail. Curative treatment for all addicts will also be arranged for in Government hospitals.

COCHIN FOR PROHIBITION.

A resolution favouring Prohibition was carried in the Cochin Legislative Council against the Government which pleaded that owing to the position of the State, a comparatively small one surrounded by non-Prohibition districts, it would be difficult to enforce Prohibition. The following extract of the proceedings is taken from the Hindu.

Mr. M. K. Devassy moved a resolution recommending to the Government "to reduce the number of toddy and arrack shops by 25 per cent annually, beginning from 1115, with a view to prepare the State for Prohibition."

Mr. C. V. Iyyu moved an amendment to exempt "toddy" from the scope of the resolution on the ground that toddy was an indispensable necessity for the poor labourer, but the amendment was lost for want of a seconder.

Mr. S. S. Koder opposed the resolution on the ground that it was unwise to curtail the civil liberties of the people, that Prohibition was a failure in America which had turned wet, and that the loss of drink revenue would necessitate the imposition of all sorts of levies as was being done in British India.

Mr. P. Atchyutha Menon supported the resolution and referred to the great havoc done by drink among the rural population.

The resolution was pressed to a division and carried, 25 members voting for and 12 against.

PROHIBITION IN BOMBAY.

They are having "Prohibition Week" in Bombay. The Premier inaugurated the "Week" with a startling and effective statement. He had all the facts and logic on his side. The difficulties he faces are connected with personal habits and commercial profits. When these two are combined they will go to any length to gain their end.

The Premier declared that he "would rather go begging" than depend on revenues derived from excise. But those who will be taxed to make up that revenue may not be so self-sacrificing. They are not concerned that the money spent on liquor by their shoemakers, washermen and sweepers bring in the revenue which the opponents of Prohibition are shouting to preserve.

Mr. K. Natarajan, editor of the Social Reformer, took his stand by the Premier and congratulated the Government on its Prohibition policy. In this he was running true to form. He has been actively advocating Prohibition through the years, while many Congress leaders have had little or nothing to say about it. But we are not greatly impressed by the stress he laid upon the point that "Prohibition has been the national policy of India for two thousand years." The important matter is to discover whether Prohibition is the national policy to-day. If it is nothing can block the Prohibition movement. But the danger is that we shall discover the national policy to be one of not caring one way or the other so long as extra taxes are not imposed. If taxes are levied look out!

If the leaders can hold the nation loyal to Prohibition it will be a triumph of leadership worthy of all praise. Let them draw upon the past "national policy," let them appeal for help in removing the evils that drink has brought to the depressed classes, let them picture the future advantages that Prohibition will bring to all, let them claim the support of all creeds and clases. They will need all their persuasive powers and all the support they can muster.

It is to be regretted that an exception is being made in Bombay of the European drinkers. Why is this done? Is it because of special consideration for their feelings or because of fear lest they prove a hindrance to the working of the law? In either case the Europeans should hang their heads. Liquor is just as harmful to them as it is to their Indian associates. If India without liquor does not appeal to them, the world is wide and they can go where they please. Australia is inviting them. In years to come they will certainly have little pride in teaching their children that they stood out as exceptions in reform of this sort.

And certainly no exception should be made in the case of wine for sacramental purposes. What a blot upon a holy ceremony! It is time for all Anglican leaders to announce that no exception need be made for the Church of India, Burma and Ceylon. Surely the Lutheran Churches are not insisting that an exception be made in their case. And is it too much to hope that even the Roman and other "Catholic" Churches will help the reform by refusing to ask that an exception be made for their Church? Temperance leaders in all these groups should be urging their Churches to refuse to ask that an exception be made for sacramental wine. The unfermented grape juice can be used and should be.

We congratulate those in Bombay who are thus concerning themselves for the public welfare. We desire for no one any difficulty or suffering either personal or material. But the greatest good for the greatest number certainly demands that those who oppose Prohibition change their attitude on this. May Bombay unite and lead India.—Indian Witness.

NOTES.

Prohibition :—This issue of The Reformer is devoted largely to Prohibition. We had thought of reviving the Supplement which used to be issued monthly on the subject with The Reformer sixteen years ago. On second thoughts we decided that in the completely changed circumstances, there was no need to do so. Prohibition now is the accepted policy of practically all provincial Governments. In the Provinces under Congress Governments, it is actually in force. Madras began but Bombay has distinguished itself by the boldness and imagination displayed in the scheme which has been adopted. It is due here to say that no Government except a Congress Government would have had the grit and nerve to face the problem of finance raised by the adoption of abolition. And no Congress Government would have attempted to do so but for the magnificent leadership of Gandhiji. Animal sacrifices and drink were the evil heritage which Gautama Buddha freed India from. Buddhism itself after a thousand years became corrupt and the evils which the Jamuna had put down returned in the shape of the Tantric abominations. The philosophers and saints of medieval India purified society of these evils. But during the political confusion which immediately preceded the modern era, society again relapsed into its old ways. The purifying movement has again to be revived. Religious and social reformers who during the last one hundred years have been working to rid society of corruptions which had come in association with Western civilisation. The first generation of educated Indians succumbed to them. Young Bengal, as a shrewd observer remarked, was baptised in brandy. What was true of Bengal was true of other parts of India as well. The idea of making total abstinence an integral part of social reform, belongs to the Madras Indian Social Reform Association. This step was taken in the early part of the last decade of the last century. Pledges were required of members of every Social Reform Association binding them to total abstinence. The Congress during recent years has adopted Prohibition as a part of its programme. Congress Governments have started introducing it in seven provinces, each in its own way according to the local conditions. None, however, has shown the intrepidity and determination shown by the Government of Bombay.

Points for Propaganda:—Last Saturday the Prime Minister inaugurated Prohibition Week at a great mass meeting on Chowpathi Sands. The speakers on the occasion were chosen without reference to political views. This is important as Prohibition is not a political issue but a moral and social one. From this fact arises the need for great caution in the manner of propaganda, which is, necessary to strengthen the instinct against drink which the greatest part of the population has inherited as part of its spiritual and social heritage. In political propaganda exaggerations do no great harm because political issues are intangible and seldom arise in a concrete way. In social matters, on the contrary, every man, woman and child is in a position to test the truth of facts. If a single statement advanced in support of a social reform is found to be false, the propagandist not only fails to carry conviction but jeopardises the success of other and more careful propagandists. To take one instance. One of the speakers at the Chowpathi meeting attacked the argument that drink in moderation was not harmful. He declared that the moderate drinker ended in the gutter. Everybody knows moderate drinkers who have not landed in a gutter and also that there are numerous other ways in which men and women arrive at that destination. Also that all people who are found in the gutter are not there owing to any fault of theirs. The argument of the moderate drinker is thoroughly fallacious but not for this reason. The true reason is that, although he may not visibly come to grief, his constitution and mental powers are undermined by the habit and he sets an evil example to others. This is very aptly stated in an opinion which is reproduced elsewhere, by a distinguished Health authority. The havoc caused by drink in not realised by the middle classes in this country because a very large proportion of them has been brought up in the tradition of total abstinence. When all is said, the fact remains that the middle classes are the backbone of society, on whom falls the burden of every progressive movement. Owing to our water-tight caste system, an impenetrable barrier divides the middle classes from the masses. This barrier has to be broken down and the road opened for the masses to rise to the level of the middle classes and for the influence of the latter to operate freely on the masses. The drink habit is the most obstinate fence in this barrier.

Parsis and Prohibition:—We deeply regret that an influential section of the Parsis of Bombay has taken up an attitude of undiscriminating opposition to the Prohibition policy of the Government. That policy is rooted in the ancient tradition of India and is integrated to the policy of religious toleration which gave a warm welcome to refugees from religious persecution. This policy of toleration was possible only because the social life of the country had been stabilised by, among other things, the enforcement of total abstinence; and ran little risk of being affected by the influx of immigrants. In entire accord with that policy, the Government of Bombay have announced that permits will be issued for religious uses on the authorities being satisfied that liquor is an obligatory part of any ritual. Government have also met the case of old and infirm people whose health may suffer from the deprivation of a luxury to which they have been accustomed, by providing for the issue of "addict permits" on application by persons of this class. The word "addict" has unsavoury associations and there can be no objection to the use of a less pointed epithet such as "invalid" and "old age" permits. These two points are urged in the well-reasoned article by a much-respected Parsi friend, which we publish elsewhere. At a mass meeting in Cowasjee Jehangir Hall last Wednesday, some speakers criticised the Prohibition policy as an infringement of civil liberty. It certainly is that, if civil liberty means the liberty to beat one's wife, to starve one's children, to scamp one's work, to drive a car into the ditch or to dash of an article which one is ashamed to read in cold print. No civilised society can permit this kind of "civil liberty." Nor is there any point in the slogan about "minority rights" because the right here claimed is for the minority to sell drink to the majority which is debarred by the most sacred sanctions from touching and tasting liquor. The European Association sent a letter of encouragement to the meeting. This group is composed mostly of persons who have no interest in the country except of a business kind. It does not represent the mind and conscience of the British people. The Rev. J. F. Edwards who has been good enough to contribute the weighty article which we publish today, is far more truly representative of it. No British Government would presume to impose its veto on the adoption of the policy of Prohibition consecrated through centuries by the religious conscience of India, without incurring the deepest odium in the eyes of the whole world. The Parsi community has contributed much to the progress of the country and is entitled to the greatest consideration in all matters affecting its well-being. Its opposition to Prohibition is wholly out of keeping with its general attitude of benevolent philanthropy and would not, we are sure, have been countenanced by Dadabhai Naoroji, Pherozeshah Mehta and Dinshah Wacha.

Alcohol and Motor Accidents:—From time to time suggestions are made, some of them fantastic, all of them more or less costly, to avert motor accidents. High sounding slogans like "Safety First" are displayed in posters. The colour of road lamps is frequently changed. Islands are constructed at road junctions. When a driver is prosecuted for an accident, his guilt or innocence is often judged by whether or not he sounded his horn. On the other hand the blowing of the horn is denounced by some ultra-sensitive "expert" as a nuisance and a danger to public safety. In all this Babel of suggestions one most important cause of motor accidents is either wilfully or ignorantly overlooked. In a case which was decided some time back in Bombay, the Court admitted an alcohol test which would be regarded as utterly inadequate in other countries. We take the following from the Indian Witness:—

> In Berlin, the police, who are the authority for issuing driving licences, hand to every applicant for a driving licence a mauve card, entitled: "Alcohol Warning for Motor Drivers." This card contains ten cautionary paragraphs, commencing, "The responsible calling of the motor driver makes it necessary for him to abstain completely from all alcoholic beverages, both before and during work." Such value do the Berlin police attach to these warnings that a driver cannot receive his licence until he has signed a receipt for the card.

Mr. Harry Porter, Chief Municipal Magistrate of Evanston, Illinois, recently declared that ninety per cent or more of traffic accidents and injuries are traceable to the use of alcohol. He added:

> Our method of handling alcohol drivers must be strengthened and made more efficient at the earliest possible moment. Strangely enough, the really dangerous driver is not what we have heretofore humourously called the 'horizontal drunk.' The really dangerous driver is the man who has had a few drinks and is absolutely and thoroughly convinced of his own sobriety and of his unequalled driving perfection.

We are sure that not the least important effect of introducing Prohibition in Bombay will be a much greater reduction in traffic accidents than all the Safety First measures put together.

Freedom of the Press:— While we agree with the Home Minister of Bombay that the principle of freedom of the Press should not be allowed to cover incitements to commit ill-will, we nevertheless think that ordering the publisher of a newspaper to furnish a deposit is not the best way of dealing with its abuse. There is a special provision of the ordinary law for prosecuting writings and speeches calculated to promote communal hatred. There is no more reason why this provision should not be enforced than for not enforcing the law in cases of

CC-0. Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

theft or forgery. The effects of giving publicity, good or bad, are the same in both cases. We think that a public exposure in a Court of Justice of the wickedness of writings inimical to communal harmony, is likely to prove a greater deterrent than a hole and corner decision by the Minister to demand a deposit from a newspaper. Another objection to the deposit practice is that its incidence is unequal. It bears hardly on poor papers while a newspaper which can secure the backing of a wealthy individual or organisation, can snap its fingers at the Minister. He can confiscate the amount of one deposit but another will be found and another and another. There is a sneakishness about the deposit method which is offensive to one's sense of fairplay. The Minister is not infallible and with the best of motives he might be misled into doing injustice to honest criticism. If the rule against writings calculated to arouse communal ill-feeling, is to be applied strictly, there is hardly a comment on current politics in this country which can escape attention. Even the Indo-British Trade Agreement called up the communal obsession in the discussion on it in the Indian Legislative Assembly. The effect of demanding deposits is not less calculated to make martyrs of newspapers than having them prosecuted under the ordinary law in Courts of Justice. The previous Government which enacted the Emergencies law was not elected by the people and did not trust them to judge fairly in political matters. But the Bombay Government is the creature of a popular vote and surely it is illogical of it to under-rate the intelligence of its creators.

Theory and Practice :—When people borrow theories instead of evolving them from their own experience, they are apt to overlook the limitations and qualifications which attend their application in the land of their origin. One of the most commonplace of these in British Indian politics, is the separation of executive from judicial functions. This principle which is derived from the British constitution, is interpreted here in a sense far more absolute than is to be found in British practice. The Lord Chancellor is a member of the Cabinet, he is the head of the Judiciary and he is also the presiding officer when the House of Lords sits as a Court of Appeal. Judges are appointed on party lines whenever vacancies occur. If the Lord Chief Justice dies when Liberals are in office his successor is invariably a Liberal. The Home Department exercises considerable supervision over the county courts. With all this, it is true that there is considerable independence of the judicial from the executive administration in Great Britain. In France the principle has been interpreted to mean the complete freedom of the Executive from Judicial processes. There is no appeal from executive action to the Courts. This is exactly the opposite of what prevails in Great Britain and this is also the general Continental practice. In India we have likewise to adapt political theories to our requirements. It is interesting to watch the transmutation undergone by theories in actual practice. The Government of India Act is a curious mosaic of constitutional principles forced through the sieve of political expediency. The Indian National Congress organization is another. It passed a resolution at its last session that the President should exercise his right to choose his Cabinet under the direction of Gandhiji! This has been the practice for several years but Mr. Subhas Bose's contumacy has forced the Congress majority to have this anomaly enshrined in a resolution. To the student of political science, it is of surpassing interest to watch the processes by which fact breaks through appearances.

Sind Minister's Resignation:—It is announced that the two Hindu Ministers of the Sind Cabinet have resigned and that their resignations have been accepted. The action of these two gentlemen is due to pressure brought on them by the Hindu party on account of the failure of the Sind Government to suppress the Om Mandli to which reference has been made several times in The Reformer. Government have to follow the procedure laid down by the law and evidently they have not found anything to justify the use of any power that they may have to do so summarily, in the constitution or working of the Om Mandli. Bhai Lekhraj, the founder and Director of the Mandli, has been prosecuted before the courts. If the Om Mandli is, nevertheless, obnoxious to a section of Hindus in Sind, the community should under normal circumstances, have been able to bring moral pressure to bear on the inmates, their own near relatives, to quit attending the institution. The fact that they have to invoke the Executive Government to suppress the institution arbitrarily, reveals lack of moral influence as well as a total disregard for legal proprieties. Satyagraha has been put to many ridiculous uses but that of the opponents of Om Mandli surpasses them all.

Indore Maharaja's Marriage :—The Maharaja of Indore surprised the public this week by a grandiose proclamation, evidently copied in part from the abdication statement of the Duke of Windsor, announcing that he had married Miss M. Lawler in order to serve his people to the utmost of his power. "This I can only do," said His Highness, "if I enjoy sound health and domestic happiness. Therefore, I have married Miss Margaret Lawler the lady I love, so that we both may serve our people whole-heartedly and contribute towards the progress of our State." His Highness did not state when and where and under what law the marriage took place. But he thought it fit to mention that "the marriage will not affect the question of succession." In the case of the late Raja of Pudukotta the Government of India passed the gadi on to the Raja's brother in preference to his son by an Australian wife. The Maharaja of Indore's statement was superfluous unless it was meant to signify that this precedent will not apply to his successor.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER
BOMBAY, April 1, 1939.

SPAIN AND EUROPE.

One by one the strongholds of the Spanish Republican Government are surrendering to General Franco. On Tuesday, Madrid gave in after a heroic resistance of two and a half years. With the fall of Madrid, the Spanish War comes practically to an end. From the point of view of Spain itself, the only regret must be that the struggle for power was protracted. It is true that help from Fascist countries enabled General Franco to convert a military rising of no great strength into an effective revolution against the Republican Government. But at the same time, it is significant that in the three years of war the Republican Government changed internally from a democratic administration to a very nearly Communist State. Authoritarianism, therefore, was inevitable whichever side won. The penalisation of political opinion would have taken place on a large scale if the Republicans had won, as surely as it will take place now that General Franco is at the head of the Government. And in any case, the work of reconstruction and the leading back of the country into normality must occupy the greater part of the victor's energies. In such a task it is obvious that the greatest responsibility falls on General Franco and the leaders of his group. In spite of the anxiety of Britain, on the one hand, to resume her traditional role of friend and adviser to the Spanish Government, and the eagerness of Germany and Italy, on the other to lead General Franco's Government to independence from Britain and dependence on themselves, in Spain itself and among the General's own supporters, the final decision will depend on his ability to win the confidence of his people. In emergencies one is not particular about the friends that come to one's aid. But no man can govern a nation, and especially a nation like the Spaniards, in a perpetual emergency.

From an international point of view, however, the conclusion of the Spanish War in a complete victory for General Franco is an event which is bound to have widespread repercussions. The Italian and German "volunteers" who took part in the rebellion, are now released and, very likely with the removal of this distraction, the Fascist and Nazi dictators will press forward their campaigns in the rest of Europe with greater vigour. Then again, the addition of a third dictator to the troubles of Europe might well be too much for the democracies. The winning over of Spain to the Fascist cause is peculiarly ominous to France. Not only has France been reduced in Europe, after General Franco's success, to a position similar to that of Poland, menaced on all sides by Fascist powers, but in Africa, in addition to Signor Mussolini's demands for territory, General Franco's agents have accustomed the tribes of French Morocco to Spanish gold and promises. Now that the Republican forces on whom the entire attention of the Francoists were so far concentrated, have broken down, there is every reason to fear that in their inability to satisfy the Moors, Spanish agitators might instigate trouble in French colonies. These are new threats. The old ones are growing greater after the settlement of Spain. Germany is apparently preparing for the next step—in Poland, in Hungary, in Belgium. Which State will be the next to fall to Nazism depends on where the agitation grows fullest. The position of small States which distrust Germany and are unable to rely on France and Britain, is pitiable. Placed in this predicament, Lithuania, following one course, declares its determination to face the threat of extinction rather than give in to panic; Roumania following another gives Germany trade concessions and preferences. The attack on Belgium has began insidiously in radio appeals to the "German-speaking" people of Eupen and Malmedy, from the broadcasting station at Cologne. The German press and foreign office attacks on Poland have assumed simister proportions. Unfortunately Poland has not a liberal tradition in administration and it will take considerably less to persuade the world that minorities are persecuted in Poland than the German pretext found necessary in the case of Czechoslovakia. In other ways as well, notably in her relations with Soviet Russia, Poland is weaker than the Czechoslovak Republic was in facing German threats. If she has any advantage it must be in the realisation of Britain and France that the days of diplomacy, even of Mr. Chamberlain's diplomacy supported by armed strength, have gone.

Such a realisation had come about, when negotiations were opened with Soviet Russia and other countries. Unfortunately the failure of these negotiations—for obviously they have failed inasmuch as they have not resulted in the immediate declaration which the British Government had hoped to achieve—has engendered a defeatist outlook in the press of Britain and France. One has only to note the reactions to Signor Mussolini's provocative address to the twentieth anniversary rally of Fascists. The Italian leader who always speaks with more restraint than Herr Hitler, is pressing forward Italian demands in connection with Djibouti, Tunis and Suez, let fall some aphorisms on war and peace which were the reverse of reassuring. Signor Mussolini, while regarding "perpetual peace" as a catastrophe of civilization, expressed the view that Europe would be the better for an era of peace just now. Read with his later remark that the relations between State and State were relations of force, there is clear warning here that the Duce wants a short interval of preparation before launching out on his empire-building schemes. Yet with imperturbability, both French and British newspapers congratulate themselves on the Duce's moderation tion. The usual reasons for straining every nerve to represent an opponent's threats as friendly overtures are, either when one fears to provoke him into action or when one is anxious to win him over to one's side. There is a little of both in the attitude of the Anglo-French Governments and the press. But the repeated crises that are coming up in Europe, indicate that in spite of the best intentions on the one side of meeting all reasonable and many unreasonable demands, war is almost inevitable. The Spanish peace, itself hastened by the absence of a general war in Europe, has now added to the troubles of that harassed continent. The democracies are in a bad way. Herr Hitler has made it clear that peace can only be assured if the democratic states concede predominence in Europe just now, in the world later, to the Fascist powers. Spain has proved conclusively that the only chance of survival for democratic institutions in the event of war, is a quick victory. That they are unable to conceive of, let alone achieve.

WAR AND PACIFISM.

In his "Gita; a Critique" reviewed in the Reformer of the March", Mr. P. Narasimham writes:

The sentiments of Arjuna on this occasion appeal to the "modern" mind as the loftiest expression of the love of human peace and order. They can not be surpassed in their dignity and in their exaltation of non-violence and pacifism. It is from such a psychological attitude of Arjuna's that Sir Krishna has to extricate him and make him fight. One might reasonably question, after reading the whole Gita, if Sri Krishna ever answered the specific point raised by Arjuna. Can we say that the fight resulted in the restoration of dharma and of Lokasangraha, or in the people settling down to a peaceful life? Has any war in human history ever brought any people abiding peace? The most 'modern', that is, the most recent, mind is reflected in Signor Mussolini's address at the twentieth anniversary celebration of the Fascist triumph in Italy. The Duce observed:

Professional pacifists are particularly detestable individuals, the word "peace" is now a little worn by excessive use, and rings dubiously like a false coin; we consider perpetual peace as a catastrophe for civilisation.

Some years ago von Papen declared that the pangs of war are to men what the pangs of child birth are to women, the way of fulfilment. The 'modern' mind is more accurately reflected by the doctrine of Sri Krishna than by the scrupulosities of Arjuna. And it should not be forgotten that Sri Krishna does not proclaim like Fascist and Nazi ideologists that fighting and killing is the duty of all men. In another part of the Gita where the duties of the different vocations are described, "not running away from battle" is ordained as the special duty of a Kshatriya. Hindu thought entrenched in the metaphysical Absolute is dominated by the principle of relativity in viewing the world of phenomena. In as much as Gandhian philosophy runs counter to this and demands the same form of conduct from all men in all circumstances it is not reconcilable with Hindu notions. A pacifist has no call to join an army and march to the battle front. All sudden conversions are suspect. Arjuna was not actuated by the conviction of the futility of war. He did not like to kill his own kith and kin, to see the prospect of their families left destitute, because they were his. For the moment he completely forgets that he is fighting for a great cause. Just so, the British Premier argues that it is not worth while fighting for the freedom of a country and a people who were strangers and goes on piling up armaments to defend his country and its possessions if they are attacked. True, mankind has not renounced war after Kurukshetra any more than after the War to end War which set up the bitter Peace of Versailles. Neither the mission of Gautama Buddha nor the teachings of Jesus Christ have been more successful. "Nature red in tooth and claw" is still the goddess whom the nations worship in their relations with one another. It is a strange paradox that, although the Gita justified War, the Hindus are the most unwarlike people on the face of the earth, whereas among the nations which profess the religion of Jesus who forbade War, are to be found some of the most ferocious of the human species!

A PLEA FOR FAIRPLAY.

The Editor,
The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

It is not lightly that I take up a critical pen against your renowned and excellent paper. Yet I am constrained to do so this once, at all events.

I write for fairplay.

You venture to criticise Mr. C. F. Andrews in your issue of March 18th, under the heading "Mr. Andrews' Misconception." This criticism is of the book, "The Rise and Growth of the Congress."

Though you must be extremely well aware of it, you never once mention in your article the fact that book was written jointly by C. F. Andrews and Girija Mookerjee. In the Preface of that book are the words:—

"previous consultation, while we were both together in England, has made it a comparatively easy task to keep the book in every respect a joint volume."

This being so, any criticism of the book should surely be levelled at both its authors. You have surely not only slighted Mr. Girija Mookerjee, but also been very unfair to Mr. Andrews.

One further point I must raise. I cannot help but feel that sometimes you let your personal feelings, may be not unnaturally biassed sometimes, lead some of your statements a little from strict fairness. As an example, in this same paper under the note headed "Sequel to Munich" you have the words "The Powers.....are in danger of being involved in a war over an even smaller State than the old one which they thought was useless to defend."

Do you really think that the Powers thought like that? Or do you think that they thought that the best way to defend her was not to resort to arms?

When your thrusts hurt because of the truth in them we thank you. When they hurt because we feel there is some truth and fairness lacking, we much have our say.

Davangere,
Mysore State,
23rd March 1939.

Yours etc.,

H. ALEX CRUMP

We apologise to Mr. Girija Mookerjee for not mentioning his name as joint author of "The Rise and Growth of the Congress." That, however, does not absolve Mr. Andrews of his share of the responsibility for the disparaging remarks about the earlier nationalist leaders, and particularly for the very serious omission to note the important contribution made by Ranade and the National Social Conference. As regards Munich, the remark objected to by Mr. Crump was almost in the very words of the British Premier when he said that Czechoslovakia was a country of which they knew very little and that it must be a larger issue on which Britain would fight. We should scarcely have believed that anyone could seriously regard the Munich peace as the best way or any way of "defending" Czechoslovakia. The last few days have given the final verdict.—Ed., *I. PROHIBITION

PROHIBITION, EDUCATION AND ABSTINENCE.

(By the Rev. J. F. Edwards).

Ever since the passing of the 1919 Indian Reforms Act, the Bombay Government has been one of the most progressive and resourceful of India's Provincial Governments in relation to the whole question of Drink Reform. It must be regarded as one of the tragedies of modern Indian history that the magnificent Rationing Scheme introduced by Sir Chunilal Mehta was so sadly marred by the failure of his successors in the Excise portfolio to take their courage in both hands, and of the European members of the Bombay Government to smooth the path of Indian Prohibitionists. If Sir Chunilal could be persuaded to tell the 'inside' story of his battle for the 'Rationing' of country liquor whereby Bombay City was supplied with ten per cent less liquor every year and the Deccan with five per cent less annually, which led incidentally to a loss of nearly a crore of rupees in revenue, it would supply inspiration to many reformers in India, both Indian and non-Indian. Sir Chunilal's scheme was finely conceived and would have led the Bombay Presidency to complete Prohibition of alcoholic liquors by now, had its provisions been properly carried out by those who came after him.

There is, however, no use crying over spilt milk, and one vital question that should nowadays be considered by all who wish to help the Bombay Government is this: How can the Bombay Government best ensure the enduring success of its Prohibition Scheme? In the present article we make two constructive suggestions. The first is that the Bombay Government should organize a scheme whereby the young life of Western India may be educated regarding the evils of liquor, physically, mentally, morally. This means concentrating on the growing youth of India. If we may borrow a dynamic word from the Moderator of the United Free Church of Scotland in his 1938 New Year's Message: 'The new age on which we have entered has sprung upon us a menace to society with which our fathers were not called upon to contend. I refer to the colossal scale on which the brewers and distillers are advertising their goods...Beside the poster which advertises strong drink see to it that another is pasted to warn parents that danger and destruction lie that way.' Scotland, we are sure, will in no way object if in this connection we borrow from it another idea. The Education Department of the City of Glasgow has included the following in its syllabus: Systematic instruction in (a) Temperance, and (b) Morals and Manners, shall be given on one day per week from 9 to 9-45 a. m. After devotional exercises, the period shall be equally divided between the two subject. The syllabus on Moral and Manners is intended to co-ordinate and emphasise the teaching given, incidentally on those subjects in the course of the day's work, and should be based definitely on the Syllabus of Religious Instruction. The various chapters lead to very decisive announcements about the evils of alcohol such as contradict certain popular slogans regarding its use. Children over 12, for example, are taught that 'amongst the consequences of habitual drinking of such beverages are, the waste of one's money, the loss of self-respect, unfitness for work, cruelty, and even insanity.' Just as certainly as the absence of adequate education on these lines led to the temporary eclipse of American Prohibition, so certainly would an adequate scheme of education on this subject help to ensure permanence of Prohibition in India.

There is a type of Indian writer against whom our Indian students need to be warned. Here is a sample. In an article on 'Economics of Prohibition' in The Examiner, the able Roman Catholic Weekly of Bombay, on March 18, Professor A. Correa Fernandes described the Bombay Province as 'the richest, the most progressive, the most enterprising and the most self-sacrificing province in the whole of India.' Continuing, the Professor said: 'the total Excise revenue of the Bombay Government was about 3½ crores of rupees a year from this source. The total volume of the liquor trade must have been nearly two-and-a-half to three times as much; in other words, something like 7½ to 8½ crores of rupees will be probably transferred from other channels of more useful expenditure like better food or housing, or sanitation, education, amusement, etc. From a social point of view Bombay will definitely stand to gain as a result of the transference of expenditure from drink to the purchase of other services and goods. Thus the toning up, moral and economic, of a large section of the people addicted to the drink evil will more than counterbalance the direct loss of revenue to the State and the financial loss of the people engaged in the liquor traffic.' And yet after stating these astounding facts, we are asked to accept the following paradoxical conclusion: 'Nevertheless, these social and wider economic facts do not even from a strictly financial point of view justify what really amounts to a reduction of wealth and suppression of income by the State to a class of people, however limited, at almost a moment's notice.'

Another constructive suggestion we wish to make to ensure the success of the Bombay Government's Prohibition measures. This suggestion we take from a new Criminal Justice Bill now being hammered out in the British House of Commons, a Bill such as shall humanize prison life and introduce other far-reaching Prison Reforms. But a tragic thing happened on February 23 during the Committee stage when the Probation Pledge of Personal Abstinence which magistrates can apply in drink-caused or drunkenness offences, was deleted from the proposed Bill. The Government's new Bill had incorporated Section 2 of the Probation of Offenders Act of 1907 which provides that a recognisance (or bond by which a person promises a Court or a magistrate to observe some condition) might contain the condition of 'Abstention from intoxicating liquor where the offence was drunkenness or any offence committed under the influence of drink.' This section in Sir Samuel Hoare's new Criminal Justice Bill, the Committee deleted to the great sorrow of all those who desire drink reform. Behind that clause lay the following story: More than thirty years ago four young men used to meet at the Leicester Y. M. C. A. every Friday afternoon to discuss what they could do to advance the Temperance cause. Judge William Jefferson Pollard, of the United States, went to tell them of the success of his plan for reclaiming drunkards. They decided in July, 1906, that Judge Pollard's plan was worthy of adoption in this country. Five months later the Judge visited England, and thus described his plan when dealing with drunkenness offences:—'I allow a man to sign the pledge for one year, have him report to me, and if his face is indicative of drinking, or he shows any odour of liquor, I put the sentence into force. I say to him in the Court, using a common American expression, "It is up to you. You have the opportunity to work out your own salvation; will you do it? I will fine you fifty dollars and costs or four solid months' hard labour in prison, but you shan't pay one cent, or serve one minute, if you will sign the Temperance Pledge and keep it." That is my plan.' The four enthusiasts prevailed upon the Leicester Magistrates' Bench to try the new plan, and the first four cases proved very satisfactory. The magistrates, however, had no legal power to make abstinence a condition of the recognisance, and so they had to depend upon the willingness of the offender to make a promise to abstain while on probation. Even under such limited conditions the plan was applied in many places with success. The pledge provision was also ultimately incorporated in the Probation Act of 1907 after twelve months of hard, persistent, self-sacrificing labour. We have no doubt that sooner or later that probation pledge must be restored, for wherever it has been used it has been a great success. If the securing of such a Probation Pledge of Personal Abstinence could be made legal for every Magistrate's Court in India, we believe it would greatly help India's Prohibition Cause.

PARSIS AND PROHIBITION.

(By ZOROASTRIAN.)

The Prohibition policy of the Bombay Government seems to have aroused the wrath of a large section of the Parsi community. A crusade was sounded and the community summoned to a public meeting held under the auspices of the Trustees of the Parsi Panchayat, on the 29th March, to register its protest.

A protest of the kind raised on behalf, and in the name, of the whole community will naturally be taken to reflect the thoughts, sentiment and cultural outlook of the community in general and it will also have some repercussion on the self-respect and dignity of that community. It is, therefore, necessary that it should proceed on none but weighty and carefully-considered grounds and avoid all semblance of overstating the case.

The resolutions passed at the meeting and published in the local papers indicate the grounds on which the protest is based. They may be briefly summarised as follows:—

(1) Religious:—It is said that the religion of the Parsis enjoins drink in moderation: that the use of liquor in Parsi rituals is both customary and indispensable: and that, therefore, Prohibition will be an interference with the free observance of religious practice guaranteed to all communities.

(2) Stigma on Parsi character, for sobriety and moderation:—The distinction made between the Asiatics and non-Asiatics and the inclusion of the former alone within the prohibition while conceding greater freedom from restraint to the latter implies, it is urged, that the latter alone are capable of conducting themselves with requisite restraint and prudence in the matter of drink and not also the Parsis who are placed in the former group. This puts a slur on the Parsis' reputation for temperate habits.

(3) Interference with civil liberty:—Here the argument is that the Parsis have never been known to indulge in excess: that drink in moderation is not harmful: rather at proper times in proper quantity, it supplies a well needed stimulant to those accustomed to it all their life: depriving these of their habitual dose is an unwarrantable curtailment of civil liberty prized as a birthright by every citizen under a democratic form of Government.

(4) Economic harm: Parsi capital to the tune of a crore, it is said, is engaged in the trade: a large number of Parsis and their families are wholly dependent on the living they make from the business: but no thought is given to the ruin and hardship the measure will spell to them.

The question for thoughtful members of the community is: Are all these grounds valid? Could the community commit itself to all of them without suffering in its reputation for sobriety of thought? Take the religious ground which is put in the very forefront. Is it not palpably the weakest and the least convincing? To secure a doubtful support for the cause in hand does it not represent the sublime tenets of the Zoroastrian faith in an unfavourable and unworthy light? To any one reflecting on the fundamentals of the Zoroastrian creed with its ever-present emphasis on purity of body, mind and soul, it must be self-evident that it could not be a correct interpretation of its chaste doctrines to assert that it enjoins drink of alcoholic liquor, or looks down with disfavour on total abstinence or that complete abstention would be contrary to its true precepts.

By delving deep into ancient literature certain passages, about half a dozen in number, have been unearthed in which reference is made to the habit of drink as being common amongst the ancient Iranians as well as to the use of 'liquor' in their rituals. But from what that liquor was obtained and how far it was alcoholic is not made clear. The Haoma juice mentioned in the ancient scriptures and used in the rituals of the time, could hardly be alcoholic. For, it is stated to be a sweet drink and each time it was obtained fresh from a special variety of tree. Assuming, however, for argument's sake, that the liquor referred to in those old writings was spirituous, still, the use of it mentioned therein is only as a recital of historical fact not as a religious command binding on the conscience of the followers of the Zoroastrian faith. The utmost limit to which an argument based on these extracts could be carried is, therefore, that there is no religious ban against the use of liquor either as an article of consumption or as an ingredient of ceremonial rites. To go further and urge that these references amount to a positive command to drink would certainly be carrying the argument to untenable lengths.

The Vendidad being one of the oldest books in the Avastan language, naturally receives considerable attention. As the etymological meaning of the word would suggest, its main purpose is to prescribe a penal law against acts regarded as demoniacal. Most of its prescriptions would be entirely unacceptable to the advanced intelligence of the present day. But, as, at some place, it mentions wine to be a health-giving drink, without indicating what variety of wine it contemplated, that is enough for those striving to draw upon religion for enforcement of their argument to cite it against total abstention, conveniently forgetting that it is but the opinion of the writer on the food value of certain drinks. Would it be congruous in these days of advanced medical science to turn to the Vendidad for the health giving properties or otherwise of any drink? Would it be a logical deduction to infer from such a statement a religious sanction for drink?

A fairly large number of Parsis do practice total abstinence as a matter of principle. Could any one make bold to assert that in so doing they are contravening the precepts of the Zoroastrian religion? The Trustees of the Panchayat are men of light and leading. By the position they occupy, the promotion of moral as well as economical well-being of the community should be their concern. That being so, they might pause to put these questions to themselves: would they or would they not, as a matter of pure preference, desire the growing generations of Parsis to be brought up in the habit of total abstinence? What advice would they give to Parsi fathers in the home-training of their children so far as fostering a taste for alcoholic drink is concerned? Seeing that the economic condition of by far the large majority of Parsis is what it is, would they or would they not deem it conducive to the greater good that all expenditure on alcoholic drinks should be avoided for utilisation of the money so saved to better ends? Would they deliberately go out of their way to foster the idea in young, plastic minds that character formation need not begin with total abjuration of all intoxicants? Has not the vice of drunkenness, like all other vices, grown up with small indulgences? Bearing that in mind, would they advice our boys and girls that, if they had to make a choice between total abstinence and moderate drinking, they should declare their preference for the latter as being more in accord with their religion?

So much for religious support in favour of the moderate drinking habit. Turning to the use of liquor in rituals, the usage is certainly not universal. A good many families and particularly those with a theosophic bias have always excluded it from their ceremonies. At the same time it must be admitted that the custom is old and prevalent in a large number of families. But to affirm that it is indispensable and that an adequate substitute could not be found, say, in fruit juice, would be far from true. Most of the rituals owe their origin to the belief that the souls of the departed revisit their earthly haunts when properly invoked with offerings of food, etc. Upto a short while back country liquor distilled from Mowra flowers was used. Now, it is often replaced with foreign liquors. Either of this variety could not have been obtainable in ancient Iran. So, at least, the quality in use must have varied with change of place and time. If, therefore, in the larger interests of the country of our adoption, we are required to make one more change and substitute a purer drink in the form of fresh fruit juice, should that be characterised as an intolerable interference with religion, would that not be indulging in the language of exaggeration? To suggest that, in the opinion of the community in general, the religious merit of their rituals and with it the spiritual well-being of the performers would suffer by being deprived of the use of alcoholic liquor would be to put a stamp of inferiority on their standard of intelligence and broadmindedness as well as to invite discredit on the holy doctrines and eternal verities of their sublime religion. For, in these days, few could be found to subscribe to the belief that religiousness or righteousness depends on the scrupulous observance of ceremonial rites with all their traditional concomitants unimpaired.

If there was any dogma emphatically laid down by the unimpeachable ancient scriptures, that was concerning the religious duty to spread far and wide the holy faith by free conversions. When, however, occasions arose in India to apply that precept did not the Parsis, by an overwhelming majority, refuse to act on it and to take any outsider into the Zoroastrian fold because the environment of the country and circumstances of the time rendered, in their opinion, that course detrimental to blood purity and cultural traditions of the community?

Therefore, both for the credit of the intelligence of the community and sanctity of the virtuous doctrines of its religion, it is to be hoped that no undue emphasis would be laid on the religious ground.

Coming to the second ground of stigma, it proceeds on the assumption that the exclusion of non-Asiatics from the prohibition scheme is due to their temperate habits and, therefore, the inclusion of the Parsis must necessarily imply absence of such habits. But is there any warrant for such assumption in the opinion expressed opinions of the framers of the scheme? If the assumption is untrue the argument easily becomes fallacious. The exclusion of the non-Asiatics might as well be explained on the ground of their alien domicile. As the scheme is conceived with the sole object of helping the uplift of the Indians of humble classes by weaning them from the vice of drunkenness, for that reason alone, the non-Asiatics may have been regarded as outside the pale. True, amongst the Asiatics there would be some non-Indians too, such as Chinese, Japanese. But as they chiefly work and associate with the poor among Indians their exclusion may have, on that ground, been deemed impolitic. Surely, in a struggle of this kind, the Parsis would not have themselves differentiated from other Indians? That would in the long run not be to their interest. And they have always shown themselves patriotic enough to share the sacrifices deemed necessary for the benefit of the country as a whole. This ground of stigma would thus appear to be both strained and misconceived.

The third ground of invasion of civil liberty is obviously not peculiar to the Parsis alone. The number of moderate drinkers among the other Indian communities must be by far much larger and the Parsis are called on to bear no greater sacrifice than they. No organised society is possible without curtailment by law in many directions, of an individual's liberty to do as he likes. If a policy of total prohibition is necessary for the good of the country at large, could the Parsis avow themselves so unpatriotic as not to put up with the inconvenience incident thereto or so lacking in power of self-restraint as to be unable to part with the habit of drink? Even confirmed inebriates, smokers, tea-drinkers, etc., have not found it difficult to throw off a life-long habit when considerations of health have necessitated the step. Are members of the Parsi community incapable of exerting the requisite will power when circumstances make it necessary?

There are indeed some to whom age or infirmity may have made a moderate stimulant indispensable for maintaining physical strength. Perhaps owing to the generally weak stamina of the members of the Parsi community, their number is disproportionately large. A way, however, is left open for them through the provisions for medical certificate. Here the Parsis would be on a stronger ground in urging that that provision should be very liberally construed in favour of the Parsis both on account of their generally weak stamina and their life-long habit. They would be ill-serving the cause of these deserving persons if they alienate sympathy by adopting an obstinate attitude, putting forward futile grounds and using reckless language.

The last ground of economic hardship is the strongest, if not the only convincing, ground in the armoury of the Parsis. Of course, this ground is not entirely peculiar to the Parsis as it is shared by them with others engaged in the same business of liquor. But it affects the Parsis with so special a degree of hardship that they may justly claim to have their case considered in a class by itself. For, it is the Parsi capital that is chiefly, if not exclusively, invested in the trade and its figure is said to reach a crore. Also, the proportion of families wholly and solely dependent for their living on their earnings from the business in liquor or toddy is by far the largest amongst the Parsis. Further, being unaccustomed to any other work, even if such could be found in these days of slow depression and general unemployment, they would be unable to engage themselves in it and earn sufficient thereby to keep out starvation. The scheme, as conceived, would, at one fell swoop, with deafening suddenness, leave them beggared and starving. The Parsis as a community would, therefore, be perfectly within their rights in asking Government to give due consideration to this aspect of their policy. The benefits to the Indian masses from that policy are, at best, problematic. But even if they were more assured, still, that would not justify indifference to the distress and ruin it will inflict on so many Parsis. Of course, the community cannot go so far as to demand that, on account of the hardship referred to, the prohibition policy should be wholly given up. That would be making an absurd claim. But they can, at least, ask that the blow may be staged to fall gradually and that the Parsis thrown out of business may be given all necessary help to find out other suitable employments. Prof. Mahajani in the Assmbly had pleaded for spreading the scheme over a period of years. That would enable those now engaged in the trade to gradually adjust themselves to the changing circumstances. The idea is worth taking up. And the Parsis would be well-advised in formulating their request along that line. It is not only the sudden and sweeping character of the measure which nearly paralyses its victims by taking them unprepared but also the numbers involved that make the problem so very formidable for the Parsis. Nearly a third of the community already lives on doles or close to the starvation border. This measure would augment their ranks very considerably. And it could be nothing short of callousness on the part of Government to ignore this result of their policy as at present devised.

To avoid any possibility of misconception it may be added in conclusion that this writer is himself a Zoroastrian with an abiding faith in, and unbounded respect for, the sublime doctrines and sacred tenets of his religion, that he subscribes to no political ideology, leastways the Congress ideology, and that he is actuated in making the above observations by no other consideration than that affecting the good name of the Parsis for soundness of intelligence, propriety of views and enlightened patriotism. If a protest is to go forth in the name, and on behalf of the community as a whole, then, it should be in form and language such as would command respectful attention and not have the appearance of having been bolstered up with specious or strained arguments.

MEDICAL REASONS FOR ABSTINENCE

"Medical Reasons for Temperance and Abstinence" were presented by Dr. Haven Emerson, of the College of Physicians and Surgeons, Columbia University, who said:

"Until the latter quarter of the nineteenth century there was not an exact knowledge of the actions of alcohol on man which permitted the creation of a sound medical and public opinion as to its suitability as a beverage use by human beings.

"First among the facts of this new era of science was that alcohol is a depressant, narcotic drug and not a stimulant in any rational sense of the word. Next was the evidence that alcohol could not serve the purpose of the body-building or tissue foods, and that even as a fuel in the body for the property of energy development was of limited value because it cannot be stored or held until needed in the tissues as can true fuel foods such as those derived from starches and sugars.

"Again it was proved that even if alcohol taken with usual foods could develop that heat and energy in the body, there is always the toxic or poison effect which makes its use for food purposes strictly limited and decidedly undesirable.

"Further precise tests on human performance of a wide variety of occupations, sports and physical tests made it clear that the healthy individual is benefited in no way in any of the functions or structures of his body by the use of alcohol.

"Within the past twenty years elaborate tests of the effect of alcohol in amounts way below those accepted as socially permissible have proved that even in such small amounts as to be unnoticed by the drinker, the life-guarding nervous reflexes upon which we constantly rely for safety and protection against injury are delayed from 6 to 10 per cent.

"Lastly, in 1924 a study of alcohol and human efficiency disclosed the long-suspected evidence that every process of mind and body is deteriorated and becomes inferior in quantity, quality, endurance and precision after the use even of such beverages as the beer declared non-intoxicating and permitted by the congress during the period of federal prohibition.

"It is the evidence of the medical sciences which has created a powerful and growing public opinion against the use of alcohol. While it is true that some adults of vigorous physique, mature in mind and body and with sturdy character and well controlled emotions and impulses can use alcohol with their meals in what is called moderation without doing any apparent damage to themselves, their offspring or to their fellow beings, it is equally true that complete abstinence from alcohol is not only consistent with good health at all ages, but is indispensable for the young, irresponsible, reckless and unstable, and for those who are likely to be called upon in their work or way of life to carry serious or emergency responsibilities.

"Understanding of the facts about alcohol as it affects man is the necessary basis of private conduct and public policy. Such knowledge will make legislation either unnecessary or unopposed. Abstinence is the best personal contribution each of us can make to total and permanent discontinuance of the liquor trade."

THE GERMAN VIEW OF RACE.

(CONTRIBUTED.)

"Race" is a purely biological term and connotes the presence of a number of heritable physical and psychological features common to all its members. The term "nation," on the other hand, has a social and historical content and implies that its members are connected by a common language and civilisation, and by the possession of common historical traditions and ethical standards. There are instances in which both terms are identical, but they are of rare occurrence (e.g., Eskimoes and the extinct aboriginals of Tasmania). Linguistic frontiers are never racial frontiers, and it is always misleading when people speak or write about the Italian, Greek, Anglo-Saxon, Teutonic, Slavonic and similar "races."

The confusion of the two terms, however, is not restricted to laymen, but extends to experts on the subject as well. Most of the ethnological maps are liable to the same mistake inasmuch as the distinction they make between the different races is based on language characteristics. According to them, the greater part of the population of Europe belongs to three "races"—Slavonic, Romanic, and Teutonic. It is easy to see that these groups are by no means "racial" entities. Among the inhabitants of Normandy, for instances, (who, being Frenchmen, ought to belong to the Romanic "race"), numerous individuals are found who are tall, blond, and blue-eyed, so that—according to these biological traits—they ought to be classified among the Teutonic "race." Similar types are met with among the Slavonic Russians and the Mongolian Finns, and in many parts of Germany (not only in the Eastern provinces, but everywhere else also) there are numerous typical representatives of the Slavonic "race."

Dr. Gunther, an eminent ethnologist, has put forward a plausible hypothesis accounting for these facts. All the European nations, he maintains, are composed of practically the same racial elements, but the proportions in which these latter occur are different in each case. Individuals of pure racial stock are rare. The mixture of the racial elements can never lead to the development of a uniform race of mixed characteristics, as that would conflict with the laws of the science of heredity.

These laws are no other than those discovered by Grogor Mandel. It is true that, by cross-fertilising red and white flowers, pink flowers will be obtained in the first generation, but the second generation will contain only 50% of these, the remaining 50% being equally divided between pure white and pure red flowers. Other experiments have shown that, in cross-breeding two types differing in more than one racial feature (e. g., rough-haired dark animals and smooth-haired light-coloured animals), the various features are transmitted independently of one another. Thus, the result of such breeding can never be a new racial type, but only a mixture of the original racial features, and the concept of definite "national races" is scientifically untenable.

By making racial distinctions on the basis of complexion (as we do when we speak of 'white,' 'yellow,' 'black,' etc., races), undue prominence is given to a feature which alone is insufficient as a characteristic of race. There is, for instance, no such thing as a uniform white or European race. The nations of Europe can be divided into four different races, each of which has its own distinctive features. These are: the Nordic race, the Westic race, the Eastic race, and the Dinaric race. The main difference between them is connected with the shape of their skull, according to which the first two are described as dolichocephalic or long-headed and the other two as brachycephalic or short-headed.

The members of the Nordic and Dinaric races are distinguished from those of the Westic and Eastic races by their tall stature, but there are a great many other details in which the four races differ from one another. By drawing up classified lists containing the racial features as ascertained by by empiric means, such as the shape of the skull, size of the body, complexion, colour of the eyes, etc., and then entering the regional distribution of these features on a map showing where each of them predominates, we are able to arrive at certain general conclusions.

Such a map shows, for example, that in England at least the areas where tall persons predominate coincides with those inhabited by long-headed people of very fair complexion. If we draw a map of France on similar lines, we find that a fair-complexioned, tall and long-headed race in the North must be distinguished from a dark, short and likewise long-headed race in the South, and that dark and short-headed persons form a third race in addition to those two. Thus, the Northern French and the Southern French exhibit characteristics always considered typical of the Teutonic "race," although both groups belong to the Romanic "race."

The fact that the European nations are composed of these four races is of great importance, because without such racial kinship the unity of our Occidental civilisation would be unthinkable. For centuries past, however, this uniform racial blood has been penetrated by a foreign element—the Jews—who are themselves a mixture of Semites and Caucasians. As the psychological characteristics of race, like the physical ones, are transmitted in conformity with the laws of heredity, it follows that the Jews can never be anything but an alien element in this Occidental world.

It is a known fact that in the descendants of mixed marriages between Jews and non-Jews the Jewish racial features are always more pronounced than the non-Jewish ones, both physically and psychologically. Similar results have been observed in connection with the descendants of Europeans and members of the native races of tropical countries, e. g., negroes. The racial antagonism between the white and the coloured peoples has given rise to the concept of a "white" race, whilst the lack of such an antagonism between the members of the four European races as concerned, has never caused a special race problem to come to the fore. Where the racial basis is the same, the influences exerted by such nation-creating forces as a common history, language, and tradition were naturally bound to be stronger than those due to common descent. The great importance of the latter, however, is demonstrated by the alien influences emanating from the Jews.

'POLITICUS' AND TRAVANCORE.

(By K. Chandy.)

In the Indian Social Reformer of the 4th March 'Politicus' has given the rough details of a scheme of government for Indian States. In the issue of the same paper for 18th March, the Editor writes that 'Politicus' is an experienced administrator—he is apparently still in service as he prefers to be anonymous—and recommends the scheme.

Power politics is now in the ascendant, whether violent according to Hitler, or non-violent as in India. In both cases, standardisation is the objective. Dr. Pattabhi Sitaramaya wants the States to adopt the Congress ideology. At such time, it is very doubtfull whether the still small voice of reason would be heard at all. It is much better, however, to be optimistic than to despair. Hence this contribution.

"Politicus" has come to very much the same conclusions as had been formulated by me ten years ago and for much the same reasons. Besides communalism and the non-existence of two strong political parties anywhere in India, I had mentioned a third reason making party government unsuited for India, and this has since been stated by more than one expert. It is that the two parties ought to have much the same outlook on life, like Whigs and Tories and Conservatives and Liberals. If the ideology of one party is the antithesis of the other, for instance, Conservatives and Communists or extreme Socialists, Party government is impossible. I have also said that after the outbreak of the war and up to now there is no real Party government in England. It is quite possible to have Democratic government without Party government.

Sir C. P. Ramaswamy stated to interviewers at Calcutta that Travancore is fully ripe for responsible government, and has also made it clear that in his view the English model is unsuited for Travancore. The head of the Police Department said that Dewan has got some schemes ready, but these have not been published yet. What the country requires is peace so as to give a chance for economic development, provided, of course, that India would not be drawn into the vortex of a world war. Even then, it has to be said that peace within the country is essential, and there is no chance of it unless some compromise is effected between the Government and the people.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

May I humbly suggest that a representative committee should be appointed immediately charged with the duty of submitting a scheme suited to the tradition of Travancore?

Such a Committee ought to study with the care which it deserves the rough scheme published in your issue of the 4th March.

The following additions and modifications are also suggested.

Besides assuring the independence of the judiciary, there ought to be something of the nature of the Habeas Corpus Act and the free association of the people, and free expression of opinion should also be guaranteed. These are large demands after the life-work of a Masaryk was destroyed in the course of an afternoon, but I am hoping that sanity and respect for human personality would prevail yet in this distracted world of ours.

In order to avoid the corruption and waste of energy and of money—much of the latter goes to petrol monopolists outside Travancore—adult suffrage and indirect election might be adopted. The electors should have instructions to elect a certain number of representatives from each important community and interest, such as Labour, Planting and Commerce. The Chief Minister should always be an elected member. The ministry should have a member from each important community, and also to represent labour.

An enlightened ruler is not likely to demand the power of absolute veto as proposed by 'Politicus'. When he considers that a piece of legislation affects a particular community, culture or interest, he could insist that it should receive the consent of a majority of representatives of that section; he might suggest modification, and with or without modifications require that the legislation should have the consent of a two-thirds majority of all members; and he ought to dissolve the Assembly and ascertain again the wishes of the people. If the new Assembly again passes the same legislation with the same majority, it should be assented to so long as it was not vetoed on account of his reserve powers.

Similarly, while the Ministry should feel secure and should not be liable to have to meet frequent votes of censure, it should not be considered to be secure-sanct and must resign in a body if there is a vote of censure passed by an overwhelming majority, for instance, a three-fourth majority. These measures had all been suggested ten years ago and seem to be necessary now also.

Another very important matter which is neglected is that the purity of the elections should be ensured so that the Ministry in office not functioning at all during the inter-regnum of an election. In a State the powers of the Ministry will vest in the Maharajah during this period; and as a further necessary precaution every servant of the State should have a right of final appeal against certain specified punishments right up to the Maharajah and also to sue the Government in a court of law.

There are of course many other desirable points, which a committee, if appointed, will duly consider.

As this contribution refers only to reforms, I have omitted reference to other matters; but in order to avoid any possible misapprehension, it has to be added that for establishing peace, it is necessary that all political prisoners should be released and the civil disabilities resulting from incarceration should also be removed.

THE UNITED STATES AND EUROPE.*

Partly from an almost hysterical fear that has its origin in the emotional stress of the Czechoslovak crisis, and partly from deliberate propaganda to "put across" the Roosevelt arms appropriations, the United States is being stirred to a bellicosity that contributes nothing to peace. Those who are promoting this mood, from the President down to the newspaper scare-head writers, must bear a heavy responsibility for augmented economic unsteadiness in their own country and for increased perplexity abroad.

No one in his senses would deny that the European situation is serious, and that one or another of the recurring crises may precipitate a general war. But an extraordinary mass of misinformation, superficial judgment, and unscrupulous exaggeration is reaching the public and producing a picture of events which is conspicuously lacking in perspective.

Mr. Roosevelt's not unjustifiable resentment at totalitarian pressure politics has led him to make a series of pronunciamentos whose real meaning has been fully as obscure in Paris and London as in Rome and Berlin. The secret consternation with which his bellicosity has been received in Europe is not confined to those friendly to Fascism, like Chamberlain and Daladier, but has extended to many officials and observers who deplore the irresponsibility of these irritated, but unimplemented, threats—the very opposite of thoughtful or effective statesmanship.

It is no condonation of the tactics or aims of Hitler, Mussolini and Co. to insist, as the facts warrant, that their menacing power—whether in military, economic or political terms—is less than many proponents of a huge American arms programme would have us believe. Nor can there be any doubt that certain sections of the press are "selecting" the more melodramatic events to the exclusion of others. Any opposite selection, if it stood alone, would be propaganda too: but presented in the light of the current trend, it would supply a much-required corrective.

Why—for example—was there scarcely a ripple in the American press, in 1931, when a French-Italian crisis threatened peace as definitely as now? In the spring of that year, troops were being drilled by wholesale on both sides of the frontier, from Nice northward to the Alps of Savoy. Atop a grim mountain near Grenoble, huge new guns, veritable Big Berthas, were trained on the arrow of Italian soil which there points into France. In every gathering of the Balilla in Italy, as the editors of No Frontier News Service can testify from personal knowledge, France was being pictured as the enemy which must be subjugated by force of arms; Il Duce even printed a stamp containing a map of Italy which showed Corsica as an Italian possession! But there was no war.

No doubt some concessions will be wrested from the French by Mussolini of his nuisance value; but not because the Rome-Berlin axis can seriously threaten the Franco-British axis by military or economic conquest. Lacking most raw materials requisite for a protracted conflict; strong in defensive naval weapons but weak in offense, Italy can menace Franco-British control of the Mediterranean only by securing a foothold on the African continent precisely adjacent to the fortified island of Pantelleria, off Sicily, or by a permanent air base near the Balearics—hence the efforts of the French and British to aid Franco and wean his loyalty away from the Italians, who are cordially hated by all elements in Spain.

General Jean Dufieu, former Chief of the Superior War School, Inspector-General of Infantry, has given to the British periodical, "News Review," a striking summary of the views of the French General Staff. In astonishing contrast to the lugubrious defeatism of army chiefs at the time of Munich—which lends credence to the contention that these were "rigged" —General Dufieu asserts that the reserve stores assuredly laid away in Germany could not suffice for war; that the vaunted Siegfried Line was slapped together too hurriedly to be invulnerable; that the German air force is chiefly a factor to harass, not to conquer. Reports in Berlin show that shortage of raw materials has resulted in an industrial slowdown in many important lines; steel production is only five-sevenths of that required.

Extensive cancellations of train schedules on February 3 were only the outward sign of a widespread breakdown. Locomotives are 4,000 short. Freight cars are 100,000 short, the number having dropped 70,000 in the last nine years. Yet workers on the roads often labour sixteen hours per day.

French complacency over the menace to the Mediterranean by Franco's and Mussolini's proximity to Gibraltar may be in part explained by the development of plans for the enlargement of the Midi canal into a deep waterway, capable of carrying the largest vassels, from Bordeaux on the Atlantic to the French Mediterranean coast, cutting the time to Marseilles from five to two and a half days.

On the other hand, French stiffening toward Italy's Tunisian demands has perhaps been somewhat due to the discovery that the reservoir of French manpower, in Africa, has been tapped by Franco. For it has been revealed by Frank Mellor, a British writer sympathetic to Rebel Spain, that the unexplainable numbers of Moors—a puzzle to many an observer—have poured by thousands across from the Berber tribes in French Morocco to Spanish Morocco in response to bribes from Franco's financial agents. This was confirmed by the Rebel High commissioner in Spanish Morocco.

In the meantime, Hitler is now trying to get the Czechs to negotiate a customs union with the Sudeten Germans. Reason? The Sudeten area requires more foodstuffs than it can produce; Germany, short itself, must buy these abroad at great cost and economic inconvenience!

Nothing is more essential to our war machine than oil. Is the oil industry aroused to an expectation of huge emergency orders? The "Oil and Gas Journal" for January 19, 1939, after asserting that close estimates of petroleum requirements are not easy to obtain, does assert that "officers agree, however, that needs will not jump appreciably during 1939 and not spectacularly in 1940 unless there is a war, or unforeseen contingency requiring much greater manouvering than is now contemplated."

Not one such fact, nor all of them, indicate that everything is safe in Europe. But they are taken into account by informed Europeans, who are united in feeling that, while they would be glad of Uncle Sam's support in a dire emergency, feel nothing but uneasiness when their own tensions are increased by a war mood over here—a mood they believe to be engendered actually less to strengthen democracy than to hush any effective opposition to the Administration's grandiose schemes for non-defensive armament.

THE IONA COMMUNITY.

The first number of The Coracle, the bulletin of the recently formed "Iona Community," contains interesting material on the aims and progress of this body.

On the initiative of the Rev. George F. MacLeod, D. D., of the Church of Scotland, the Iona community was formed, as an experience in co-operative Christian living, in the summer of 1938, when permission was obtained for the erection of a log hut settlement, capable of accommodating twenty young men, in the grounds of Iona Abbey. The purpose of this venture was to foster, and try to pass on, a greater sense of the collective spirit, to do something to help break down "man's unbridled inability to share" and the conviction that "whether communism, fascism or Christianity is to be the next immediate world order.....the next stage in man's development is going to be more collective, than the things we know."

The twenty pioneer members of the community, chosen from among a large and varied body of volunteers, included clergymen, divinity students, an architect, a doctor, a cook, a secretary and several artisans. Four members of the community went on ahead in the middle of June, accompanied by two skilled workmen, and erected the hut in three weeks. The rest of the community followed, the hut was blessed, and the community settled down to live a communal life of worship, manual labour and mental intercourse. "Only the spirit," writes one of its members, "could so quickly have welded us into fellowship. Never had more diverse characters, with more diverse backgrounds, been brought into such close proximity for so shadowy a purpose...Groups inevitably formed, but never assumed the danger of cliques. Opposites met...And time and again we were reminded that artisans are better men than persons—not just at their jobs but at piercing through to instinct to those real issues which mental acrobats so often utterly confuse."

For more reasons than one a better site could not have been chosen for this experiment in the collective spirit, for on Iona you cannot escape your brother. There are no 'distractions' in the shape of cinema, or 'pub,' or neighbouring town; the highest hill may be climbed in half an hour, the whole island easily covered on foot, and the Sound can be so rough that for days on end it may be impossible to land or leave. But, of much greater significance, is not Iona historically the retreat from which a great missionary sent his brotherhood forth into the world, rather than the monastery in which he restricted them to a contemplative life? St. Columba set out from Iona to convert Scotland. And to-day, with vast masses of the population of Scotland on the move to new areas which are for the most part churchless, the Church of Scotland is seeking to fulfil its responsibility by training men who will share in the life and work of these growing areas.

It is hoped that each year some twenty students who have completed their course and are licensed will pledge themselves to the community for two years, spend the months of the first summer at Iona, where it is hoped to develop the settlement further, and go out in the following October, two by two, to work in the areas where the Church needs them most. Each member of the community will receive no more than £50 a year, together with his keep and expenses.

THE TRADITIONAL HOME OF THE SANDALWOOD TREE.

It is in perfumery that the greater proportion of Sandalwood Oil is employed at the present day and to discriminating buyers, such as perfumers and soap manufacturers must of necessity be, it is hardly necessary to extol the virtues of the East Indian Oil which is without equal, both as a fine perfume base and a fixative for the increasingly popular bouquets of the Oriental type. In addition it is now being used extensively, and with marked success, in the creation of some of the more delicate perfumes in which the Sandalwood odour is not required as a predominant character.

A few trials will convince the perfumer who has not taken full advantage of the odour-value of this oil, that is of the greatest use to him, not only for predominant Sandalwood odour where required, but also a modifier and a fixative for other odours. This is true for liquid perfumes, soaps, creams, powders and all other cosmetic preparations. It will be found invaluable to those up-to-date perfumers who pride themselves on their own "creations."

NOTES.

President and Fuehrer:— We publish elsewhere a friendly but vigorous remonstrance from Professor James B. Pratt, the distinguished American Orientalist, against our criticism of President Roosevelt's denunciation of the European dictators, Herr Hitler and Signor Mussolini. The passage to which Professor Pratt objects was as follows:

> The United States has been all along declaring that she will not entangle herself again in European quarrels. But suddenly and without any obvious context, the Minister of the Interior and the President himself publicly denounce the heads of Germany and Italy in language which no responsible European statesman would indulge in even under grave provocation. Nothing better illustrates the inferiority complex from which, Dr. Fisher said, Americans suffer in their relations with Europe.

We had published in the Reformer of January 7 excerpts from a sermon—his last—which Dr. J. B. Fisher had delivered to his congregation at Detroit. In it he had pointed out that Americans had not still got out of their colonial mentality. Professor Pratt thinks that the President's action should be attributed rather to a superiority complex. It is much the same. Only, the man who in a controversy loses his temper and indulges in strong epithets which he has neither the means nor the intention of implementing, puts himself at a disadvantage with his adversary who has the power, even if he may not think it expedient to use it, to take his own course unmindful of your diatribes. Epithets only aggravate pre-existing tensions. Spoken from the head of one great Power to that of another, they are to be deprecated as endangering the peace of the world. They can be justified only if they had the contrary effect. Herr Hitler's adventures last week do not show that he had been frightened by the President's tirades. On the contrary, one can not help fearing that they might have exasperated him into acts more daring than he would have otherwise contemplated. We might, we admit, be subconsciously under the influence of the thought that, while the United States profited enormously by the War, Germany was reduced by it to incredible depths of depression from which she has been redeemed by the superhuman efforts of the Fuehrer. We do feel that the United States has no right in this matter to ride the high moral horse after the way in which she repudiated her obligations for the reconstruction of the European system which she had helped to destroy by her self-centred policy. The moral responsibility for the European dictatorships lies heavily on American shoulders.

To What End?:— The latest news available do not show that the bulk of American opinion is at the back of the President's denunciations of the Dictators when it comes to a question of implementing them by action. Strange to say, the defiant movements of Herr Hitler last week have had the effect of diminishing and toning down American attacks on him and his policy. Mr. Sumner Welles declared, it is true, on March 17, that the acts of wanton lawlessness of the Fuehrer were threatening world peace and modern civilisation. The exact interpretation to be placed upon this was indicated in a later message to the effect that American assistance in meeting the danger would be confined to economic and moral measures. In other words, the States will freely sell armaments to those who pay for it and take them away on the "cash and carry" principle. On this point, Mr. Devere Allen's statement that the German air fleet was largely built in the United States, is noteworthy. The news that a provisional Czechoslovak Government was being formed in the States under Dr. Benes, was promptly contradicted by the late President himself. As regards the European reaction to the Presidential fulminations, a message from Washington says that none of the European nations has communicated with the American Government in connection with the negotiations to form a democratic bloc against the Rome-Berlin axis. The writer on American affairs in the current Round Table adopts a slightly acid tone towards the President's declarations. In the course of an article headed "Guns, Butter and Gospel" he writes: "He (the President) is the aggressive world leader of the democracies, although somewhat removed from the firing line. He is, so to speak, the leader of the cheering section." The writer winds up: "The principal forecast of experienced national observers is that, while this policy may or may not be a vital contribution to world peace—that is another matter—it may well elect Mr. Roosevelt to a third term next year." We can not help thinking that the President by adopting a less truculent tone towards the Dictators might have better influenced their policy in the interests of peace.

Judges and Politics :—In the course of our comments on the end of Gandhiji's fast at the intervention of the Viceroy, we expressed a doubt as to the necessity of invoking the services of the Chief Justice of India for interpreting a notification and a letter of the Thakore Sahib of Rajkot. It was like using a steam hammer to crack a monkey nut. Further reflection leads us to question the propriety of utilising the highest judicial functionary in the country to unravel a political tangle. Sir Maurice Gwyer in his public speeches has more than once referred to the Supreme Court of the United States as the closest analogy to the Supreme Federal Court of India. We can not recall a single instance of the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court having been requested by the President of the United States to interpret extra-judicially an agreement between the Governor of one of the States and the leader of a political party. Even if such a request was made, we doubt if the Chief Justice would feel free to comply with it. Having regard to the important functions of the Supreme Court, it is absolutely essential that the judges should stand completely clear of politics. In this case, the position is rendered the more delicate by the fact that, according to the statement made (March 6) by the Under-Secretrary of State for India in the House of Commons, the Crown Representative (Lord Linlithgow himself) did not consider that a case had been made out to the contrary of the Thakore Sahib's denial that he had broken any undertaking as to the appointment of a Reforms Committee.

Bombay Riots Committee's Report:— The undesirability of requisitioning High Court Judges for conducting enquiries outside their judicial functions, was unpleasantly brought out in the discussion, in the Bombay Legislative Assembly last week, on the Report of the Committee appointed by the Bombay Government to enquire into the Police firing on the crowd during the Labour disturbances some months ago. The Chairman of the Committee was a senior Judge of the Bombay High Court. Mr. Jamnadas Mehta, who led the opposition, questioned the impartiality of the Committee on the ground that the Chairman was the son-in-law of a millowner. Sons-in-law, as a rule, have no great admiration for the fathers of their wives and are seldom inspired by the desire to advance their interests. Mr. Jamnadas Mehta is too shrewd a man of the world not to be aware of the common experience. It was merely a debating point and we are sure that he himself attached very little importance to it. But all the same it is undesirable that Judges of the highest Court in the Presidency should be brought into controversial debate in the Legislature. If the Home Minister had acceded to the request, not unreasonable in the circumstances, of Dr. Ambedkar to prosecute him on the finding of the Committee that he was cognisant of the causes of the disturbances, instead of declining to do so on the feeble ground that he did not want to make a martyr of the leader of the Independent Labout Party, a situation of much embarrassment would have been caused owing to a Judge of the High Court having been a party to the finding. The Bombay Government have been rather lavish in their calls on the High Court. Apart from the principle, the inconvenience to the High Court Bench and to litigants by the withdrawal of judges from their legitimate functions should be considered, particularly as the Bombay High Court has been chronically under-manned.

Kenya Highlands :—We publish in another column the text of the Order-in-Council relating to the disposition of what are known as the Highlands in Kenya. Orders-in-Council are passed by the Crown under authority delegated to it by a statute and have all the force of law. The attempt to differentiate it from statute law is of no practical consequence. The Kenya Highlands are reserved for Europeans by administrative practice for over thirty years. The residential areas or townships in the Highlands, are not so reserved and, therefore, the policy is not one of racial segregation as is sought to be enforced in South Africa. The reservation is confined to agricultural lands. The policy is one of racial discrimination. Even so, it is a departure from the principle of racial equality which is indissolubly associated with the British Crown. Indians protested at the time when this was introduced but acquiesced in it because Indians were not attracted to agriculture in Kenya. For several years past the European Settlers have been straining every nerve to consolidate their position and impose themselves as the ruling race in Kenya. Among the measures urged for the purpose was the legalising of the practice followed in regard to the Highlands. The idea of doing so by an Order-in-Council has been in the air for over three years. This has now been passed. The pretence that the order only covers the existing practice is untenable since the Highlands are placed definitely under the control of a European Board to which the Kenya Government must look for direction. The next inevitable step is the conversion of Kenya into a Dominion under the White Settlers like South Africa. The Government of India in their communique declare that they have exhausted all constitutional ways open to them. If we are to take this literally, it amounts to a suggestion that unconstitutional or extra-constitutional methods only have now a chance of being regarded by the British Government. There is already talk of a boycott of British goods as the one means which can not fail to bring the Indian protest home to British authorities. We agree with our contributor,

Mr. P. A. Mehta, who was a member of the Kenya Indian deputation which visited this country last year, that the question to be agitated now is not the Order-in-Council, a minor affair but the principle of discrimination in favour of Europeans, even European aliens, inaugurated by the old administrative practice.

Indo-British Trade Agreement :— After protracted negotiations an Indo-British Trade Agreement was signed this week. It will be some time before full implications of the arrangement will be known. Meanwhile, it is not amiss to point out that a Trade Agreement between India and Great Britain is on a different plane from one between Great Britain and the United States or even between Great Britain and Canada. The difference arises from the fact that apart from trade, India is a large contributor to British economic life. Thousands of Britons are employed by India, many on salaries which are unobtainable elsewhere. Lord Birkenhead was candid enough to acknowledge that India in this way lightened the burden of unemployment in Great Britain. It has been calculated that, five shillings in the pound of the income of every Briton comes directly or indirectly from India. Any preferences that India may be giving to British imports, therefore, are a contribution in addition to her contributions on account of her political subjection. America and Canada contribute nothing except what is provided for in their trade agreements whereas India's contribution is over and above the large sums paid on account of "invisible imports."

Parsis and Prohibition :—When in the Civil Disobedience movement of 1930 liquor sales rapidly dwindled as the result of picketing of the shops, the late Mr. G. K. Nariman raised the cry that the loss of the liquor trade was calculated to ruin the Parsi community by depriving it of one of its principal sources of livelihood. Neither he, a recognised Avesta scholar, nor any one else, maintained that the use of alcohol was a religious ordinance of the Zoroastrian faith. This view was first advanced in the Bombay Municipal Corporation the other day by Sir Byramjee Jeejeebhoy and it has since gained ground rapidly among members of the community. Except one or two bold spirits, no Parsi has come forward to question the declaration. On the other hand, it has received the imprimatur of an eminent scholar, and highly respected Parsi leaders, Mr. M. P. Khareghat who is President of the Parsi Panchayat, the principal organisation of the community. His testimony that the Parsis here for long observed the practice of offering wine as a religious ritual necessarily carries great weight. Mr. Khareghat does not say whether it is a practice which should be continued in the interests of the community or may be discarded without injury to its religious stability. The white kerchief with which Parsi women used to cover their heads, was regarded as a religious necessity thirty years ago but it is no longer regarded in the same light. Thirty years ago no Parsi could be seen smoking : it was considered an act of sacrilege. Today the sight of a Parsi publicly smoking, excites no comment either from his co-religionists or others. Is the practice of using liquor a more indispensable element of the Zoroastrian religion? This, of course, is a question for Parsi leaders to consider. Whatever might have been the case in the past, in our opinion, Prohibition will in these days be a distinct advantage to the Parsis as to others, from the economic as well as the health point of view—rather more to Parsis than to others as they are a small community two-thirds of which live in the depressing surroundings of Bombay City. If, nevertheless, the leaders of the community insist on the use of alcohol as a religious obligation, Government should, we think, extend to them the same facilities as to Roman Catholics and under the same conditions. This, of course, will not affect the Prohibition policy as regards trading in liquor. There can be no religious obligation on Parsis to sell liquor to those who are forbidden by their religions to drink it.

In Praise of Wine :—Mr. Kharegat quotes some verses from the Parsi scriptures in praise of wine. Similar passages occur in the Vedas also. What the ancients meant by wine, whether they correctly understood the nature of its effects on mind and body, we do not know. The Madras Prime Minister has declared that what in the Christian Bible was called wine was only grape juice. This view is supported by the warning in the same scriptures against being among wine-bibbers. The references in the Vedas and in the Parsi scriptures—there are close affinities between them—likewise probably refer to fruit juice of different kinds. Or they may have a spiritual significance. In any case, the fact remains that the Hindus, notwithstanding the encomiums on wine in the Vedas, found it necessary to denounce its use as a cardinal sin. No one would think of opposing Prohibition today on the authority of the Vedic hymns. As we observed the other day with reference to the Gita, the precepts of the sacred books should be taken as the starting point and not as the last word in our knowledge of any subject.

Central European Affairs :—On Friday morning news came through that an economic agreement has been concluded between Germany and Roumania, by which German expert advice is made available to Roumania for the economic development (and control) of that country. Mr. Chamberlain in the House of Commons on Thursday, took up the attitude that Britain was not opposed to Germany's trade expansion but strongly objected to coercion on independent States to yield up their independence. The anti-Fascist "front", therefore, has a limited objective and Germany's attitude towards Slovakia which is revealed to be the "protection" of its political independence and territorial integrity, shows that Nazi Germany for the moment has no intention of carrying the Czechei methods farther. Meanwhile, incursions by Hungarian troops into the German-protected Slovak territory have introduced a new factor in Central European politics.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER
BOMBAY, March 25, 1939.

THE CRISIS IN EUROPE.

The Munich negotiations were concluded on October 1, 1938, leaving points of dispute to be settled by an "International" Commission sitting in Berlin. President Benes on October 5, announced his decision to resign the Presidentship of the rump Republic after he saw that the Commission was supported by France and Britain in working out "self-determination" on census figures of 1910. Mr. Duff-Cooper had resigned two days earlier from the National Government in Britain as a protest against a policy of allowing one great Power "in disregard of treaty obligations, of the laws of nations and the decrees of morality to dominate by brutal force the Continent of Europe." Exactly a month after Munich, the British Prime Minister, Mr. Neville Chamberlain, openly declared in the House of Commons that "geographically Germany must occupy the predominating position in relation to the States of Central and South-eastern Europe. I do not see any reason why we should expect a fundamental change to take place in these regions." The meaning of this was plain to the world. It was a definite warning to the countries of these regions to make their best terms with Germany without looking for support to Britain. It was an encouragement to Herr Hitler in South-East Europe. True Mr. Chamberlain did emphasise that Britain had certain trade interests there and would maintain those interests. But, "in that respect," he argued, "we shall have the good will of the countries themselves because although it is true that their international markets will be found chiefly in Germany, nevertheless they can as a rule only obtain payment from Germany either in the form of goods, by barter arrangements or by blocked marks." The Premier's attitude on the question of South-eastern Europe was strikingly akin to that of some German visitors to India who conceived the future of this country as one of political dependence on Britain and of partial economic exploitation by German industrialists. Their vision did not appeal to Britons. Neither did the Chamberlain scheme evoke enthusiasm in Germany's leaders. Herr Hitler set about remedying the situation. The German economic mission to South-east Europe consolidated Germany's predominating position in the countries there. Politically, Herr Hitler, seizing a favourable opportunity, took the first open step when he annexed Bohemia and Moravia and later Slovakia to the German Reich last week. In doing so he roused a storm of protest in the "democratic" states which appears entirely disproportionate to the action itself.

Mr. Neville Chamberlain has made two important pronouncements on the situation expressing his bitter disappointment at the turn of events. The first of these was in the House of Commons on March 15. The second was at the annual meeting of the Birmingham Unionist Association on March 17. In the Commons Mr. Chamberlain announced that, as the British Government had failed in achieving a guarantee of agreement with other Munich powers, he did not regard the guarantee obligations to Czechoslovakia as binding on the British Government. This was an unnecessary explanation. As early as November 1, the British Premier had cleared up the misunderstanding created by an earlier statement of Sir Thomas Inskip, a leading member of the Ministry, to the effect that "His Majesty's Government felt a moral obligation to Czechoslovakia to treat the guarantee as already in force." Mr. Chamberlain, on the contrary, said that Britain had never given a frontier guarantee but simply a guarantee against unprovoked aggression. That, he urged, "was quite a different thing." Obviously it does not cover the present case, of annexation with the consent of the head of the Czecho-Slovak State. Mr. Chamberlain, therefore, needlessly excused himself for inaction in the present crisis. The rest of Mr. Chamberlain's speech that day was devoted to clearing any charge of complicity in the annexation. Even this was superfluous. It is true that with a single exception every circumstance in the case seems to indicate pre-knowledge of the events or exceeding simplemindedness in the British Premier; and people are reluctant to attribute simplemindedness to one who guides the destiny of a great Empire. But the exception is decisive. We do not think Mr. Chamberlain would have permitted six millions and more out of the ten million pounds loan to go to Prague if he had the least inkling that Herr Hitler would get his hands to them. In his Birmingham speech, there was no protestation of innocence on this point but doubtless the unusual vehemence of his utterance was inspired by the necessity of meeting this suspicion. The most notable point of the speech was Mr. Chamberlain's staunch refusal to appreciate the fact that the present crisis is the more than logical outcome of Munich. The Premier went on to say that all of "us" were asking if this was the end of an old adventure or the beginning of a new one. It is perhaps consoling for one who will not fight except where Britain's interests are involved, to look upon every aggression on the Continent of Europe as the end of an "old" adventure. It is doubtless necessary for a Premier who has bungled a crisis, to regard the chaos that has grown out of it as an entirely new problem; otherwise Mr. Chamberlain must necessarily resign. But to those who bring a dispassionate mind to the question, it appears clear that the annexation of Bohemia-Moravia is but an incident in Nazi policy, no more outrageous than a host of others. In a speech in the House of Lords, Lord Halifax, the Foreign Secretary explained how Herr Hitler's latest exploit could be regarded as a "new adventure." Few observers, however, will agree with him when he characterises as new the policy of using the internal troubles of a State to advance the imperialist ambitions of a foreign power. The method is an ancient one. It is a corollary of the old maxim, "divide and rule." Before the Nazis, it was used in Arabia against the Turks; in Central Europe against the Austro-Hungarian Empire. It has been the first weapon, perfected almost beyond recognition, in the Fascist-Nazi armoury. Signor Mussolini employed it in Albania, in Yugoslavia, in Hungary, in Austria, in Abyssinia and in Spain. Herr Hitler pressed it into service in Austria, in Spain and in Czechoslovakia. He is still using it in Memel, in Hungary and in Roumania. It is not easy to see with what conscience Lord Halifax can exclaim against it now when his Government had acquiesced in it hitherto. But the reason for the change in the British policy is to be found in the importance attached by the British Premier to economic interests.

Britain has not lost much in the losses that have occurred so far. The next step of Nazi Germany is different. Herr Hitler is pressing on Roumania for economic concessions which will impose on Roumanians a subordinate position. Roumania is asked, as a return for political independence to transform herself into a purely agricultural country, and to sell her wheat and her oil solely to Germany. Yugoslavia is already within the Nazi economic framework. In Bulgaria 58 per cent of her total exports are to Germany and 52 per cent of her imports come from the Reich. Germany's share in Turkey's trade is 51 per cent. The Economist's "Commercial History of 1938" issued on February 18, further remarks that Hungary and, to a greater degree, Italy are trading increasingly with Germany today. In Roumania particularly, British trade has a footing, taking as Britain does a third of Roumania's wheat. Mr. Stoyan Pribhichevich in a Foreign Policy Report on "The Nazi Drive to The East," sums up the position tersely:

> German ambitions in Roumania conflict with important British interests. One-third of Roumania's oil resources are owned by British companies, and Britain buys altogether two million pounds' worth of oil from Roumania. Britain already buys much timber there, and is now increasing its wheat purchases; a new clearing agreement is also being negotiated to finance Roumanian purchases of more British goods. The threat to Roumania's right to sell where she pleases, is strongly resented in Britain. The cause of the dispute is obvious but the issue is scarcely an inspiring one.

AN ANTI-FASCIST FRONT.

The annexation of Bohemia-Moravia-Slovakia by Germany—the Hungarian seizure of Ruthenia seems to have passed unnoticed—and even before Germany's threat to Roumania have revived the principle of collective security which the British and French Governments deliberately set aside at Munich. In their extremity the British Government have approached Soviet Russia with a view to considering the possibilities of "encircling" the Nazi-Fascist powers in what is made out to be a defensive alliance. The method proposed by Britain is that of a joint statement of solidarity between principally Russia, Britain and France, to which it is hoped the South-Eastern States of Europe and Poland will lend their support. Efforts are being made to represent this stand as a struggle for democracy but a glance at the possible "allies" should convince any one that the alliance would be very different. Chief among the anti-Fascist forces will be Soviet Russia whose friendship is all the more assiduously wooed now because it was slighted at Munich. Russia is a scarcely masked totalitarian State, differing only in its declared aims from Nazi Germany and Fascist Italy. There are France and Britain, both imperialist democracies confronted with many internal problems today. And lastly, the Balkan States, if they join the others, range from monarchic despotism to military dictatorship.

If these three groups are to find a common ground it can only be on an anti-Fascist line-up. As this has been a Russian ambition ever since the rise of Fascism in Europe, the very fact of such a union will mean a tremendous triumph for Soviet diplomacy. There is much more implied in the proposed alliance. In the past Britain has been definitely opposed to Communist propaganda while it looked on Fascist preaching with a friendly eye. Can it be persuaded to change this attitude at the eleventh hour? It is absurd to imagine, as some political leaders seem to do, that Russia can be induced to withhold propaganda while the European tangle is straightened out. If Britain is in a dilemma, the position of the Balkan rulers is even more difficult. Most of them are in power today through ruthless suppression of their peoples; they have, all of them, more in common with the ideology of Fascism than they can hope to have with the democracies. It is not surprising, therefore, that their offers of support are qualified by many reservations. Poland has, with all her fears of attack from Germany, shown herself extremely reluctant to commit herself to any definite policy. Roumania, even while she is considering the benefits of joining Britain and France, is negotiating a trade agreement with Germany. Hungary owes all she has today to Signor Mussolini's championing of her cause and more recently to Herr Hitler's support in the matter of Ruthenia. It is obvious in the face of all these problems that Russia should insist on a conference between the main parties to a future alliance, before pledging her support and the immediate danger of Herr Hitler acting at once does not remove any of the difficulties in the way of "encirclement." Mr. Neville Chamberlain is being compelled by the force of circumstance to do exactly what he wished to avoid last September, unite with Russia. Then at least the issue was clear. A stand on the Czech question would have really meant a stand for democracy. Now the allies will be weak and the cause but a negative one.

Not the least of the difficulties which a British Premier has to face in any possible war in Europe, is that of carrying the Dominions with him. Mrs. Vera Micheles Dean in her analysis of the "Munich Accord" in a Foreign Policy Report remarks that in the opinion of Mr. Chamberlain, the Sudeten issue was not sufficiently clear-cut to justify war in the eyes of the British people, "least of all in the Dominions, which at the 1937 Imperial Conference had urged Britain to conciliate potential aggressors in Europe. The Prime Minister believed that, in case war could not be averted, he would stand a much better chance of obtaining the aid of the Dominions if he could demonstrate that all possibilities of conciliation had been exhausted." The Dominions have once again expressed their opinion on the crisis that confronts the Empire. The least the Dominions could do was to declare their willingness to help Britain if she was in trouble. They have all done this but they have been careful to restrict their support to defence of Britain. It is but natural that the various Dominions with the vast differences in their ability to defend themselves, should express their limited responsibility differently. Canada which is in the fortunate position of having the United States to fall back upon if Britain ceases to be a world power, has roundly declared her indifference to any war for trade or prestige in a remote corner of the world; South Africa which is in difficulties with Germany on a question of admitting German immigrants, still does not consider the crisis urgent enough to call for an expression of policy; Australia is prepared to "consult" with Britain on questions relating to the international situation; New Zealand with her offer of being wherever Britain is, stands far ahead of the other Dominions but New Zealand did this too last September and of her subsequent attitude Round Table writes, "It is safe to say that when the time came, no Government in the Commonwealth was more loath to plunge its people into war."

Outside the Dominions and the immediately threatened States of Europe, the United States of America is the one country whose support France and Britain would strain every effort to obtain. But despite President Roosevelt's own strong opposition to Fascism and his deep sympathy with Britain and France, there is little chance of America coming into a European war. The non-Fascist nations of Europe are negotiating a statement of policy in the event of future German aggression. The two significant factors of this move are the implied condonation of not only Czech annexation but even of the taking over of Memel last Wednesday from Lithuania and the exclusion of the United States of America from the names of the negotiating parties. We believe that the greatest service the United States can render to Europe today is to keep her hands off completely. The attitude of rendering moral and economic support is an untenable one and it will not be long before American soldiers are found where American money and American sympathy have gone before. Fascism and Communism in the U. S. A. have only a reflected meaning. If she enters into a European war she must inevitably lay herself open to the warring ideologies of Europe. If she keeps out, she takes the one chance of maintaining sanity in a distracted world. We do not minimise the difficulties of resisting propagandists on both sides which a nation determined to keep out of war, will have to overcome. Already the rival parties have started the war of words, with exaggerations on the one side and denials on the other. The broadcasting stations of the democracies and of Moscow, and those of Berlin and Rome, give a variety of reports of events, incidents and policies. The United States of America is peculiarly open to propaganda from all sides.

For obvious reasons, the position of India in the event of war is peculiarly unhappy. Without any voice in Britain's policy, she will be the first member of the Empire to be rushed into war. We do not consider the Indian princes who, of course, will pledge themselves to support Britain but not through any love of democracy. The attempts to represent Indian opinion as violently anti-Nazi and, therefore, in favour of action against Germany are plausible but misconceived. The only point on which Indian opinion can be roused, is the Nazi policy of racialism. It would be useless to deny the fact that most of Europe's troubles today are due to the appeal which Nazi theories of race distinctions have to the European mind. It is true that Lord Halifax and Mr. Chamberlain make a special point of Hitler's heinous crime of taking over a people who are not German in any way. That, however, is obviously meant for Westesn ears. It is itself founded on the tacit feeling that what is good enough for Asia and Africa is not proper in Europe. For in brief, the main grievance against Fascist Nazi leaders is that they are introducing into Europe standards which had hitherto been confined to the dealings of Europeans with Asiatics. That is a good reason for Europeans to fight in Europe against Germany and Italy. But it is no flaming banner to attract India to enter the contest. The revelations of European diplomacy in the past few months are in themselves a complete argument for indifference to the squabbles of Europe. We have no doubt that in the event of war India, placed as she is, will be dragged into it whether she likes it or not. We do not favour the policy put forward at various times of making Britain's difficulties our opportunities, because not only does it lower national character but exposes the country as well to the worst alien exploiters. The instance of Palestine and Czechoslovakia should be sufficient warning to us. But at the same time that does not mean that by being pushed into a war to pull Britain's chestnuts out of the fire, India will be fulfilling her high destiny.

KENYA HIGHLANDS: THE ISSUES INVOLVED.

(By P. A. Mehta)

The promulgation of the Order-in-Council defining the areas of the Highlands and creating the Highlands Board has caused the deepest disappointment in the hearts of all Indians. It seems to have created a feeling of despair among Indians in Kenya for which there is little justification. There is also a tendency to put all the blame on the Government of India. It is, therefore, necessary to take stock of the situation and to see if, after all, the position is as hopeless as we are led to believe. Is the Government of India solely to be blamed for the present situation or should the blame be apportioned between the Government and the Indian leaders in Kenya? A dispassionate analysis may help to cure the weaknesses in our own ranks.

During the first quarter of this century, a vicious administrative practice had been formed by the Government of Kenya by which Indians were effectively excluded from acquiring lands in the Highlands of Kenya for any purpose. There was, however, no statutory sanction behind this practice. Owing to the organized agitation of the European settlers, the Carter Commission recommended that an Order-in-Council should be promulgated defining the European Highlands. The report also contained a definition of "the privileged position" occupied by the Europeans in this area. This definition went far beyond the actual administrative practice. It was expected that this definition would be embodied in the Order-in-Council recommended by the Carter Commission and there is not the slightest doubt that such a course would have meant much more than the legalizing of past practice.

At this time Indian political agitation in Kenya was at its lowest. There was complete disunity among the Indian leaders and the annual session of the East African Congress had not been held for the number of years. Even in 1935 when an effort was made to revive public enthusiasm at a special session of the Congress in Nairobi, it failed miserably. Few political meetings, in the experience of the writer, have evoked so little enthusiasm. It was at such a sad period of inaction and political degradation in Kenya that the Government of India put up a fight for the repudiation of the definition of 'privileged position' given to the Carter Commission. But it became definite at the end of 1937 that an Order-in-Council was about to be promulgated. A session of the Congress held in Nairobi in December 1937 awoke to its sense of duty and, after a lapse of many years, a united front was presented at the Congress. With dramatic rapidity it was decided to send a delegation to India to combat the promulgation of the Order-in-Council. The Delegation met with complete support from the Government of India, and it had the moral backing of the Indian National Congress and of India. The communique issued by the Government of India recently is correct in saying that "they have done whatever was constitutionally possible." As Mr. Shams-U-Deen who led the East African Delegation, observed in a letter (February 27th 1939) to the Kenya Daily Mail, "It is quite apparent that through the representation made by the Government of India the Order-in-Council has to a great extent been whittled down and a good bit of the racial sting has been taken out of it....."

Firstly, the Order-in-Council does not contain the obnoxious definition of "privileged position" of Europeans in the Highlands. For that reason it is almost without a backbone. Secondly, it merely defines the area of the Highlands. The settlers in Kenya have protested most vigorously against this vague definition. They have demanded the insertion of the words 'White' or 'European' Highlands. As the Order-in-Council stands, Indians may legally have the same rights as Europeans in the Highlands. That this achievement is due to the representations of the Government of India is apparent from what the Attorney-General said on behalf of the Government of Kenya in his speech in the Legislative Council on the 29th April 1938 on a motion brought by the representatives of the European settlers. He said that some people appeared to think that it was an easy matter to get Orders-in-Council through. But these Orders had to be scrutinized not only by the Secretary of State for the Colonies and by the authorities in Kenya but by various other Secretaries of State concerned who might not always see eye to eye as regards the wording. Col. Kirkwood supporting the motion said that it was "intentional and wilful that no mention had been made of Europeans or White Highlands."

Other significant recommendations of the Carter Commission have been rejected. Considering everything, it must be said that it might have been worse. Of course, I have not the slightest hesitation in saying that the proposed Order-in-Council goes beyond the past practice, particularly as it establishes the Highlands Board and even gives a legal flavour to the practice but, as I have already pointed out, it does not legalize the administrative practice as it was feared it would do. This achievement should have given some confidence to Indian leaders in Kenya and should put a new spirit in them to fight more bravely till the battle was won. Instead the executive of the East African Indian Congress has recently acted in a manner which can not be easily condoned. In October 1938, the leaders of the British settlers were most anxious to get the co-operation of the Congress Executive to the Tanganyika League. That was a time when the Executive could at least have given its co-operation, subject to certain concessions by the European leaders (who were all in the Tanganyika League) particularly on the Highlands question. Instead the Executive not merely meekly and unconditionally worked for the settlers' immediate object but even went so far as to declare itself in favour of the administration of Tanganyika, "under the British flag." This resolution was not merely the neglecting of a golden opportunity to advance the Indian cause but an abject surrender of the self-respect of Indians in Kenya for which there is no parallel in the history of Kenya. The course which the Executive should have pursued was to have pressed for international control of Tanganyika if it was at all necessary to take up any attitude at the time. It is gratifying to find that the recent open session of the Congress has omitted the words "under the British flag" but this amendment came too late. The unconditional support given by tho Congress Executive to the Tanganyika League not only served the purpose of the League but, as observed by Mr. S. T. Thakore, Deputy President of the Congress, "attempts were made to use the influence derived from the joining of hands with European community on the question of the retention of Tanganyika, to bring about closer union between the East African Territories."

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

When, therefore, the efforts of the Congress should have been vigorously directed against the promulgation of the Highlands Order-in-Council, the time and energies of the office-bearers and the leaders were wasted in helping the European settlers in keeping Tanganyika "under the British flag." The conference convened early this month at Nairobi has passed a resolution calling upon the Congress Executive to withdraw its support to the Tanganyika League and thus impliedly censured its colossal blunder in having helped the British settlers. This is like shutting the stable door after the steed has been stolen!

There is another feature of politics in Kenya at present which deserves condemnation. There appears to be great disunity among Indian leaders in Kenya even in face of the great wrong done to Indian interests. The Colonial Times, the only Indian paper in Nairobi, the present headquarters of the Congress, in its editorial notes of February 25, 1939 writes:

> The publication of the Order-in Council regarding Kenya Highlands appears to have thrown the Congress circles into utter panic, for there is no other justification for the insane and precipitate actions of the Secretary and deputy President of the Congress during the last few days. Panic has taken the place of cool judgment among the Congress leaders, and the exhibition of their nervousness and childish threats in interviews with the European Press, in whose columns prominent space is devoted to these effusions, must fill the hearts of Indians with shame and sorrow.

On the other hand, the Kenya Daily Mail of Mombasa in an editorial (March 1, 1939) under the heading "Appeal to Nairobi" criticizing in unecessarily strong language the leaders who are opposed to policy of the Congress executive, says:

> In their personal jealousies and personal differences with the present Congress Executive, they are acting in a most senseless and foolish manner and in trying to belittle the efforts of the Executive to register the strongest possible protest against the Highlands Order-in Council which they vehemently condemn, they are becoming instruments in the hands of the opponents of the Indian community.

Surely this disgraceful state of things should come to an end immediately. I have worked with men in both these camps and have found them capable of rendering great services to the community. It is not necessary to say where the blame lies. What is imperative is that they should patch up their differences and fight the common enemy instead of fighting among themselves. If not, they will have to blame themselves rather than the Government of India for worse discrimination and harsher laws against Indians in Kenya. If this is how Indian leaders in Kenya keep the "honour of India," it is time an Agent was appointed by the Government of India to represent India in East Africa.

The immediate problem is not merely to demand the repeal of the present Order-in-Council but of the unjust "administrative practice" on which it is based. It is not enough to combat a legal bar when there is an actual bar against Indians in Kenya. All energies should now be devoted to the abolition of this "administrative practice." To fight against the statutory recognition of an unjust practice is to fight for a shadow. So long as the practice continues, it is no satisfaction to feel that it is not embodied in any Statute. If you can abolish the practice you can equally repeal an Order-in Council. Indians in India should, therefore, now cease to bother about the legalizing of the present position but should try every method and fight on every front to get rid of the obnoxious administrative practice. The limitations of the Government of India are well known but that is no reason for abandoning all hope. India has a national Government at the centre. The Government of India have done much in the past and should be made to do much more in the future. The danger at the moment lies not in the weakness of the Government of India but in the leaders in Kenya themselves.

VIOLENT NON-VIOLENCE.

(By J. M. Ganguli, Cacutta.)

I look vacant at the question when my mother asks, "What sort of non-violence is this to take undue advantage of one's great influence in the country to coerce a Prince into a course of action of vital and permanent significance to himself, to his family and to his State within a few days by starting a fast unto death in the Prince's territory?"

Of his first experiments in satyagraha it might be urged that Gandhiji was still young, immature in judgment, and jumping on impulses and floating ideas; and, therefore, some allowance could be made in judging his violent conduct towards the feelings and sentiments of others while upholding his own. But his Rajkot fast, undertaken in ripe old age, has left little ground for pleading for any such allowance. Possibly, Gandhiji's point of view is that he goes by his convictions and, perhaps, also by some divine inspiration. But all thinkers, preachers and reformers, and even political agitators have similar arguments, though they may not be realising and accessing the divinity of their inspirations. The point is only whether the methods they adopt in propagating their ideas and convictions and in winning over people to them are violent or non-violent. And in judging whether the methods are violent or non-violent, very clear thinking is necessary as regards where the demarcating line between violence and non-violence may lie. To make the mere use of physical force the criterion is to misjudge and misunderstand the whole thing; for violence committed through such force can even be much less severe than that committed without it. A son going astray causes severer violence to his mother's feelings than if he were in a moment of wild rage to give her a blow. A devoted wife would much prefer to receive occasional blows from her husband, addicted to drinking, to her husband sending her a decent maintenance and himself misbehaving with other women. The illustrations may easily be multiplied, and they may even be otherwise. A son or a husband charmed and influenced by the oratory of a missionary, may turn Christian and in his imbibed missionary enthusiasm he may resort to fast as a means to convert those of his family members who are much attached to him. In this case he conceives his object to be very noble and even beneficial to them. Those of them like his mother or wife, who cannot bear him fasting, are forced to do anything to prevent him from fasting and torturing himself. But does that not amount to violence of a cruder and severer type than, what Gandhiji would call, the use of physical force? For our ways and methods to be truly non-violent it is certainly not enough to avoid physical force but also to scrupulously avoid doing violence to one's feelings and sentiments.

Gandhiji misunderstands the Ahimsa idea if he were to think that—whatever the source and nature of his inspiration may be—he can disregard the reaction of his acts and doings on others' feelings, only if his intentions are noble. It is possible to have Ahimsa in one's own thought and act, but Ahimsa being a relative thing, one has also to see that in the course of such thought and act no Himsa or violence is done on the body as also on the mind of others. A non-violent Satyagrahi is to inspire and create conviction in the minds of others in his own ideas and beliefs by demonstrating their goodness in his own life and in the field where he works. And, therefore, there can no shortcut for him as that to be had by undertaking a fast at the door of non-believers.

Gandhiji's Rajkot fast was, therefore, unbefitting a non-violent satyagrahi, but was rather an impulsive act of crude violence. His act became all the more violent because he was conscious that the place he held in the mass-mind in the country and also in the country's politics would have a hopelessly irresistable influence on the Rajkot Chief whose hands would thereby be forced. Under such extreme violent methods it is not possible for any noble instincts to generate and develop in anybody's mind, as Gandhiji said they would, in the young Thakore Saheb's heart. Gandhiji forced the issue and violently forced the young man's hands. Effigies were burnt, the country was indignant, the Paramount Power intervened, and of course it was humanly unbearable to have an old man starving at the door. What more violence could conceivably have been committed towards a youngman in a helpless condition? If he had wrongly acted, if he had plighted his word, well, it was for satyagrahis to continue in their absolutely non-violent efforts to provoke repentence in him by unmutteringly offering themselves before his wrath. That slow but sure process, Gandhiji interrupted by descending on the scene and undertaking the fast. And thereby he has set a bad example that vitiates some of the essentials which he has himself been preaching under his non-violence doctrine.

A CORRECTION.

In last week's Reformer, page 459, towards the conclusion of Mr. P. A. Mehta's article on "East African Congress and The Tanganyika League" there is a reference to Mr. Vallabhbhai Patel's visit to Tanganyika. As printed it reads, "Now we hear of the forthcoming visit of Mr. A.B. Patel to save the territory for the British... .." It should have read, "Now we hear of the forthcoming visit of Mr. Vallabhbhai Patel ....." The mistake is the more regrettable since there is a Mr. A. B. Patel, an East African Indian leader, in Kenya.

RAJKOT AND SATYAGRAHA.

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

I should have written to you long since in connection with the Rajkot trouble but somehow or other I have not been able to do so. Meantime, let me tell you that I have been in full agreement with you in regard to all that you have written in connection with it: as a matter of fact, this is just what I have been thinking about the affair all the while, and I have been wondering how you being so far from the spot should have got such an insight into the affair. As you said once, it has been a sordid affair, entirely so, and there has been very little to choose between the two parties so far as the method of fighting this battle is concerned. In my humble way I tried to act as a truce-maker without placing myself in the lime-light, but the people or rather their leaders were adamant in their stand. I was in close touch with Sir Patrick Cadell, but the popular leaders were bent upon sending him away. Later on the people, however, realized fully the great mistake they made in behaving towards him in the way they did.

As for Satya and Ahimsa the less said about them the better. In the first phase of the fight, the State was more Ahimsata than the people, and the people were fully bent upon paralysing the State altogether. In the second stage, the State terrorised the people and it did this effectively. As a matter of fact, it had no other way to get out of the trouble. I am afraid there is nothing else that could be done against mass lawlessness and extreme coercion to the extent of even paralysing the entire life of the State. Under these circumstances, both the State and the Parishad fully matched one another.

The pity of it, however, was that Mahatma Gandhi did not take a middle course as he should have done. Everything would have been easily settled here on the spot. As you have said, he went even beyond the agreement in his demands and the fast was nothing but coercion of a pretty bad kind.

I am afraid the end is not yet. There will be some hitch, perhaps more than one, even now. At the same time, let us hope that things may be better.

THE WORKER IN INDUSTRY.

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

With reference to your comments on my evidence before the textile Labour Inquiry Committee, I am not against giving the worker an increase in his wage if that would enable him to use his discretion how to spend it. But he is so surrounded with difficult social and industrial conditions that he is not in a position to use the money to his benefit. He has very little choice in the spending of it. I do not even remotely suggest that the workman is instinctively for wasting or misusing his wages. What I want to drive home is that he is caught in a vicious net of bad living and working conditions which leave him no choice but to waste and misuse his money. It is true that progress of man lies through making mistakes and suffering the consequences. But the tragic irony of it all is that bad living and working conditions are depriving the workman exactly of this right, this privilege, this essential of human progress. It is to restore to him this birthright that I keep harping on the theme of first improving his living and working condition before doing anything else. If he is to have a sporting chance to work for his uplift, he must first be drawn out from the vicious circle of bad living and working conditions. If he is ever to assert his manhood, if he is to command higher wages and not have to go begging for them, his living and working conditions must be such as befit essential human needs. You cannot build a castle on a foundation of sand. You cannot have efficiency and character through bad living and working conditions. There must be a solid foundation to build any permanent structure over it, and the only permanent safeguard that can ensure a higher wage for the workman (coupled with a privilege to do what he may like with it), lies through proper living and working conditions.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT AND FASCISM.

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

Once more I want to register my friendly disagreement with you, this time in relation to your remarks in The Reformer for January 14th upon President Roosevelt's expression of American opinion upon German and Italian policy. If I may judge by all the information I can get hold of, the people of America very heartily welcomed and applauded his expressions. Certainly he has a most unusual ability in understanding the feelings of his fellow countrymen. And not only did the great majority of us agree with what he said, but also felt that it was most appropriate and fitting that he should say it. To attribute this expression and feeling to a national "inferiority complex" seems to me ill-informed. Conceivably it might be charged by some to a superiority complex: but to make it a token of inferiority feeling passes understanding. It was an expression by our chief magistrate of the almost universal American indignation at two things which go beyond merely national and international matters because they go deep down into our common human nature and to the common interests of all mankind. I refer to the steady attack by the Fascist powers—both in act and in speech—upon the fundamental principles of self-government, of human rights, of the possibility of governmental self-criticism, of public opinion, freedom of speech and of the press, and of education as distinguished from propaganda. And secondly the President's words expressed the feeling of horror which all Americans entertain at the utterly inhuman attitude of the Fascist governments toward the Jews.

I earnestly hope (for the sake of my high opinion of your judgment) that you will not even be tempted to reply by reminding me that Great Britain has frequently in the past acted against the interests of liberty and the rights of man, or that every year a number of negroes are lynched in our American Southern States. Of course these things are true and no one, so far as I am aware, denies them. We Americans deplore these things, and so far as our own people are responsible for them we feel deep humiliation. But for that reason must our mouths be for ever closed in protest against cruelty, injustice, inhumanity? Or because democratic nations have done ill in the past, must all nations be permitted to do ill without protest through all the future? Is there to be no possibility of progress? And do we not all belong to one human race? And are national laws so important that they ought to make impossible all voicing of human sentiments and of universal moral laws? Surely the great founders and saints of our religions were not so meticullous. And surely if moral protest has ever been appropriate in the world's history, the deeds of the Fascist governments in our days call for it.

Yours etc.,
Williamstown, Mass. } JAMES B. PRATT.
February 14, 1939.

From No-Frontier News edited by Mr. Devere Allen we take the following entirely different American estimate of President Roosevelt's policy :-

When President Roosevelt announced he will defend the non-Fascist countries by every method short of war, even to arming them from here, he resorted to a euphemism. For there are methods short of war which nevertheless lead toward war; and with uncanny precision he has chosen these.

His policy stands as incredibly irresponsible. He ignored the Neutrality Act by breaking a pledge given to the House Committee on Foreign Relations that an undeclared war, like that in China, would not be exempt. After aiding Japan for a year, he put pressure on the aircraft firms not to sell to Japan. At the same time he refused to lift the embargo on Republican Spain, and when critics said our 1921 treaty with Germany should prevent arms shipments to Hitler, his Administration took the view that, while Germany was not permitted to buy munitions here, we were permitted to sell them there. Though we largely built the German air fleet, he arranged secretly to let France buy $. 60,000,000 in aircraft here, the deal becoming known only through the crash of a test flight. And then, while Chamberlain and Daladier were throwing Spanish democracy to the wolves and collaborating with Fascism the President fixed our defense line in western Europe!

His policy stands revealed as incredibly irresponsible. Mr. Roosevelt's programme—so far as it has any consistency at all—is much more certain to promote war than it is to promote defence. No peaceful programme will do any good if we must allow a powerful Chief Executive, with virtually unchecked power, to follow a method, from 3,000 miles away, closer to war than the very democratic Powers—with whom we appear to have consummated a secret military alliance—are willing to do themselves.

NATIONAL DRESS.

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

In your issue dated the 4th inst., Mr. Ganguli of Calcutta lays stress on, among others, national dress. Now, Sir, this National Dress is something I have never been able to understand. What have the advocates of National Dress in mind? Is it the Mahomedan dress? Is it the Hindu—if so, which variety? Is it the Parsee? Is it the European? Do we have Hindu India in mind only when we speak of these national things? It appears to me that if it is a Hindu speaking of some thing he deems national, he has the Hindu community in mind. In the same way do others have their eyes fixed on their own traditions when they speak of national habits of thought, dress, etc. India has never been a nation in the sense that it has had unity of thought, habit, action, manners, speech, etc.

Will Mr. Ganguli point out to me how I should dress if I wish to adopt the 'National Dress?' Is it to be the Bengal variety? Will this be acceptable to Mahomedans? Will Christians and Europeans adopt it?

When we speak of national things, let us remember that even in the political sphere we are far from being national—we are even politically not a nation. In other respects, we are still less so.

I have been since the days of Mrs. Besant when the first stress on national dress began to be laid, wondering what this National Dress may be; but I still have not found one.

I have been suggesting to my friends privately that chudida pyjamas, shirt, short coat with a stand-up collar, and a sunhat for the head would probably be a good National Dress. If there is any piece of dress we need to make our own from the paraphernalia of the European dress, it is, I think, the sunhat. What does Mr. Ganguli say about this?

MR. KHAREGHAT ON PARSIS AND PROHIBITION.*

I have been asked to express my opinion about prohibition solely from the points of view of the Parsi religion and I proceed to do so. Wine is required for Parsi religious cremonies, and I have no hesitation in saying that to prohibit its use for that purpose will be a serious interference with the religious practices and feelings of the great majority of Parsis. I am now 74 years old and from my childhood I have seen wine being used in ceremonies like Afringan and Satum. I believe I will be confirmed by all practising priests. In this connection I would quote the following from Haug's Essays edited by West (3rd Edition of 1884) pages 408 and 409: Haug and West are well-known authorities on the subject. In describing the Afringan ceremony it is said:

"At all the great festivals, and on solemn occasion the Darum ceremony is followed by the Afringan, but on other occasions the Afringan can be celebrated alone. Like the Darum ceremony it is performed in honour of some angel or deceased person.

"A tray containing wine and fruit is placed before the fire and flowers are laid to the left of the tray.....Afterwards the fruit is eaten and the wine drunk in the same manner as the Darum is eaten."

I may state that this Afringan ceremony is performed daily and in many cases several times in all places of worship like Daremehrs and Atash Behram also in a good many private dwellings.

That this practice is very old will be apparent from the statement in the Zarthusht-Nama written in 1278 A. D., that our revered Prophet Zoroaster performed the Darum ceremony in the Court of King Gustasp with four articles. viz., wine, perfumes, milk and pomegranate, and the four persons who partook each of these consecrated articles became endowed with miraculous powers. (See Eastwick's translation of the Zarthusht-Nama in Wilson's Parsi Religion—page 511). Whether one believes in the miracle or not, this passage certainly proves that nearly seven hundred years ago wine was considered a necessary ingredient of the Darum ceremony.

The reasons of this use in such ceremonies seems to be that what was considered good for the living was also considered a fit offering to celestial beings including the spirits of the dead, and there is not the least doubt that wine temperately used was considered a good thing in the Parsi religion; for this purpose I would only quote a few authorities.

First I would refer to the Dina-i-Mino Khirad ('Opinions of the Spirit of Wisdom') Chapter XVI a very well-known authority on our religion, a translation of which is included in the Sacred Books of the East Vol. xxiv. Sections 20 to 63 of this Chapter deal with the use of wine. Intemperate use of it is strictly condemned but its temperate use is praised in these words (Section 37—48).

"37. Because, from the moderate drinking of wine thus much benefit happens to him; (38) since it digests the food, (39) kindles the vital fire, (40) increases the understanding and intellect, semen and blood, (41) removes vexation, (42) and inflames the complexion, (43) it causes recollection of things forgotten, (44) and goodness takes a place in the mind, (45) it likewise increases the sight of the eye, the hearing of the ear, and the speaking of the tongue, (46) and work which is necessary to do and expedite, becomes more progressive, (47) he also sleeps pleasantly in the sleeping place, and rises light, (48) And on account of these contingencies good repute for the body, righteousness for the soul, and also the approbation of the good come upon him."

Chapter LI of the Datistanek-i-Dinik (Sacred Books of the East, Vol. XVIII) is practically to the same effect.

Further in the Afrin-i-Gahambar recited on the occasion of the Gahambar festivals, in the part dealing with the sixth Gahambar it is stated that a person who takes part in the performance of a Gahambar acquires as much merit as one who has offered warm bread and good wine (Mai-e-Khub) to good men.

Similarly in the Vendiad Chapter XIV, Section 17 one of the good acts to be done as a penance for a particular sin is, "He shall treat twice nine goodly men to their fill of meat, bread, strong drink, and wine." (Darmesteter's translation in the Sacred Books of the East. Vol. IV). This passage is in one of the oldest of our Sacred Books in the Avesta language, and proves clearly enough that from the oldest times wine was not only not forbidden but its use recommended, of course in a temperate mannsr.

This is entirely in accordance with the practical spirit of our religion, which condemns extremes of all kinds, prescribes moderation and self-control in food, drink, exercise, thought, speech and action.

DEPRESSED CLASSES IN MYSORE.

(FROM A CORRESPONDENT.)

The completion of electric grid is one activity—the reclamation of millions of acres through irrigation is another activity. Planned construction of wells—there is a public well in every village to-day—is a third activity. But along with these is another—the reclamation of human beings into happy and useful citizens of a prosperous State.

The work of elevating the Harijans is carried on with the precision and purpose of an industrial undertaking. What Government have actually achieved may not be much. But by its open work of Harijan uplift Government have released a new spirit among the people. Like maternity benefit and child welfare movement, the Harijan uplift movement has entered into the inner soul of the people. Village Panchayets, Municipalities and other local self-governing units have spontaneously come forward to change their attitude towards these people. Without their sympathetic co-operation, several problems such as supply of drinking water, sites for construction of buildings, lights, latrines and other public conveniences will not admit of easy solution.

Looking back to the time two decades ago, when the Government of Mysore took upon themselves the work of elevating the submerged classes, one must feel surprised that in spite of social drawbacks, conservative ideas and ultra-orthodox traditions prevalent in the rural areas, so much progress has been achieved.

Mention has often been made about the various measures taken for the uplift of the depressed classes who form 14 per cent of the total population of Mysore. The one planned purpose is to train them to look at life as something valuable and as their own instead of being born hirelings. While, in such a campaign, education comes uppermost, the State strive to place the economic factor uppermost.

Reference has been made to the grant of lands either free or at concession rates to Harijans.

To enable Harijans to put up decent dwelling houses, the Government of Mysore have ordered the grant of timber and bamboos up to Rs. 15 per head calculated on the existing seigniorage rates, be made. All public wells and tanks have been thrown open for the use of the depressed classes, and construction of drinking water wells in the Adikarnataka hamlets and localities has become an ordinary feature of administration.

Another measure intended to act as a lever to raise them is the systematic organisation of Harijan Co-operative Societies and financing them; grant of bonus to Secretaries of such societies in the initial stages, supply of account books free, supply of home savings boxes free and supply of agricultural implements to members of depressed class societies at half cost.

Large areas of land have been granted to the Harijans, the acreage granted ranging from two to three thousand acres per annum. Funds have also been provided to them for bringing the lands under cultivation by means of taccavi loans and through co-operative societies specialy organised for the purpose. Government have financed such societies to the extent of over Rs. 60,000. Adikarnataka Societies specially for the benefit of the Adikarnataka Weavers have been formed in the Mandya and Malavalli Taluks. The Cobblers Society at Malavalli has been of immense benefit to the members and it has been obtaining the special concession of the supply of sandals to the Stores Purchases Committee. The Apex Bank has financed several Adikarnataka Societies for the benefit of their members.

Detailed description has already been given of the special education facilities available for Harijans such as grant of scholarships to the students of the depressed classes; establishment of primary schools exclusively for their benefit in important depressed class centres; Boarding Homes for their benefit and the establishment of Institutes on the lines of the Central Adikarnataka Institute for imparting industrial and vocational training along with general education; grant of books and slates, free in deserving cases; exemption from payment of school fees and examination fees; the scheme of grant-in-aid hostels; the throwing open all public schools to the depressed classes; provision for vocational education along with the three R's wherever possible; and providing clothing to the pupils of the depressed classes with a view to inculcating in them habits of cleanliness.

And to-day the number of pupils under instruction is over 23,000. Out of these, about 3,600 are girls and over fifty per cent are in the ordinary general schools and the remaining in the 500 special schools opened for their exclusive benefit. The Harijan Hostels and Boarding Homes numbered 25 with a strength of 963 pupils.

NOTES.

Sequel to Munich :—Even after the heavy sacrifices of Munich, Czechoslovakia was to be denied an independent existence. Germany, Poland and Hungary detached territory from the Republic after Munich. A declaration of solidarity between Czechs and Slovaks was secured after a large measure of autonomy was granted to Slovakia. The Slovak Government leant heavily on Germany and its measures were practically dictated by Berlin. Early this month Slovakia declared herself completely independent of the Prague Government and there were coups and counter coups. It was a feature of the disturbances that the Slovak leader was in constant communication with Herr Hitler. President Hacha of the Czecho-Slovak Republic sought German intercession and a prolonged interview with Herr Hitler concluded on Wednesday with the inclusion of Bohemia and Moravia in the German Reich as a measure of pacification. On Thursday Slovakia also became a "province" of Germany. Ruthenia declared her independence and was promptly taken over by Hungary. It is now a question whether Herr Hitler will fight for Ruthenia now or agitate from within Hungary. The Powers which guaranteed the territorial integrity of the Czech Republic, what was left of it after Munich, are faced with a problem: They are in danger of being involved in a war over an even smaller issue than the old one which they thought was worth while to defend and if, as Mr. Chamberlain said at the time, the Czechs and Germans were people of whom Britain and France knew nothing, the peoples now involved are even less known abroad, as they were all Czechs to us.

Collapse of Prague :—Mr. Chamberlain remarks that the guarantee does not come into operation [illegible] when the Czech State has fallen to pieces by [illegible]. Mr. Chamberlain in the House of Commons expressed his astonishment at these developments and declared pathetically that none of the four Munich powers had this result in mind. What he had expected, no doubt, was that Germany would control the Prague Government from outside. That would have allowed Mr. Chamberlain to preserve his policy of "non-intervention." But the outright annexation of this non-German piece of European territory has left the British Premier shorn of all prestige. All that he can think of now is to establish that he is not guilty of complicity in this matter and to stop the balance of the £ 10,000,000 loan to the Czech Government—even here two-thirds has already been drawn. The rapid dissolution of Czechoslovakia has a grave lesson which we hope will not be lost on those who welcomed the Munich Peace as a reasonable agreement. The Munich terms were forced on the Czechs, not so much by Germany as by Britain and France. In doing so they weakened the authority of the Prague Government. Is it surprising that with a central authority broken in prestige, in influence and even in morale, the nationalities have decided to detach themselves from the Republic? The Prague Government might have surmounted the problems it faced within the State, even after Munich. But Germany would not allow it. And there was nothing to restrain Germany. One wonders as one reads the news of the broken Republic, whether after all it would not have been better for Czechoslovakia to have fought the first encroachment, alone if necessary, than to have submitted to the disastrous persuasions of Britain and France.

Democracy and Sovereignty :—In an article in the Observer (London) Lord Lothian attempts an answer to the question why democracy has fallen on evil days. He defines democracy as being in essence government not by rulers but by principle and law. He writes:

> Fundamentally it is unity created by constitutional law which ensures liberty and responsibility—political, economic and religious—to the individual, allows him to develop his own manhood or womanhood and seek to remould the community by free initiative, including the right to make mistakes, and which establishes the moral virtues, such as justice, mercy, honesty, and not the power of the State or the privilege of a class, as the guiding motive of public life.

Lord Lothian understands by democracy something which ordinary people call religion. It will be noticed that in his definition there is no reference to the machinery of government which, to most people, is the essence of democracy. The franchise, representative institutions, responsibility to the legislature, bulk more largely in their eyes than government by principle or the advancement of opportunities of self-development and freedom for the individual. Lincoln's phrase "Government of the people, by the people, for the people" is interpreted to mean government by majority among European communities, and, where Europeans and non-Europeans live together, of the non-Europeans by the Europeans. The failure of democracy in Lord Lothian's opinion is due to its association with national sovereignty. "The root of our troubles," he says, "is that the democracies have not yet realised that it is their own passionate attachment to national sovereignty which is the main cause of that most fatal of all social diseases, anarchy, whose evil consequences, have been immensely intensified for all of us by the conquest of time and space." He evidently believes that this attachment to national sovereignty is not inherent in democracy and is capable of being separated and flung out of it. As a matter of historical fact, democracies have been more selfish, narrow-minded and more subject to race and colour prejudice than Empires. Proof of this is abundant in the British self-governing Dominions, in the United States of America and even in Great Britain. A democracy can not weld different nationalities into one whole as Empires have often done. Democracy can succeed only in homogeneous communities. Lord Lothian and the author of "Union Now" want the "fifteen democracies of the North Atlantic" to be united for five common purposes—defence, citizenship, currency, a customs-free economy and communications. Union for these five purposes means practically union for all purposes. In the first place, what are the fifteen democracies surrounding the North Atlantic? We can count only nine including the Scandinavian countries. In the next place, the sacrifices involved in merging themselves virtually in one common sovereignty will not, from the point of view of the individual citizen, be much less than that exacted by a totalitarian polity. The idea of a world Empire is more within range of probability than that of a world Republic or world Democracy.

Bombay Prohibition Programme:—The Times of India on Tuesday came out with a long and circumstantial narration of the difficulties of Prohibition enforcement and announced that the Government had resolved to postpone it till November at the least. The purpose in publishing the report is obvious. Tuesday was a dull day after the hectic reporting of the Congress session. Here was an obvious opportunity to put a little wet propaganda across the public. But propaganda for liquor has little chance of success in any Indian province. So it is generally camouflaged and other interests are dragged in. In the present report itself, there is every attempt to stir up communal passions to serve its ends. But that is only to be expected from the formidable interests gathered round the liquor traffic. What we find beyond understanding is the failure of the Bombay Government to issue a prompt contradiction. There is no lack of insinuation in the Times report that in drawing up its plans, the Bombay Government did not know what exactly it was doing. This form of attack is peculiarly mischievous. If it is to be countered, that can only be by a vigorous rebuttal of the specific charges in the story. Instead, there are reports in other newspapers to the effect that the whole thing is a canard and that "it is not necessary to issue a denial." That these denials are based on "high official authority" is not sufficient. What we would have liked is a statement from the Minister in Charge finally settling this propaganda. In the Bombay Assembly on Wednesday, the Prime Minister denied the report in general terms. The lack of publicity for the measures already undertaken adds to the uncertainty of the situation. Undisciplined agitation can only bring on more drastic action. The Times of India, it is noteworthy, concedes that even those in the traffic accept eventual Prohibition. That is an insurmountable fact which no ingenuity can explain away. It is hard to see, moreover, why if smuggling and illicit distillation is felt to be even more evil than drinking, a section of the press should so enthusiastically publish articles with illustrations on how liquor is smuggled. It would be a mistake to think, however, that the Times of India is representative of opinion in the European community. Responsible European leaders have expressed their sympathy with the cause of Prohibition.

Workers' Uplift:—We publish large excerpts from the interesting statement of his views on the improvement of the conditions of workers, which Dr. H. P. Dastur who occupies an important position in the social service staff of the firm of Tatas, presented to the Textile Enquiry Committee. Broadly speaking, Dr. Dastur is against additions in the shape of increased wages or allowances of cash payments to workers. Speaking from his experience, he says that they are often wasted or misused. The maternity benefits given to the pregnant woman are diverted by her husband for his own enjoyment and the woman herself derives no benefit from them. In the course of a conversation, Dr. Dastur went so far as to suggest that maternity benefits operated as an inducement to too frequent pregnancy. He praised the foresight of the Bombay Labour Commissioner who refused to hand over an amount paid as compensation for injury in an accident to the claimant, and insisted on her investing the sum in land in her native village. Additions to wages often find their way to the drink shops. Prohibition will close this avenue of extravagance but there will be a hundred other ways in which the money will be wasted.

Wage Increase and Higher Standards:—Dr. Dastur recommends that, instead of payments in cash, workers must be provided with more and better amenities of life. There is much to be said for this view. But we doubt this idea of withholding cash from the workers will work satisfactorily. The paternal system which he favours will deprive the workers of opportunities of learning to live a better life the only way in which this is done, by making mistakes and suffering the consequences. After all, how is the industrial worker different in this respect from non-industrial workers? To our mind, the drawbacks pointed out by Dr. Dastur are inevitable in all attempts to improve the condition of one section of the community without reference to others. The millworker is the creature of his environment as much as the clerk or the chauffeur. Dr. Dastur lays stress on the co-operation of the State, the employer and the worker. When we speak of the State we forget that it is not an abstraction but a group of human beings with much the same virtues and vices as the rest of the community to which they belong. The employer is often the example which his worker tries to imitate. We are afraid that progress must come only by letting people make their own mistakes. To deprive them of the opportunity of making mistakes by providing a fool-proof road straight to Heaven, even were it possible, would be futile.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Indians in East Africa:—We publish this week an article by Mr. P. A. Mehta on the struggle for power between the mandates system and the colonial system in East Africa. There is ample evidence to show that in East Africa itself, opinion among Indians is veering round to a realisation of the colossal blunder committed by leaders of the East African Indian Congress in associating with the Tanganyika League. The Kenya Daily Mail which was somehow persuaded to lend its support to the Tanganyika League, has at long last realised its mistake. The two factors which have led to this disillusionment, are the refusal of the Kenya Administration to associate Indians with its defence plans and the publication of the Order-in-Council relating to the Kenya Highlands, neither of which, it must be remembered, has anything to do with the rights of Indians in Tanganyika. In the first week of March a Conference was held at Nairobi and adopted two resolutions. The East African Standard of March 6, records the resolutions as follows:

> I. (a) This Conference of Kenya Indians convened by the Executive Committee of the East African Indian National Congress, resolves that a Kenya Highlands League be organised with the object of obtaining the position of reserving the Highlands for Europeans by all necessary but peaceful means and with membership open to all inhabitants of East Africa—Africans, Arabs, Indians, Europeans, etc.
> (b) Further resolved that the Hon. Mr. A. B. Patel is hereby authorised with full powers to take all necessary steps to organise the Kenya Highlands League.
> II. In view of the Imperial Government having legalised the administrative practice of reserving the Highlands for Europeans by promulgation of the Order-in-Council, thus giving preference to Germans over British Indians in acquiring lands in the Kenya Highlands, this Conference of Kenya Indians recommends that the Executive Committee of the East African Indian Congress should withdraw its membership from the Tanganyika League and the Indian community should cease all co-operation with it.

Mr. Andrews' Misconception:—No Englishman has sought to befriend India in the present century more whole-heartedly than Mr. C. F. Andrews. He has done so in an understanding way and has, therefore, applied himself to gather information from many quarters not generally accessible to outsiders. Yet with all his earnestness and assiduity he has sometimes missed his way. In his book "Rise and Growth of the Congress" (George Allen and Unwin, price 7s 6d) Mr. Andrews indulges in criticism of the moderate Indian attitude to political reform. As an instance of the "short-sightedness of Congress leaders (original)" Mr. Andrews quotes from the presidential address of Sir Surendranath Banerjee in 1895 at the Poona session, the following passage:

> I was not aware that any responsible Congressman had ever asked for representative institutions for one woman or for the masses of our people. We should be satisfied if we obtain representative institutions of modified character for the educated community who, by reason of their culture and enlightenment, their assimilation of English ideas, and their familiarity with English methods of government, might be presumed to be qualified for such a boon.

This no doubt sounds tepid today when Congress leaders profess complete Independence as their goal, but in 1895 only a madman would have thought of demanding independence. Czecho-Slovakia's fate is even today a warning against grasping more than you can hold. As for women's suffrage, the number of women who could have exercised the franchise fifty years ago could have been counted on the fingers of one hand. It would have been obviously absurd to have demanded manhood suffrage when even men of high education and administrative experience, had no vote at any election. Mr. Andrews also criticises the "pathetic trust of Indian leaders in British justice and fairplay," forgetting that Dadabhai Naoroji whom he admires highly, exhorted his countrymen not to lose faith in it, even though, as he confessed, he had himself experienced bitter disappointment and had reason to be completely disillusioned. Mr. Andrews of late years has resolutely looked at India through the eyes of Messrs. Gandhi and Tagore, in spite of the wide gulf that yawns between their views of the world In his struggle to reconcile these two extremes Mr. Andrews has lost his grip on Indian realities. In his survey of the movements which moulded the shape of Indian nationalism, he completely ignores Ranade, the master-mind behind nearly all activities in the last quarter of the nineteenth century, and the National Social Conference of which he was General Secretary and the moving spirit to the day of his death!

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER
BOMBAY, March 18, 1939.

THE DILEMMA OF THE PRINCES.

The Indian National Congress closed its session at Tripuri on Sunday. The Chamber of Princes met in New Delhi on Monday under the Presidentship of the Viceroy. Lord Linlithgow's address to the Chamber reflected the change which has been gradually coming over the attitude of the British Government towards Indian States. Lord Winterton's declaration in the House of Commons two years ago that the British Government would not stand in the way of constitutional reform in the States was the first indication of this change. This was somewhat qualified by a subsequent statement in the same place but recently the Secretary of State for India and his representative in the House of Commons spoke rather in the strain of Lord Winterton's statement than of the subsequent modification. Lord Linlithgow's address to the Princes on Monday must, therefore, be regarded as the latest stage of the British Government's shifting policy towards the Indian States. Lord Linlithgow is not the first Viceroy who admonished the Princes to improve the standards of their administration. Lord Curzon in the beginning of this century did so in sharp and stinging terms. Lord Irwin ten years ago did likewise in gentler tones. But unfortunately Lord Curzon's successor undid the effects of Curzon's admonition and lulled the Princes by promising to leave them alone. Lord Irwin's advice was similarly neutralised by the easy-going patronage of Lord Willingdon who concentrated his whole available strength in suppressing the Congress movement in British India. The backwardness of the majority of the States in administration is directly due to the Paramount Power's playing fast and loose with them. Neither Lord Curzon nor Lord Irwin nor Lord Linlithgow acknowledged this fact. If the Paramount Power had followed a consistent policy in its relations with the States, many of the States would have worked up to more efficient standards of administration and those which did not or could not do so, would have ceased to exist. For the first time in the history of those relations, Lord Linlithgow suggested to the Princes that only by adapting the form of their rule to conditions in British India could they improve their administration. Previous Viceroys have invariably insisted on the personal responsibility of rulers. Lord Linlithgow also pointed out that personal rule meant close personal touch with the people, but His Excellency implied that this was not the main line on which improvements in States' administration can be best accomplished at present. The Viceroy declared that the Princes alone had the right to decide what form of Government would be most suited to the conditions in their States. The Princes' spokeman clutched at this declaration like a drowning man clutching at any straw that happened to float his way. As a matter of fact, however, the Princes have only a Hobson's choice in the matter. The Congress is pressing them to adopt "responsible Government" which is conspicuous by its utter absence in its own constitution and, however good an administrator may be, it can not in resisting that demand rely on the support of the Crown Representative who in his capacity of Governor-General is desperately anxious to bring the Federation into being as soon as possible.

The Chancellor of the Chamber of Princes, the Jam Saheb of Jamnagar, was a pathetic figure. His predecessor on the Jamnagar gadi had called down upon himself a severe rebuke from the then Governor-General Lord Willingdon, for presuming to express his fears about the effects of the Federal scheme on the future of the States. It was probably he who told Sir Patrick Cadell, who repeated it in an address at the East India Association in London, that the States would not survive twenty years after the introduction of Federation. The present Jam Saheb was more tactful and Lord Linlithgow is not an irritable old man to lose his temper at an honest difference of opinion. The Chancellor pointed out the difficulties caused by the intervention of outside politicians and implied, without much warrant from experience, that the Princes, if left to themselves, would accomplish wonders in the way of improving the administration. Many of the Princes are no doubt feeling that it would have been well for them if they had not started this hare of Federation at the first Round Table Conference. They did so in the belief that they were conferring a great favour on the people and Government of British India by enabling the latter to confer responsible government at the centre. They never expected that they will have to change their form of Government and, indeed, they did all they could to ensure that their position in their States would remain more secure than under the present system. And until about two years ago they were encouraged and supported in their complacency by the British Government. The Winterton declaration came on them like a bolt from the blue. The subsequent pronouncements, the declaration of Gandhiji that he went to Rajkot as an "ally" of the British Government, and the Viceroy's intervention with the offer of mediation by the Chief Justice of India, have shaken them out of their complacency. They do not know where they stand. The feeling of bewilderment is reflected in the Chancellor's address to the Viceroy. Several of the Princes would be glad to have nothing to do with Federation. But they can not at this stage back out of it. Lord Linlithgow's attitude was the same as those of his predecessor: "No compulsion about you must." A Federation brought about under the present conditions and in the present temper of the Princes and of the Congress which controls seven Provincial Governments, is bound to be attended with constant friction. The Princes, at least much of them as are not fully aware of the implications of the political situation as it has developed, might be allowed to take their own time to decide whether or not they should come into the Federation and when they should come in if they decide to do so. In fact, as we have suggested before, for the present Federation might be confined to the British Indian provinces. If the bigger and better governed States wish to join immediately they may do so. But the majority of the States, represented by His Highness the Jam Saheb, may be excused from having to make up their mind in the next six or twelve months. The Jam Saheb said that the Princes are ready to carry out administrative reforms but they do not see the necessity of constitutional reforms. Administrative reforms without constitutional reforms have no guarantee of permanence. What a good ruler adopts may be rejected by his successor. In fact, there is the same danger in responsible government unless it is surrounded by conditions which prevent it from degenerating into a party dog-fight.

Constitutional reform there must be, but there are very good reasons why it need not be "responsible government" in the sense that the Ministers are responsible to the Legislature and liable to be dismissed from office by an adverse vote in it. This feature of the British system is seen to be found even in such a perfect democracy like the Swiss Federation. The Federal Councillors are not responsible in the Parliamentary sense of the term and do not resign when their measures are rejected. "It is in fact a general maxim of public life in Switzerland," observes Lowell, "that an official gives his advice, and, like a lawyer or an architect, he does not feel obliged to throw up his position because his advice is rejected." The President of the United States is as irresponsible during his term of office as a King his Ministers being responsible to him and not to Congress. Constitutional reform in the States must conform to their special requirements. We published in the Reformer of March 4, a draft by a distinguished Indian administrator, which might serve as a pattern for the States to model their constitutions on.

SOUTH AFRICAN SEGREGATION BILL.

The Durban correspondent of the Hindu writes in a message dated the 12th March that the news published on the previous day that the Segregation Bill will probably not be passed during the session of the Union Parliament was greeted with great relief by the South African Indian community. The message went on to say that the Secretary of the Indian Congress, Mr. Kajee, stated that if the news was correct, he felt that the situation was more hopeful than it had been for some time. Mr. Kajee added that they were not, however, relaxing their vigilance in holding protest meetings at various places in Natal. We trust that the Bill has been postponed indefinitely. The dignity, moderation and careful presentment of facts, which characterise the representations of the South African Indian organisations, can not but carry conviction to any one who is not fanatically prejudiced against Indians. We publish today excerpts from the representation of the South African Indian Congress to the Minister of the Interior. It is a model of what such representations should be. The Natal Indian Congress held its first Conference in December and we have before us an admirably got up copy of its proceedings. Prominent among its contents is a letter from Mr. Stuttaford, Minister of the Interior, in which he conveys his good wishes for the success of the Conference adding that its proceedings will be of considerable value to his Department, "provided they are expressed with moderation and that the Congress appreciates that other interests must also be considered in regard to some of the motions to be debated." That tried friend of Indians, Mr. Jan Hofmeyr sent his warm greetings and hoped that the Conference will stimulate the sense of unity among Indians in Natal and promote their social and educational advancement. The Conference was opened by the Agent-General for the Government of India, Mr. B. Rama Rau, in a business-like speech in which he reviewed the position of Indians in South Africa balancing the gains won and the losses suffered in a perfectly objective manner. He was followed by Mr. Duncan Burnside, M. P., who pleaded strongly for fairplay to Indians :

> A great figure in history once said that if you wanted to keep a man in the gutter you must stay there with him yourself and the force of that dictum can be seen clearly in South Africa, where the continued depression of non-European living standards has been the chief cause of the remarkable and tragic spread of poor whiteism throughout South Africa in the last 20 years or so. In a highly productive world it is foolish to think we can carry on satisfactorily with a low consuming power. With a deplorably low standard of living, forced upon them in the main by the European community, the Indian is a low consumer. He can be developed into a real live economic asset by having his consuming power considerably increased, which is the same thing as saying by having his standard of living raised.

Mr. Burnside said that he found generally that the economic case for the Indian community roused in most thoughtful people a considerable amount of sympathy and he was more than ever convinced that, if the difficulties of Indians were brought continually to the notice of the European section of the population, a great deal of very useful assistance would be rendered to them.

The attitude of the Indian community as voiced in the South African Indian Congress and the Natal Indian Conference, is typical of the self-restraint and moderation exhibited by it in dealing with problems keenly affecting its deepest sentiments. This is stated as follows in one of the papers presented at the Conference on ownership of land by Indians :

Facts prove that whilst the Indian community is categorically opposed to any scheme or policy of racial segregation, and this principle was vindicated when the Asiatic Bill was withdrawn in 1936 and the Cape Town Agreement entered into between the Indian and Union Governments, the Indian community in practice has respected the susceptibilities of the European community. Expansion, which must in the nature of things take place, has been into areas contiguous to those occupied by members of the Indian community for a considerable number of years. In Durban after a stay of over 75 years, there are not more than twelve Indian properties in what are known as select European areas, and some of these Indian settled on the Berea when it was virgin bush. The sooner the bogey of penetration is exploded the better will it be for all concerned.

The Indians are self-respecting people who do not thrust themselves where they are not welcome. Few Indians feel honoured by living among Europeans though they keenly resent being subjected to a legal prohibition to them. The Natal Indian Congress has arrived at a working agreement with the Natal Municipal Administration, whereby individual Indians are deterred from purchasing residential sites in European areas, and the Conference recorded its opinion that this arrangement has worked most satisfactorily.

CONGRESS POLITY.

The proceedings of the Tripuri Congress were remarkable for the appreciative references to Signor Mussolini, Herr Hitler and Mr. Stalin by more than one important Congress leader. The Chairman of the Reception Committee, Seth Govind Das set the example in his inaugural address welcoming the delegates. Without any 'if' or 'but' he compared Gandhiji to these Dictators. He said:

> Our Congress organisation can be compared with the Fascist Party of Italy, the Nazi Party of Germany and the Communist Party of Russia; although they have embraced violence and we are wedded to the creed of non-violence. All the inhabitants of Italy are not Fascists, the entire German public is not Nazi, neither are all Russians Communists; yet almost all Italians, Germans and Russians have faith in their respective parties. Every Indian is not a four-anna member of the Congress, yet all Indians are with the Congress. Mahatma Gandhi occupies the same position among Congressmen as that held by the leadership of Mussolini among Fascists, Hitler among Nazis, and Stalin among Communists.

Seth Govind Das may not know that Fascism, Nazism and Stalinism are founded in opposition to Democracy which the Congress professes. But this can not be said of Mr. Aney or Mr. Govind Vallabh Pant. Mr. Aney is the leader of the Congress Democratic Party. Praise from him is praise indeed. He told the Congress:

> The country had to place implicit confidence in its leader. However much Herr Hitler, Sgr. Mussolini and M. Lenin might be considered dictators, it could not but be admitted that they had raised the status of their countries in the eyes of the world.

Pandit Govind Vallabh Pant is the Prime Minister of the United Provinces, responsible to the Legislature of his Province. His defence and eulogy of the Dictators was thorough-going:

> Wherever nations had progressed it was under the leadership of one man. Germany had relied on Herr Hitler. Whether they agreed with Herr Hitler's methods or not there was no gainsaying the fact that Germany had progressed under Herr Hitler. Similarly Italy had risen because of Sgr. Mussolini and Lenin raised the Russia of to-day.

Mr. Meherally:—President, I must object as a Socialist to Pandit Pant putting Lenin, Mussolini and Hitler in the same group. (Laughter.)

Pandit Pant continued that he disliked many things that Herr Hitler and Sgr. Mussolini did, but despite their many faults their respective peoples loved them.

General Franco also should be added to the galaxy. The President-elect of the Congress, Mr. Subhas Chandra Bose whom Seth Govind Das was welcoming, had very recently repudiated the imputation of the Statesman that he (Mr. Bose) favoured Fascist ideology. But he has openly stated more than once his conviction that India should cultivate the friendship of all countries without reference to the form of their government. He may not agree with the Chairman of the Reception Committee that Gandhiji's position in relation to the Congress was identical with that of the Italian and German Dictators. Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru hates Fascism and Nazism and he denounces in the Congress the Democracies for not having made war on both. He could not have relished the tribute paid to them by Mr. Aney and Pandit Govind Vallabh Pant. What Gandhiji himself thinks of the express and implied comparison of him with Stalin, Hitler and Mussolini, must for the present be a matter of speculation. Stalin has publicly declared that he has no great opinion of Gandhiji and the Mahatma of him. Mussolini believes in the use of force as a sacred duty of a leader and that is an integral part of the Fascist creed. To say as Pandit Pant did, that he admires Fascism but disapproves of its methods is like saying that one wants to go to Heaven but does not wish to die. An authoritative statement of the Nazi creed is contained in "Germany Speaks", a symposium by representative leaders, published recently with the imprimatur of Herr Hitler. There are several things in it which are in advance of other political ideologies. For instance, the term "nation," Dr. Arthur Gutt says in his exposition of Nazi population policy, "should not be solely applied to those persons who are contemporary to one another at any given moment, but also to all their ancestors and descendants. It is essential, therefore, to remember that the nation implies the element of timelessness, as this circumstance has an important bearing upon all the efforts made to preserve the national health, and the numerical strength of the nation." Readers of the Reformer are aware that we have always given due weight to the achievements of the Fascist, Nazi and Soviet regimes. If there were not essential elements of truth in them, they would not have done in a few short years what they have to raise the condition of their respective peoples. Even a consistent antagonist of dictatorships like Mr. H. N. Brailsford writes in the current New Statesman in high appreciation of the great work of reclaiming the Libyan desert which has been accomplished by the Fascist regime. It will be foolish to reject out of political prejudice the lessons which the new ideologies have forced to the front in our days. Absolute obedience to the Party leader is, no doubt, enforced both in the Fascist and the Nazi regimes, but that is their weak and not their strong point and the one on which they are sure to founder.

Dr. Herman Finer in his "Theory and Practice of Modern Government" observes:

> Genius systems like Bismarck's, Mussolini's and Lenin's, kill any but their original incumbents, or are themselves destroyed by the world of average men who demand a machine which shall be continuously manageable by them and their average successors. Bismarck's successors broke under the strain and finally the system was lowered to the stature of ordinary shoulders. Was there not more in Bismarck's sayings

'Were it all to come over again, I would be republican and democrat,' than mere resentment at his dismissal?

Gandhiji is not cut out for a Bismarck, Mussolini or Lenin. Far from it. Mr. C. Rajagopalacharya, the Madras Prime Minister, eschewed these foreign parallels and fell back upon the homely one, which every peasant at the plough understands in India, of Avatar. In effect, he paraphrased the Gita verse in his exhortation to Congressmen to sail in Gandhiji's boat which will surely lead them to the shore of Swaraj,

Tameva svaranam gachcha sarva bhavena, Bharata

Tatprasadat param santim sthanam prapsyasi sasvatham.

"Take refuge in Him with all thy heart, O Bharata, by His grace shalt thou attain supreme peace, the eternal abode." The Tripuri Congress has made it clear that we have to deal with the Gandhian ideology as a religious cult and not as a political system. Implicit faith, the surrender of body, mind and possessions, are what are demanded of the devotee. Those who can not honestly accept these conditions have no place in it. Mr. Subhas Bose, Mr. Srinivasa Iyengar, Mr. Aney, with different religious outlooks, were defeated by the faithful. But "the genius system" can not last. Their time will come.

CONGRESS AFTER TRIPURI.

The Congress session at Tripuri was clouded by the illness of its President, Mr. Subhas Chandra Bose. In other circumstances, there is no doubt that Mr. Bose would have stayed out of the Congress and another President would have led the proceedings. But the differences which had arisen between him and the Working Committee, prevented this commonsense method of meeting a difficulty. Mr. Bose remained at Tripuri for the full session and, though he was unable to attend most of the meetings in person, he was available for consultation or negotiation at every stage. In the absence of the President, Maulana Abul Kalam Azad, the senior-most ex-President of the Congress, himself a rival candidate for this year's Presidentship before he withdrew on grounds of health, acted as Chairman.

The Congress session this year is remarkable for the few resolutions adopted in the open session. The most important of these was the "rightist" resolution which sought a vote of confidence in Gandhiji and an endorsement of the policy of the old Working Committee. At first sight the election of the President and the adoption of the "rightist" resolution taken in combination, appear to be a vindication of democratic principles. The Congress Party asserted itself in electing its President, regardless of the tremendous pressure brought to bear upon it to choose another man. Having done so, it followed it up by forcing on him the policy of the opposition. The Party, it would appear from this, had established its independence. But first appearances are often deceptive. A close examination reveals a different interpretation of the many forces that brought about this result.

From the first it was obvious that the "rightists" had changed their tactics. In his immediate reaction to Mr. Bose's election, Gandhiji had outlined the attitude of himself and his supporters. They would leave the field free for Mr. Bose's men without obstructing their work but co-operating as far as it was possible. Between that attitude and the Tripuri resolution there was a world of difference. In the month that intervened, the "rightists" had discovered the weakness of the parties which supported Mr. Bose. And the Rajkot interlude had strengthened their hands. When they came before the All India Congress Committee at Tripuri, they determined to refuse support unless their policies were first affirmed. Mr. Bose was to be bound down to accept a Working Committee nominated by Gandhiji. It is significant that whether in the Indian States or in British India, the "right" Congress leaders had evolved a technique to which they strictly adhered. At Rajkot the ruler was to be forced into acceptance of a reforms committee nominated by Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel. At Tripuri faced with a more determined opposition, Gandhiji himself entered the field and Mr. Bose was compelled to accept the nominations of Gandhiji. Popular leader or autocratic prince, both have to be reduced to the position of constitutional head to a "right-wing" cabinet. The thought must have often passed through the minds of Mr Bose's friends that, but for the grace of God, the Thakore Saheb's invidious position might have been occupied by their indomitable leader. There is, however, a difference. In the States the Congress right wing is fighting a power in authority and the whole technique of Congress politics is that of an opposition party. In British India the right wing is in power in the Congress and in the eight provinces. As such it forms a vested interest and it has to face an opposition which has all the advantages of irresponsibility. Today large sections of the left are afraid to cut loose from the parent body but that fear cannot last. The significance of Tripuri is not so much the majority that endorsed the resolution of confidence in Gandhiji but the not insignificant minority that opposed it. With the Congress Socialists standing neutral, it is difficult to imagine so much resistance to the right wing.

Mr. Bose after Tripuri occupies a position analogous to that of an American President who is in opposition to his Congress. He continues in office. Partly perhaps with a view to end this position of stalemate at an early date, the Subjects Committee has altered the date of the annual session to December. A resolution was adopted in the open session, rather hurriedly we think, fixing the next session in Bihar, the earlier resolution leaving the decision to the All India Congress Committee being waived aside. How smoothly the new arrangement will function, will depend on Gandhiji who has to suggest the names of the Working Committee. The words "in accordance with the wishes of Gandhiji" leave a wide latitude. They can also be interpreted in a narrow sense. We have no doubt that a more generous attitude will prevail in the case of the Congress President than was finally adopted with the Thakore of Rajkot. The dislocation caused by disobedience of Gandhiji's mandate in the election of the President, will no doubt carry its warning to the provincial committees and the next presidential election will find a more subservient electorate. Surely the right wing and its distinguished leader will be able to devise a method of marking time for the next eight months!

We do not understand what exactly the Congress majority meant in endorsing the leadership of Gandhiji and the past policy of the Working Committee. We would like a clear exposition of the position by some one who can speak with authority. In the years that have passed since Gandhiji assumed leadership of the Congress, there have been many policies in regard to British India, to the States, to foreign countries, to British Imperialism, even to the new constitution. From opposition to law courts to litigation on wills; from boycott of legislatures to office acceptance; from non-intervention in the States to active participation in agitation; from relentless opposition to Imperialism to alliance; we have passed through the whole gamut of political emotion. Even at Tripuri the States resolution, despite the protestations of its framers, marked a departure from the Haripura policy adopted only last year. Take the day-to-day policy of the Congress, say in Rajkot where the incidents are fresh enough. Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel tells the public one day that the Thakore Saheb is acting unaccountably in dispensing with the services of an experienced administrator like Sir Patrick Cadell; and again three days afterwards, that Sir Patrick should know better than to hang on after he has been dismissed. Again, as regards the reforms committee, Sardar Vallabhbhai in a letter accepts the Thakore's rejection of certain names as unsuitable; then Gandniji insists on all the Sardar's nominations being accepted, and on one of the rejected men being made president of the Committee; and then again he gives it up on the intervention of the Viceroy. If this is what the Congress wants, it is not policy but the complete lack of it. Democracy is not, we may point out, a system of election; it means or should mean fundamentally that the public has the choice between clear-cut issues. By that test, the Congress fails to couform to any known system. It is nearest to autocracy. Pandit Govind Vallabh Pant extolled the virtues of benevolent autocracy. Everyone can say what an autocracy is. But whether a system is benevolent or not, depends on which side the observer finds himself on. That there are many who find the Congress as now managed intolerable, is proved by those who voted against the "Rightist" resolution and even by the very fact that such a resolution was thought to be necessary for rhe first time in the history of the Congress.

PROBLEMS OF THE INDUSTRIAL WORKER

(By Dr. H. P. Dastur)

I lay stress on improving living and working conditions. This is the only way I see for an amicable settlement of capital-labour trouble, for it is the only way that can benefit all concerned—the workman, the owner, the industry and the State—and such a reform must go by this axiom if it is to succeed as a permanent measure. For such a success, the State, the owner and the workman have to work in complete co-operation. Broadly speaking, improvement of living conditions should be primarily the concern of the State, but the owner must be there to help the State with full-blooded co-operation. Improvement of working conditions should be the responsibility of the owner, but the State should back him up with all its organised machinery. To give concrete examples. It is for the State to tackle the problem of nutrition. The State must make available for industrial districts proper sorts of food, and undertake intensive organization for increasing the quantity of milk produced, improving its quality and bringing it within easy reach of the industrial worker. This is bound to take some time. But at present a whole lot of useful buttermilk is going waste in the country. The State can begin tackling this problem by transporting such buttermilk at cheap rates into industrial districts. That done, the employer must co-operate by distributing such foods through his canteens and his creches, and by organising a noon-day lunch of the right sort for the workers.

Education is another item the State must tackle. Primary education should be compulsory and the employer can help the State by converting his creches and canteens and dispensary into centres of anti-natal and post-natal clinics, kindergarten and Montessori classes, and sanitary instruction.

Any attempt by the owner to improve working conditions will require medical examinations of his workmen. Such examinations are bound to pick up every now and then workmen suffering from tuber-culosis and similar other disabling diseases. Such workmen are working not from any love for their work, but because they have only two alternatives before them—to die of the disease or to die of disease—plus starvation. They naturally prefer the first. If the owner discharges them, (and that is the only thing he can and must do) it is bound to cause trouble all round, unless the municipality and the State co-operate with him and enable the owner to refer such cases to a proper hospital or institute where the workman should obtain, at the least, appreciably better comforts and facilities than anything he can get at his own home. Such a co-operation between State and owner would benefit all concerned. The workman will get the attention he badly needs, the owner will replace an inefficient worker with an efficient one which will mean better production for the industry, and over such policy the State will find that year after year it has less and less of such diseased workmen to take care of at public expense. There is a whole lot of avoidable illness which can be removed this way, and then alone will it be possible to evolve a workable scheme of sickness insurance for the worker. More than that, it is only then that the State, the owner and the workman can and will be ready and willing to pay their share towards the working of the insurance scheme.

But what part should the workman play in such a reform? I have been doing some work in indus-trial medicine for the Tata Hydro-Electric Company. I have come to certain conclusions as to how this work should be done. Sir Thomas Legge, a physician, senior medical inspector of factories of England, and medical adviser to the Trades Union Congress, has done a huge amount of work in this line. In 1934 he published a book on industrial maladies. Therein he enunciates a few axioms which should be adopted if industrial medicine is to show one hundred per cent success. What little experience I have in the same line goes to confirm the truth of those axioms. The one on which he lays most stress is "unless and until the employer has done everything—and everything means a good deal—the workman can do next to nothing to protect himself, although he is naturally willing enough to do his share." The second axiom is, "If you can bring an influence to bear external to the workman (i. e. one over which he has no control), you will be successful, and if you cannot or do not, you will never be wholly successful." To give concrete examples, it is a question of anti-malarial measures, it is no use asking the workman to use a mosquito-net and take quinine. Even to supply him with these things would be useless. The thing to do is to provide him with mosquito-proof houses and destroy all breeding places of the mosquito from around his mile area of his quarters. If it is a question of causing lung diseases, it is no use asking him to use a respirator. The work-room should be rendered dust free. If it is glare damaging his eyes, every-thing should be done first to remove the source of the glare before asking him to wear goggles. If any work is causing eye-strain, some research work should be first undertaken to study the position, nature, intensity, colour, etc., of the light supplied to the workman before asking him to use glasses.

I am doing some amount of work in the line of accident compensation. In the case of one woman I had to certify one hundred per cent disability. The award came to near Rs. 1,500/-. The Commissioner of Compensation refused to pay her cash, but told her to go to her village and buy a plot of land, and then approach him through village authorities for payment of the price of the land. This was a move in the right direction. Had he paid her cash, she would have been robbed of all the money within one year, leaving her a beggar and a drag on society. The same will happen to the textile worker if all that is done for him is to pay him a little higher wage.

This industry is at present paying maternity allowance. This helps nobody, not even the woman who receives the allowance. In a great majority of cases it is grabbed by the husband to do what he may like with it, but despite the allowance, the woman lives the same life, eats the same food, works or does not work in the same way as she did when she had no allowance. The allowance in no way helps her to improve her efficiency, enrich her motherhood, or better her progeny. I do assert that the one and most important and urgent thing to do is to take all care of the pregnant woman, and the nursing mother. My methods, however, differ. I would collect every rupee that is now paid as maternity allowance, and as much more as I can possibly draw out from the State and the owner, for one can never be doing enough in this line. A mother is a national asset, the one main source of national wealth and energy. I would turn all the money into pure milk, and make sure that every ounce of it goes into her stomach, by distributing it through a place I can control. The creche would come handy. Cash payment of maternity allowance is a drag which a sorely tried industry can ill afford. But if the allowance was given as suggested above, it would benefit all concerned. The woman will get the one chance she urgently needs for improving her efficiency and her progeny. The owner will lay a solid lasting foundation for obtaining an efficient workman in future, the State will get a better citizen, and the industry will profit through better co-operation that will follow between the workman and the owner.

The creche as managed at present is another drag on the industry, for it is run on lines of charity and not of industrial medicine. Its main activity seems to centre round giving its inmates milk of doubtful quality and perhaps a bath. This sort of expense brings no return to the owner or benefit to the industry. But a creche to be really useful and beneficial to all concerned should be a centre or anti-natal and post-natal clinic for the pregnant woman and nursing mother, a centre of education for the children on Kindergarten and Montessori line, and a centre for extensive propaganda for all on subjects like nutrition, prohibition of drink, sanitation, etc. It should be in charge of a person trained in welfare work on lines of industrial medicine and in modern systems of education. Such a creche would of course require all the co-operation that the State can give the owner before it can develop to its full height. Such, and such a creche alone, can be of any use to all concerned. Money spent on such a creche would in time return to the industry with compound interest. That seems to be the experience of all those who have worked a creche on these lines in Europe and America.

It is sometimes said that the administrative cost of welfare work would be prohibitive for an industry like the Bombay Textile Industry. I do not know. Perhaps that may be so when such work is done through outside agencies, or when they are run on lines of charity and not of industrial medicine. In a way, the name 'welfare work' itself is a misnomer. 'Efficiency-drive' work would be a better name. But the Tata Hydro-Electric works, is run by an honorary committee drawn from the staff of the Company. Their administrative cost is negligible, and they do not merely dole out money to applicants. They follow each applicant's activity at home and at work and give help only after satisfying themselves that the same will go towards his uplift. It is, however, quite true that the major part of work in Industrial medicine calls for a heavy initial expense, and sometimes even the running expense is a formidable item. In one camp of the Tata Hydro-Electric Company, we are spending every year over Rs. 2,000/- on anti-larval work only, and all that for a population of only 300, all told. Yet the authorities are satisfied that this is money well spent, and it seems to be the experience of all those who are doing a large amount of work in Industrial medicine in Europe and America that it is a sound investment for every industry to undertake.

It may also be argued that the Bombay Textile worker is full of distrust against the owner and is not likely to take kindly to such activities, and he becomes all the more suspicious when the owner tells him that he proposes to do anything for his welfare. The best way to disarm him of his suspicions is to start work in Industrial medicine on a broad basis in co-operation with the State, no matter what the difficulties may be in the beginning. It is the experience of all those who have worked in this line that the benefit that such work can distribute all round, soon tempts everybody concerned to come running to offer his full co-operation.

The urgent need of the hour seems to be an inquiry as to how the State and the owner should co-operate with each other in order to increase the efficiency of the industrial worker. When the two between them have played their part fully, the workman will have an irresistible case for an increase in his wage, the industry will be in a strong position to afford it, and the owner will gladly pay it, for, by then, he will fully realise that to do so is to adopt one sole way of increasing still further the workman's efficiency, and the industry's profits.

II.

A living wage standard is one that would secure such living and working conditions as would enable the workman to keep fit mentally, morally and physically, and to do his work efficiently. Such a wage will have to be paid partly in kind and partly in coin. To give the workman only a little more money, leaving all his other living and working conditions where they are at present would enable the employer to cry out with enough justification that he cannot afford it, and tempt the workman too with some justification to ask for still more. If by living wage is meant only a little more money for the workman, it will not help efficiency in any way. The rotter amongst the workmen will only spend more on drink, litigation, useless injections, still more useless patent medicines, bad food, etc., and his efficiency will degenerate all the more. The steady and sober amongst the men will save the extra money in order to take a longer holiday than that he is used to in order to get out of his trying living and working conditions; or he will send a little more money to his village, but he will just do nothing to improve his efficiency unless the State and the employer come out to help him in the right way. But if by living wage is meant improving his living and working conditions that would certainly improve his efficiency and that without adding a pie to his wages. Prohibition, proper residential quarters with enough air, light and water, wholesome food, etc., would improve his living conditions to a great extent. Occupational diseases are causing inefficiency, and they are preventible. Bad conditions of air, light, humidity, etc., are other sources of inefficiency. The workman has certainly a case for higher wages. But higher wages can improve his efficiency only if he is set going on correct lines of living and working conditions. This is also the only way in which the employer can afford to pay higher wages. Bad living and working conditions lead to a progressive mental, moral and physical deterioration and all round inefficiency which higher wages by themselves cannot remove.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

If one is after improving the living and working conditions of the workman, there will be no need to fix the composition of a standard family. But if one is only after finding out how much money the workman should be paid, a group of four, man, wife and two children, may prove a workable standard.

As for housing, if the idea is to find out how much rent he has to pay for a sanitary quarter and count that in the computation of a living or minimum wage, it is not going to answer. Supposing he is spending at present Rs. 2/- on rent and it is found that at least Rs. 5/- are necessary to obtain for him a suitable quarter, and Rs. 3/- extra are added to his wages on account of housing, he will still continue to live in the same place, and use the extra three Rupees in any way except for improving his efficiency or health. His sanitary sense is not at all developed. The thing to do is to set about earnestly developing this sense in him through education, and, till that happens, the State and the employer should take it upon themselves to house him in the proper way. The useful and helpful thing to do is to carry to his doors proper clothing and fuel through a co-operative society in the mills or near his house; failing that, the State should intervene to put down all exploitation, especially of the poorer workman by the merchants. House-lighting should be provided for him by the employer or the State until such time as a proper sanitary sense is developed in him.

Transport: The workman generally prefers to stay even in a dirty hovel near the mills rather than live in a better place far away from the mills. This is chiefly to save time and partly to save expense. If the workman is given a sanitary dwelling-place near he mills, the question of transport will not arise.

Holiday: A fortnight's holiday every year with pay would make for efficiency. At present inordinate absenteeism is one of the troubles of the owner. A holiday with pay may help the owner indirectly also if it were made conditional on a certain amount of regular work during the year.

Expenditure on medical relief: This should be borne purely by the State and the employer, or a sickness insurance scheme should be worked out where the workman pays a small sum as an insurance against sickness and something like a panel system now in vogue in European countries may be adopted.

Insurance, interest on and repayment of debt' social and ceremonial expenditure these items can be worked through a co operative bank, preferably in charge of the Millowners' Association in the same way as the insurance business of the mill is run by them.

Human needs and rights of a workman are the same all over. To that extent the provisions would not differ from centre to centre. But prices of food and cloth are likely to be different from centre to centre. There would be some variation on that account.

If it is a question of improving the workman's living and working conditions, it will probably be found that with improvements in such conditions it will not be necessary for his wife to go to work, and it will be best for all concerned to let her mind her home and children. If she must work, I would rather she engaged herself in some cottage industry at home. She goes to work generally because the family in the present state of living and working conditions cannot make both ends meet. But if it is only a question of paying a little more or less in wages, leaving everything elsewhere it is, wages of other members of the family should be taken into account.

I am in favour of establishing a minimum standard of living and working conditions which the employer must fulfil before he can start a mill. When that is done a minimum wage would find its natural level without any trouble and to the satisfaction of both sides, for that would add to the efficiency of the workman and progress of the industry. But if the only idea is to find out how much money he should be paid as a minimum wage, leaving everything else where it is, it is not going to lead anywhere. On the contrary, that will make confusion more confounded for without adding anything to his efficiency it will only wet his appetite for asking more and more from an employer and an industry which can afford less and less.

The minimum wage must be based on the principle of helping him to improve and keep his efficiency at a high level by keeping himself fit mentally, morally and physically.

A research department under control of the State which should be constantly working to find out what reaction the worker's efficiency has on the machine he is working and vice-versa.

To prevent the minimum wage from becoming the maximum, Profit-sharing should be introduced.

The first charge on the finances of the industry to set it going should be for up-to-date machinery, proper living and working conditions for the workmen and administrative charges. Once it begins to make profit the first charge on the profit should be a certain fixed interest on capital investment. Any profit over and above that should be divided into four suitable parts, one part for capital invested, one for the workman, one for such indirect welfare measures as are suggested here, and one for renovation of machinery and other unforeseen expenses.

A very great majority live in single room tenements. A great majority of these rooms give lodging to more than one family. It should be compulsory on the employer to provide housing accommodation for his workers, and the State should see that they are of the right sort.

THE EAST AFRICAN CONGRESS AND THE TANGANYIKA LEAGUE.

(By P. A. Mehta.)

It seems clear that one of the main objects of the visit of His Highness the Aga Khan to Ganda and Mr. Vallabhbhai Patel was to induce the Congress to support the demands of Europeans in East Africa with regard to Tanganyika. It is also probable that Mr. Patel may go to East Africa for that purpose. But though Mr. Patel has not contradicted the Press reports of his talks with H.H. the Aga Khan, he has shown restraint in not making any rash statement on the question of Tanganyika. It would be tragic for Indian interests in East Africa if the Congress were to support the claims of the Tanganyika League which has been formed in East Africa to oppose the return of Tanganyika to Germany. Indians in East Africa are divided on this question. Indians here should not express any opinion without studying the problem in the light of East African history.

After the abandoning of Czechoslovakia by France and Britain in 1938, the Europeans in Kenya felt nervous about the security of Tanganyika. The leaders of the Settlers who had worked in the past to bring about the elimination of Indians from Kenya, formed the Tanganyika League with the object of organizing public opinion against the return of Tanganyika to Germany. Lord Francis Scot, the leader of the settlers, became president of the League and Major Cavendish-Bentick its moving spirit. The main support of the League came from Englishmen in Kenya. It may seem surprising that the Europeans, particularly the settlers of Kenya, should have exerted themselves so violently against the transfer of Tanganyika. Therein lies the key to the understanding of the whole question.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The settlers in Kenya have not been able to put into operation all their ideas of oppressing and exploiting the natives of Kenya and of driving out or disabling the Indians in Kenya, because Kenya is a Crown Colony and unofficial Europeans are in a minority in the Legislative Council. They have, therefore, been agitating for self-government which means government of 3 million Africans and 40 thousand Indians by about 18 thousand White men. Informed opinion in England has been emphatic in the view that such a betrayal of the trust reposed by millions of Africans in the British nation cannot take place in the present circumstances. The analogy of South Africa does not help because South Africa is a vast country with a large European population. The Settlers in Kenya have, therefore, been directing all their efforts to bring about a federation of Kenya, Tanganyika and Uganda. With such a combination, an East African Dominion would emerge and any demand made by it for self-government would undoubtedly succeed. Tanganyika had at first been resisting such overtures from Kenya but the most unwilling maiden would succumb to organised courtship and recently the European Chamber of Commerce of Tanganyika favoured such a union of the territories. Without Tanganyika there can be no East African Dominion and Kenya would remain under the influence of the Colonial Office and, through it, be governed by opinion in Britain.

One technical objection to such a union is that Tanganyika is a Mandated Territory. It cannot be federated without the consent of the other League Powers but such consent can readily be secured. The Tanganyika League, taking advantage of the German scare, demands that Tanganyika should come under the British flag and be British Territory in name as it is in fact. The return of Tanganyika to Germany would frustrate the fondest dreams of the settlers of creating an East African Dominion, like South Africa. It would defeat their fixed purpose of destroying Indian interests in East Africa. The White Highlands cannot be legally reserved for Europeans only, so long as the affairs of Kenya are controlled by Parliament. That is the main reason why the Tanganyika League is wholly dominated by Kenya politicians.

The issue clearly is whether Indians in East Africa as a whole would suffer more by a union of the East African Territories than by the return of Tanganyika to its old masters. It is very doubtful if Indians in Tanganyika would be treated like the Jews if the territory were to go to Hitler. But taking the worst possibility only about 20,000 Indians would suffer, whereas about 80,000 Indians would lose their rights in any federation of East Africa. The question is to be decided in a far-sighted way. The long view is in the end the right view.

The organizers of the Tanganyika League were advised to invite Indians to join forces with them to avert the danger of the loss of Tanganyika. They approached the East African Indian National Congress. The latter passed a resolution advocating the principle of self-determination when the natives of Tanganyika became ready for it and in the meanwhile supported the continuation of the mandate. But the European settlers would have none of this. So the Congress meekly passed another resolution advocating the administration of Tanganyika under the British Flag. The Indian National Congress stands for severing the British connection in India whereas the East African Congress recommended the inclusion of a mandated territory under the British flag. There was no greater triumph for European settlers than this. Indians in Tanganyika were not impressed by this spineless action of the Congress. Attempts were made to get a similar resolution passed in Dar-es-salaam, but public opinion was so much against any co operation with the Tanganyika League that the resolution had to be dropped and the Secretary of the Indian Association resigned. The Congress must have felt very small after this defeat. But the co-operation not only continues but now we hear of the forthcoming visit of Mr. A. B. Patel to save the territory for the British. No one thought of inviting him when the Highlands Order-in-Council was proposed in Kenya. Let us hope that Mr. Patel will not co-operate with the European settlers unless they guarantee the elementary rights of Indians in East Africa. When Tanganyika was under German rule, Indians were allowed to stay in German hotels. In Kenya they cannot stay in any hotel. In Tanganyika under the Mandate, British race prejudice is gaining and once it becomes a British Colony, there will be nothing left for Indians save protests and deputations. The first thing to do in East Africa is not to save Tanganyika from the Aryan Germans but to save Indians from the Kenya Settlers.

SEGREGATION OF INDIANS IN SOUTH AFRICA.*

The present demand by certain Europeans for the segregation of the Indian community is no new development in the party politics of this country. A similar agitation which had been raised in the country in an intense form during the years 1918 and 1920 resulted in the appointment of the Asiatic Enquiry Commission in 1920. This Commission toured throughout the whole Union and heard evidence from local authorities, members of Parliament and European organisations, including the White South Africa League which had been formed specially to tender evidence before the Commission and press the request for segregation. This impartial and judicial Commission found that the allegations made against Indians were baseless and in paragraph 224 of their Report, strongly condemned the policy of segregation.

The Union Government in 1924 introduced the Class Areas Bill which sought to segregate Indians within specified areas. This Bill was not proceeded with due to the resignation of the then Government, but a similar Bill known as the "Areas Reservation Bill" was introduced by the Union Government in 1926. Both these measures evoked intense indignation and bitterness in the minds of the Indians both in South Africa and in India. The 1926 Bill led to the visit to this country of a deputation from the Government of India headed by the late Sir George Paddison, and including as its members Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikari and Sir (then Syed) Raza Ali.

This deputation, after collecting data, submitted evidence to the Select Committee to which the Bill had been referred by Parliament.

The South African Indian Congress gave no evidence before the Select Committee, as its objection was to the fundamental principle underlying the Bill and therefore felt that no purpose would be served by tendering evidence on the details. The strong case made out by the deputation of the Government of India against the principle of the Asiatic Reservation Bill resulted in a Round Table Conference between the Government of India and the Government of the Union of South Africa in Cape Town in 1927. The deliberation of the Conference culminated in the first Cape Town Agreement. On the conclusion of this Agreement the Areas Reservation Bill was withdrawn, the Union Government resolving not to proceed with it.

We strongly submit that the arguments urged against the Asiatic Reservation Bill of 1926 are equally applicable to the Scheme now under consideration. Under the present Scheme action is not to be initiated by any regulative body or local authorities but the application of its provisions would have the same results and would definitely lead to segregation. Indians, especially in the rural towns, where they form a relatively small minority compared to the European residents, would be at the mercy of their European competitors in trade, and of Europeans whose outlook is strongly influenced by colour prejudice. The 75% vote required for the introduction of the servitude clause against coloured occupation would easily be forthcoming, and this would entail the economic ruin and national degradation of the Indian community.

If it is the intention to remove or reduce the causes of racial friction, we submit that the Scheme will have just the contrary effect. Instead of diminishing racial friction it will definitely accentuate it and lead to bitterness between the two sections of the South African people. It will be open to any irresponsible person, actuated by the venom of race prejudice and race hatred, to organise and initiate a move to obtain the requisite 75% votes necessary to enable the insertion of a servitude in the title deeds prohibiting Indian occupation of land within that area. Every such move to exercise the powers of local option will be attended with intensive racial propaganda which will inflame passions and stimulate racial bitterness in the area.

This will recur at frequent intervals in different areas throughout the Union and will create ill-feeling where none exists at present, or has existed in the past. We urge, therefore, that the measure proposed, will assist in fostering just what the Government are attempting to prevent, and that far from improving the relations between Indians and Europeans, it will disturb the present goodwill and friendly relations which exist between them in the vast majority of places in the Union.

Transvaal. The first intimation of your scheme was conveyed to us through your statement to the Ratepayers' Association deputation which interviewed you on December 7th, last year. We presume, therefore, that the scheme under consideration is intended to meet the demands of the Conference convened by the Pretoria Ratepayers' Association, and the request made by the Transvaal Municipal Association. We emphasis that the allegation made by the Pretoria Ratepayers' Asscciation and the Transvaal Municipal Association in respect of penetration by Indians into European areas, is baseless and untrue, and has not been supported by evidence. In refuting the allegation we desire to say that Indian traders are confined within predominstetntly Indian areas, and that there is a very small percentage outside of such areas. Fourther more, only a very small percentage of the total Indian population in Prêtoria is resident outside of predominantly Indian areas.

Natal. We now come to deal with the position of Indians in Natal. Emigration of Indians into Natal commenced in 1860 through insistent demands by White Colonies for the supply of labour on Sugar plantations and for agricultural developments. This emigration was temporarily stopped between 1866 and 1874, when it was resumed on further representation made by the then Lieutenant Governor of Natal to the Secretary of State for Colonies. From the period of their entry into Natal in 1860 Indians developed Sugar, Tea and Mining industries and served on the Railways. The Natal Government gave a solemn undertaking that these Indians would be treated with consideration during their term of indenture and thereafter; and that they would be encouraged to settle in the Province and every facility would be given them to secure their permanent settlement in Natal. To induce them to remain in the country, Indian immigrants were granted free gift of land in lieu of a free return passage to India. The value of Indian labour and, the prosperity it contributed to the country generally, was recorded by the 1907 Commission.

In Natal the bulk of the Indian population is essentially agricultural in character. The rural population of Indians in Natal is estimated by the last census to be 70,218. Of the total acreage of 11,299,260 in the Province of Natal the ownership of land by Indians in the rural areas is computed to be between 100,000 and 125,000 acres, being less than one acre in every 100 acres. In neither the urban nor rural areas of Natal has there been any penetration of Indians into European areas; the normal increase in the Indian population has necessitated expansion, but such expansion has been confined to areas contiguous to those occupied by Indians.

General Considerations. The Boroughs and Townships Ordinances of Natal give powerse to local authorities to prevent Indian purchase of unalienated land. The private Townships Ordinance empowers the township owner to prevent Indian residence in new townships. The Townships Ordinance of the Transvaal prevents Indian occupation of land in new European townships. So far as trade is concerned, the arbitrary operation of the licensing laws has relegated Indian traders to Indian areas. We have consistently protested against the disabilities entailed by the operation of these ordinances and the harsh application of the licensing laws, and sought their repeal. The imposition of fresh disabilities by means of the Scheme now under consideration will involve the ruination and humiliation of the Indian community inasmuch as its provisions will disturb existing lawful occupation of land by Indians.

We have, in the preceding paragraphs, proved that there is no necessity for any disabling legislation of the nature.

The Round Table Conference between the Government of India and the Union of South Africa culminated in the Cape Town agreement and marked a new era in the relationship between India and South Africa. The Indian, who had been deemed an alien, was now acknowledged by the Union Government as a part of the permanent population of this country. The "Uplift" Clause of the Cape Town Agreement indicated in no uncertain terms the policy which the Union Government proposed to follow in the conduct of Indian affairs.

Finally, we wish to point out that more than 85% of the South African Indians were born in this country, but have, as yet, no representation in the Legislatures of the Union. Under the circumstances, it should be the special concern of the Government to see that the interests of this voiceless section are adequately protected.

THE TRADITIONAL HOME OF THE SANDALWOOD TREE.

It is in perfumery that the greater proportion of Sandalwood Oil is employed at the present day and to discriminating buyers, such as perfumers and soap manufacturers must of necessity be, it is hardly necessary to extol the virtues of the East Indian Oil which is without equal, both as a fine perfume base and a fixative for the increasingly popular bouquets of the Oriental type. In addition it is now being used extensively, and with marked success, in the creation of some of the more delicate perfumes in which the Sandalwood odour is not required as a predominant character.

A few trials will convince the perfumer who has not taken full advantage of the odour-value of this oil, that is of the greatest use to him, not only for predominant Sandalwood odour where required, but also a modifier and a fixative for other odours. This is true for liquid perfumes, soaps, creams, powders and all other cosmetic preparations. It will be found invaluable to those up-to-date perfumers who pride themselves on their own "creations."

NOTES.

End of the Rajkot Fast :—Whatever one may think of fasting as a method of solving social and political deadlocks and whatever one may think of its application to the Rajkot case, all will be glad that Gandhiji broke his fast on Tuesday. During the four days and half of its duration, Gandhiji's strength appreciably waned, and its continuance even for a few days longer would have been attended with grave risk to his life. According to Gandhiji's own avowal, it is due entirely to the Viceroy that this calamity was averted. Gandhiji, too, has contributed to the happy result by not standing out for the terms of his ultimatum to the Thakore Sahib. The Thakore Sahib, too, has acted wisely in consenting to the points in dispute, in the correspondence between himself and Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel, being referred to the adjudication of the Chief Justice of India. The Sardar's consent may be presumed from the acceptance of the condition by Gandhiji who has taken the conduct of the Rajkot affair where the Sardar left it. We are glad of this result not only because it puts an end to what had degenerated into a personal squabble between the Thakore Sahib and Sardar Patel, but also, and even more, because it has created an atmosphere of genuine friendliness and goodwill in which the question of constitutional reform in British India and the States can be advanced further. Lord Linlithgow's handling of this very delicate situation has been so satisfactory as to induce Gandhiji to forego his much-desired visit to the Congress now in session at Tripura, in order that he might meet the Viceroy at the first opportunity when he is fit to travel to Delhi. Evidently he feels that there is more important work to be done at Delhi than in Tripura. This, we believe, is the first session of the Congress which Gandhiji has chosen to be conducted by his co-adjutors without his personal guidance since it adopted the creed of non-cooperation. In view of the differences which have arisen over the election of Mr. Subhas Bose to the Presidentship, and the resignation of the majority of members of the Working Committee, Gandhiji's presence and services as conciliator will be much missed at Tripura. The article on the Rajkot fast on another page was written two days before its sudden end.

Was It Necessary?—One can not help asking oneself whether the result of all the commotion caused by the fast, could not have been achieved by less sensational and spectacular means, involving less emotional excitement to the public and less personal distress to individuals. To answer this question it is necessary to assess what exactly the result has been. It is simply that a difference of opinion between the Thakore Sahib of Rajkot and Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel as to the significance of an agreement between them, should be settled by reference to a third party who has no personal interest in the matter. How is it that this obvious expedient did not occur to the Thakore Sahib, to the Sardar or even to Gandhiji? Of the first two, it is possible that each was so sure of his own interpretation that he could not think it possible for any other interpretation to be placed on the agreement. But what of Gandhiji? He accepted the Sardar's interpretation as the only one that could be put upon the documents and assumed that the Thakore Sahib's interpretation was out of the question. He actually proposed in his ultimatum additional onerous terms which the Viceroy has quietly waived. The Viceroy laid his finger on this gap in the controversy as far as it had proceeded and Gandhiji and the Thakore Sahib at once realised that they had been sailing round and round it in an unaccountable way. Without the Viceroy's intervention, it might not have been possible to get the Chief Justice of India to undertake the arbitration. But the question is not a very erudite one and any man of open mind and sound commonsense can decide between the two interpretations as well as the most distinguished lawyer in the country. In fact, the question is not one of law so much as of commonsense. As far as is known the Thakore's notification was not framed by lawyers. Proclamations by rulers are not to be construed in accordance with the General Clauses Act. They must be understood in the light of administrative possibilities. Neither should the powers and limitations of the ruler concerned be left out of calculation. W-come back to the question with which we started, Could not the result actually obtained have been secured without setting the country agog about the fate of Gandhiji? We believe it could and should have been. The Indian public is not educated. The great majority of the people are steeped in illiteracy and superstition. The method of fast, is calculated to aggravate this deficiency.

The Moral Issue:—Most puzzling was the solemn moral issue that was made out of this crassly political business. Of course, you can make a moral issue out of anything. Kaikeyi made a moral issue out of the promise to disinherit Rama which her husband, Dasaratha, had given her in a moment of infatuation. The question here is what the form of government or administration would be which would bring most contentment and intellectual and moral progress to the people of Rajkot. To devise a scheme, a committee is to be appointed. How was this committee to be composed? The Sardar wanted seven men of the Praja Mandal party in a committee of twelve. In practice, these seven men will contribute to the common stock only a single set of ideas: they will vote as one man whether they think like one or not. We see proof of this in the Legislative Assemblies, in the Legislative Councils, in the Congress itself. The good party man has voluntarily to have his brain sterilised. It will be the same whether you have seven members of the Praja Parishad or decree that the vote of one member of the Parishad shall count as seven. An English king in the eighteenth century saved his Government from defeat in the House of Lords by ordering that the vote of a fat peer should count as sixteen, the number needed to make up a majority. If there was a real moral issue, the Chief Justice of India can not annul, alter or otherwise modify it one way or another. The acceptance of adjudication by the Chief Justice is a tacit admission that there is no moral principle involved in the matter on which he is required to adjudicate. It is important to get our minds clear on the point because we yield to none in our faith in the supremacy of the moral law as binding equally on rulers and subjects. The thrusting of the moral issue to the front without adequate cause and putting it aside when the exigencies of a controversy no longer demand it, definitely works for the debasement of the moral currency and the consequent lowering of the moral tone of public life. It is, therefore, best as far as possible to avoid raising a moral issue in political disputes. The only working hypothesis on which public life can be maintained at a tolerable level is that all parties and persons concerned are equally honest and equally fallible. Lord Linlithgow has dealt with the question, as his Excellency has to deal with hundreds of others, as a purely administrative transaction.

A Magic Change:—Whatever else the Rajkot episode might or might not have done, it has changed as if by magic the political situation in a most vital respect. It has undone the effects of a decade's tirade against British Imperialism in a single day. The cool-headed—someone once spoke of him as cold-blooded—Prime Minister of Madras told an Associated Press correspondent at Tripuri that Lord Linlithgow has earned the gratitude of the millions of India. His Excellency has won the admiration of thousands who take an intelligent interest in politics. And he has done this without visible effort. It all seems to have come so naturally, spontaneously. If he and his advisers in Great Britain and India had set themselves to discover a method of making British Imperialism popular in this country after the daily diatribes of some of the most popular leaders, they could not have hit upon one a hundredth as efficacious as the sequel to Gandhiji's fast. The representative of British Imperialism today is the most popular man in the country. He has saved the life of Gandhiji. Gandhiji has been lavish in his praise, not only in praise of him but of Englishmen generally. We suggest that the personal popularity of the Viceroy should bring about a considerably modified attitude on the part of our leaders towards his views on Federation. To be plain, the prospects of Federation coming, perhaps with a few modifications, at an early date, has been considerably accelerated by the Rajkot interlude. There are no compartments in the public mind. On the one hand, the Princes have been thoroughly frightened by the possibilities of a fast undertaken by some popular figure bent on bringing about a constitutional or unconstitutional change in their administration. The present state of the Congress does not preclude the possibility of the Princes winning influential adherents in that body. On the other hand, the Indian public is greatly impressed by the fact that the British Viceroy alone had the intuition to save Gandhiji's life by no more effort than a stroke of his pen, while all India was wringing its hands and praying that Gandhiji might not suffer from the consequences of his self-imposed ordeal. It will naturally feel that it is safer far to entrust its destinies to him and those whom he represents, than to those who are apt to be paralysed by any unusual occurrence.

Communalism in Indian States:—In a statement issued immediately after his breaking the Rajkot fast, Gandhiji thought it necessary to give the following assurance to Muslims in Rajkot:—

> I had no hesitation in telling them without any argument that their special interests would be safeguarded, that if they wanted separate electorates in Rajkot with reservation of seats I would see to it that they got them.....It is necessary for me to say this in order to ease their minds and to ease the minds of Mussulmans throughout India.

We draw the attention of those who are smug in their complacent belief that the States have only good things to learn from British Indian politicians, to this deliberate insinuation of communal electorates into the Indian States by the most outstanding Congress personality who himself resisted them at the Round Table Conference. When it is remembered that the States at the London Conferences staunchly resisted all efforts to bring in separate electorates into their Central representation it seems all the more objectionable for popular leaders in British India to force upon them what they have been ever ready to denounce in British India itself as the worst aspect of communalism and the first impediment to national unity. The Muslim League which opposes Federation primarily because of the States' refusal to give one third representation to Muslims, must be grateful to Gandhiji for playing their game so readily.

Anglo-Indian Attitude to Indian States:—Taking their cue from Congress leaders some non-official Anglo-Indians have constituted themselves censors of Indian States. The European representative in the Madras Legislative Assembly recently indulged without any apparent cause on an unseemly attack on the neighbouring State of Mysore. He does not approve of the policy of the State actively concerning itself with the development of industries. He would apparently wish the natural resources of the State to be left to be exploited by foreign financiers. That this is nowhere allowed nowadays, that laissez faire is dead and buried several fathoms deep in the land of its birth, and that the industrial policy of the Mysore State has come to be regarded as a model to be followed in British India, seem to be facts beyond the range of Mr. Langley's vision. We can characterise only as outrageous his thinly veiled attack on Sir M. Visvesvaraya whose services to Mysore and India have won recognition even from those politically not in the same camp as himself. We wonder that the Speaker did not pull up Mr. Langley for his unbecoming conduct in attacking a man who was not thereto defend himself. So far from losing large sums of money for the people by his schemes, as Mr. Langley alleged, Sir M. Visvesvaraya has spent large sums of his own in travel and in the study and preparation of his schemes; and not one of them has entailed any loss to the public.

The Congress in Session:—Supported by a requisition signed by 160 members, Pandit Govind Vallabh Pant sought permission in the All India Congress Committee to move a resolution which was in effect a vote of confidence in the old Working Committee and in the policies initiated by Gandhiji. The resolution went farther. It gave direction that President Bose should nominate the Working Committee under Gandhiji's supervision. The President disallowed the motion on the ground that it was not provided for in the Congress constitution and that such a step was unprecedented. After an adjournment for tea Mr. Bose allowed the resolution in the Subjects Committee which frames resolutions for the open session. Pandit Pant moved the resolution in a speech which contained many highlights but little argument to support the manoeuvre. Pandit Jawaharlal in his articles on the present position has clearly indicated the inadvisability of a system in which the President's choice of his cabinet is restricted. Often he says he was on the point of resigning. How can Pandit Pant seek to establish by resolution what has proved to be a bad convention? In pleading for the old members of the Working Committee, Pandit Pant paid a special tribute to Pandit Jawaharlal whom he prematurely designated as the successor of Gandhiji. He must, therefore, attach a special value to Pandit Nehru's opinion. We cannot see how Pandit Jawaharlal can accept the practice as adviseable. We trust that no extraneous considerations will induce Gandhiji's successor-designate to change his mind.

Indians in Africa:—Except in the mandated territory of Tanganiyika, the position of Indians in East and South Africa has been a source of constant anxiety to the people and Government of India. India has on every occasion exhibited her proverbial patience. In the recent agitation of Englishmen in Kenya to have Tanganiyika annexed outright to Great Britain, a section of the Indian community there even co-operated with them in the hope, no doubt, that they would thereby win the goodwill of their White fellow-subjects. All the reward which they have received is to have the long-pending proposal to legalise the practice of excluding Indians from the Highlands, finally adopted by an Order in Council. In South Africa the situation is even more serious. Despite Gandhiji's settlement and two Cape Town agreements, reinforced by goodwill deputations to India, and the presence on the spot of able Agents-General to the Government of India, scarcely a year passes without one proposal or another to lower the status and hamper the growth of Indians, most of them born South Africans, as a self-respecting community. The latest has passed the stage of proposal. In an interview a month ago, the Minister of the Interior told a deputation of the South African Indian Congress that his Government proposed to introduce at the earliest opportunity two Bills; one giving power to the local authorities to create "servitudes" against title deeds of properties in any given area where seventy-five per cent of the owners decide that area should be European; and the other Bill giving power to local authorities to set aside areas for different classes of trades within their boundaries. They are both flagrantly opposed to the assurance of the Union Government in the first Cape Town Agreement to regard Indians as an integral part of the population and to afford them the same facilities and opportunities as to Europeans to raise themselves in the social scale by education and economic advancement.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER
BOMBAY, March 11, 1939.

THE TRIPURI CONGRESS.

On the eve of the Tripuri session of the Indian National Congress, Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru, in a series of articles to the National Herald of Lucknow, has laid bare the many divisions and differences of opinion that have grown up in recent years within the great political organisation. The public at last is in possession of facts which it so far vaguely suspected. That Pandit Jawaharlal found it difficult during his Presidentship to carry the Working Committee with him and that resignations on both sides were threatened frequently, were open secrets. What is new is the extraneous reasons which prevented the issues from becoming clear-cut. The moderating influence of Gandhiji held back the Working Committee. Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru's high sense of national duty and his interest in world politics kept him from the final breach. Obviously, however, such unity could not last. The introduction of provincial autonomy in British India provided a centre round which the conflict between the various sections of the Congress developed. The orthodox Congress group adopted parliamentary tactics and ministries were formed in the provinces where the Congress won majorities. Congress governments were greatly hindered in their constructive work both by the opposition of extremists to the very idea of office acceptance and by the insistence of older Congressmen on programmes evolved in the non-co-operation days. The selection of Mr. Subhas Chundra Bose for the presidentship of the Congress in 1938 at a crucial stage of Congress history was in some ways an unfortunate choice. It took the controversy over office acceptance into the inner circle of the Congress Party. In the two years of provincial autonomy the country was not allowed to settle down to an era of constructive peace. Not a month passed without some ministry somewhere threatening resignation. The weight of the Working Committee was thrown on the side of resisting presssure from "leftist" groups. The ministries, most of whom were formed out of men who thought with the leaders of the Working Committee, came to regard the interference of these extremists as unwholesome annoyances and took steps to consolidate their position.

The "rightists" realised their mistake too late. In their efforts to rectify the error, they sought to have elected to the presidentship a candidate who held views more in keeping with their own. But in doing so, tactics were adopted which put Mr. Bose in for a second term. The outlook changed immediately. The pressure to resign was now applied on the provincial ministries from a different quarter, from the "rightists." We cannot believe that the issues raised at Rajkot were considered large enough to create a crisis in eight Congress provinces. If the Congress Cabinets offered their resignations on Rajkot as Gandhiji had hoped at the very outset they would, it was solely because of the fast which magnified a local trouble into an all India affair. The Tripuri Congress has been saved, by the intervention of the Viceroy, from a situation which would have divested it of much of its importance. But it will meet this week-end in circumstances which are extremely unfavourable. In the brief month that has passed since his election, President Bose has had ample evidence to convince him that he plays a lone hand in Indian politics. Faced by the threatened desertion of the "rightists," all except one section of the "left" group have sought to moderate the President's zeal for a revolutionary programme. It is significant that the exception, led by Mr. M. N. Roy, has never been in touch with Indian affairs. President Bose as the head of the Congress must plan for the country as a whole, taking India conditions into consideration. The Indian mind is essentially a constructive one. Unless Mr. Bose is preparing for the wilderness, therefore, the programme which he will place before the Congress must necessarily be one which will appeal to the people. And in constructive planning he will have to draw largely on the experience of the older Congress workers who are now temporarily estranged from him. It must be borne in mind that Gandhiji has offered the fullest co-operation so long as the old Congress programme is substantially adhered to.

We believe that Tripuri offers a splendid opportunity for the Congress to initiate a new era. The "rightists" who had in the past grown obsessed by a feeling of security and power, find it difficult to adjust themselves to a diminution of authority. But discussions in the Committee meetings and open sessions must convince them that theirs is not a straight choice between complete control and non-co-operation. The ill health of President Bose who has shown indomitable courage in going to Tripuri in spite of his doctors, and the isolation in which he now finds himself, naturally impose upon the Congress veterans a greater need for sympathy and support. Gandhiji who, as Pandit Jawaharlal bears repeated testimony to in his writings, has so often proved a moderating influence, is unfortunately kept out of Tripuri by the Rajkot developments. The absence of his guidance necessitates greater caution on all groups. Press reports indicate that Pandit Jawaharlal has taken up the role of mediator between the old Working Committee and Mr. Bose. He is admirably fitted for the task with his ability to see both sides of a question and his remarkable lack of political dogmatism. He has, as far as it was possible, stood out of the dispute and by commands to a unique degree the confidence of all Congressmen. The patience with which he is going about the negotiations, is admirable and deserves every success. If out of the haze of misunderstanding that has grown up in the past month, a real unity grows up within the Congress, the uncertainties of the period will have been made to serve their purpose. The National Congress stands today at the crossroads. Let us hope the choice will be wisely made.

The events that have grown out of Rajkot, have their lesson for Congressmen. It is obvious now that the days of unthinking opposition to the central government are over. Congress leaders have been frankly appreciative of the statesmanlike intervention of Lord Linlithgow in the dispute between the Thakore Sahib and Gandhiji. The good relations established between the highest British authority in this country and the unquestioned leader of the Congress open up a new field for co-operation. Mr. Subhas Bose's talk of delivering notices to quit within six months, a year or eighteen months to the British, always heroic appear fantastic in the light of recent events. If the Rajkot understanding is followed up to its logical conclusion, India should settle down to a period of constructive progress which she badly needs. The Prohibition programme, set on foot in several Congress provinces, depends, on the ministries being in a position to count on a long period of office. In the States, Gandhiji's remark that Rajkot does not constitute a precedent will have a salutary effect in restoring confidence. Gandhiji was emphatic in his insistence on the necessity for recognizing differences between State and State and on the wisdom of allowing the States to introduce reforms according to the needs of the people. If the Congress at Tripuri realises the great opportunity before it, there is no reason why all India should not look forward to a more hopeful future.

THE RAJKOT FAST.

When two persons are engaged in a dispute, if one of them pulls out a dagger and threatens to kill the other man if he does not accept the former's view, it will be duress. If the threatened man agreed with his adversary, the agreement will not be morally or legally binding on him. If the man with the dagger threatened to kill not his adversary but himself if the latter did not accept his view, it will still in reality be an act of coercion not morally binding on the other party. The latter can, of course, refuse to yield his point and let his opponent commit suicide, in which case no blame can attach to him. In other words, an acceptance obtained by threat of killing another or one's self, has no value as a logical conclusion to the dispute.

The case of the fast which Gandhiji started on Friday 3rd March at Rajkot, is one of this kind. The fast was said to have been intended to effect about a change of heart of the Thakore of Rajkot who, it was alleged, went back on his promise to the Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel regarding the nomination of members to a Committee. The Thakore Sahib disclaims the interpretation put on his understanding by the Sardar. Gandhiji's fast is a protest against the Thakore's disclaimer. It is the Thakore's contention that it would have been practically an act of abdication of his responsibilities as ruler to have agreed to terms as interpreted by the Sardar and Gandhiji. If nevertheless the Thakore did agree to them, the only rational explanation can be that he either did not understand them or had for the moment become oblivious of his position and responsibility as the ruler. There has been disagreement between the British Government and the Arab leaders over the significance of the Hussein-McMahon correspondence. It can not be got over by Mr. Malcolm McDonald or the Grand Mufti declaring an indefinite fast. Indeed it is difficult to see how a fast is relevant in such a context.

The fast, Gandhiji stated, was undertaken to bring about a change of heart in the Thakore whose father held Gandhiji in reverence as his Guru and whom Gandhiji regards as his own son. But Congress leaders and Ministers have joined in a chorus of appeal to the Viceroy as representative of the Paramount Power to compel the Thakore to accept the terms proposed by Gandhiji (which are far more rigorous than those of the agreement as interpreted by Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel) and enable Gandhiji to break his fast. The Paramount Power has never claimed the right to require the rulers of Indian States to carry out an agreement which they may enter into with private individuals and that, too, in accordance with the interpretation put upon the terms of the agreement by the latter which the rulers concerned do not accept as correct. The case of Rajkot, it is urged, is a special one but it is not evident how it differs from other States. Since the assumption of the sovereignty of India by the British Crown, the Paramount Power has interfered only in the case of extreme and scandalous misgovernment in the States and, in several cases even of gross maladministration and personal misconduct of the rulers, the Paramount Power has abstained in spite of urgent representations to take action to have grievances remedied. More than that, the Government of India have had special laws passed to protect the Princes from criticism, in the teeth of strong opposition in and outside Legislature.

The urgent pressure sought to be put on the Viceroy to coerce the Rajkot ruler in a more or less personal matter, is strange as coming from a party which denounces British Imperialism in season and out of season, because it involves the Paramount Power arrogating to itself a right which it has hitherto disclaimed over the rulers of Indian States. The Viceroy can interfere as the Crown Representative to put a stop to misgovernment in Rajkot. That is clearly within his power and is distinctly his duty. There should first be an enquiry by a Commission unless the Thakore waives his right to have one and prefers to abdicate. As the Thakore has a son and heir living, he will no doubt succeed to the gadi and the Paramount Power may and, no doubt, will help him with its advice in redeeming the State from the effects of the regime of his father. If the Thakore abdicates, his agreement with the Sardar ceases to have force and there is a clean slate to write on. Gandhiji will have no excuse to continue his fast as the Thakore Sahib, the son of his friend, will be out of the picture and he is not bound to his successor by the same ties of personal responsibility. The history of Rajkot itself shows that good government is possible without the forms of responsible government on the British model. The father of the present Thakore was by general admission a great and good administrator. All that is needed is to improve the surroundings of the occupant of the gadi so as to rid it of the deleterious influences which have gathered round it on the demise of the late Thakore Sahib.

As to the fast as a means of effecting a change of heart in another who has done wrong, there is room for much scepticism. If a man can not be convinced by argument that he has done wrong, he is not likely to be converted by his friend starting a fast. At the most he may pretend to agree for fear that his friend may die of starvation. Gandhiji says that he has always found fasting efficacious and cites a few instances from his personal life. Two of these relate to matters of a private character of which outsiders have no knowledge. But his public fasts for Hindu Muslim Unity and the omission of the classification of Harijans as a separate community in the Communal Award, have not achieved their end. Hindus and Muslims are as disunited today as at the time of the famous fast. The Communal Award was no doubt modified but Harijans being registered separately, remains. It was surely no change of heart which dictated the modification by Mr. Ramsay MacDonald. Gautama Buddha tried fasting as a means of enlightenment and miserably failed. He was grateful to the village matron, Sujata, who offered him milk and rice taking him to be a Sylvan god. He explained to her that he was only a man seeking the Truth and promised, if he ever found it to remember her who had rescued him from the jaws of death and thus enabled him to continue his search. The Bhagavad Gita also condemns self-torture as demoniacal and declares that moderation is essential in everything, sleep, food, work and relaxation, in those who seek to serve their fellowmen by first emancipating themselves from worldly vanity. Nowadays when everybody is starting a fast when he or she does not get her own way, the experience of Buddha and the precept of the Gita are of inestimable value.

THE GITA: A CRITIQUE.*

Of books on the Bhagavad Gita there is no end. Sankaracharya composed his famous commentary, perhaps, a thousand years ago. There were probably other commentaries before his but they have not come down to us. Sankara's example was followed by the founder of every important Hindu school of philosophy or religious sect. In our own time Telang, M. Rangacharya, and Lokamanya Tilak have contributed to the voluminous literature on the Gita. Gandhiji has not given the world a systematic exposition of his views on the Gita in the shape of a book. But he has, from time to time, published interpretations of passages and has indicated generally his venue of approach to its understanding. Rajagopalacharya has also published a small volume of selections from the Gita. The latest commentary on the Gita is by Mr. P. Narasimham of Madras. It is not so much a commentary as a critique as the author himself calls it. All the commentators before him, with the exception of Telang, treated the Gita as a religious gospel and a manual of devotion. Telang dealt with it from the standpoint of pure scholarship. Narasimham seems concerned to make out that the Gita is a rather over-rated book and that intrinsically there is little in it to merit the reverence in which it is held by Hindus and the high regard expressed for it by foreign scholars and thinkers. The author begins with the rather trite criticism that Sri Krishna could not have set about expounding an elaborate philosophy at the very nick of time when the first shot was about to be fired. "To one unbiassed by tradition," he remarks "the whole Gita episode would appear to be quite artificial." Ruskin in his study of the Greek myths in his "Queen of the Air" has explained the significance of this artificiality in the framing of great mythology. "A myth in its simplest definition," he observes, "is a story with a meaning attached to it, other than it seems to have at first; and the fact that it has such a meaning, is generally marked by some of its circumstances being extraordinary, or by the common use of the word, unnatural." Ruskin illustrates this by the Hercules story and adds: "In nearly every myth of importance, you have to discern these three structural parts—the root and the branches—the root in physical existence, sun or sky or cloud or sea; then the personal incarnation of that; becoming a trusted and companionable deity, with whom you may walk hand in hand, as a child with its brother or its sister; and, lastly, the moral significance of the image, which is in all the great myths eternally and beneficently true." The Gita seems to have been written specifically of the Gods. Does it not? The days are long past when mythology was believed to be the invention of a wicked and designing priesthood to keep the popular mind in subjection to itself. Mythology, it is now recognised, is the scaffolding on which was reared the great edifice of culture and civilisation. The ancient myth-makers had a profound insight into the mysteries of the sub-conscious and were masters of the art of conveying abstruse metaphysical truths in forms easily apprehended by the masses. "Truth embodied in a tale" can enter in at lowly doors which would be otherwise closed to it.

"The value of the Gita lies entirely in the Upanishadic quotations it contains," observes Narasimham. If this is to be taken literally, that the Gita contains only a few quotations taken directly from the Upanishads. If the observation is to be understood as implying that the subject matter of the Gita was borrowed from the Upanishads, where in the Upanishads is to be found the doctrine of the Avatar which is so fully developed in the Gita? Surely this is the central doctrine of the Gita. Mr. Narasimham acknowledges that the declaration in the Gita that the religion which it promulgates is universal, open to all castes and both sexes, marks it as a distinct departure from the old orthodoxy. That declaration flows directly as the consequence of the Avatar doctrine which supersedes the conventions of the sacrificial cult. Not only restrictions of caste and sex, but the whole scheme of sacrificial religion is swept aside with a single sweep. Worship is simplified to the offering of a leaf or flower with a devout heart. Even this is further simplified into the doing of one's duty, nothing else needed. Work is worship.

Mr. Narasimham suggests that the Gita was the work of more than one author and that it has been tampered with for sectarian purposes. Telang in his introduction to his English translation of the Gita, in the Sacred Books of the East series, has fully dealt with both these points. Telang comes with approval the opinion of Schlege and Lassen that we have the text of the Gita now almost exactly in the condition in which it was when it left the author. The author, not authors. Telang himself refers to the question of authorship but does not express a definite opinion on whether there was one or more authors; but he furnishes ample evidence to show that the diction as well as the ideology of the Gita have a distinctiveness and individuality which, if they are not the outcome of a single mind, certainly point to the collaboration of minds closely related to each other in time and thought. Telang assigns a date earlier than the third century B. C. for the composition of the Gita though it is impossible to say how much earlier. Jain and Buddhist teachings, with their emphasis on ahimsa, were very much in the air in India at the time. The difference between the Nirvana of Buddhism and the Brahma Nirvana of the Gita is not technical. Indeed, the stitha pragnya, or integrated mind, of the Gita has been held to point to Gautama Buddha. The attitude of Buddhism and the Gita to the Vedas and to caste is almost identical. Mr. Narasimham has missed the true clue to the significance of the Gita in Indian religious thought by ignoring its relation to Buddhist teachings. The Gita like other great Scriptures suggests lines of thought for those who come after to develop. Instead commentators have taken them to be dogmas and tried to read their own meanings into them. Mr. Narasimham has ventured to depart from convention and that must be counted to his credit.

HINDI, URDU, AND HINDUSTANI.

(By Kopargam Ramamurti, Aska.)

The three names, Hindi, Urdu, and Hindustani, are of late very much to the fore in the public eye. A good deal of acute sentiment, kindly as well as hostile, has also gathered round them ever since the Indian National Congress, more especially the Congress Ministry in Madras, undertook to advance the claims of Hindustani to become the lingua franca of India. But some even among the controversialists do not seem to have succeeded yet in making clear to themselves whether these three names stand for a single language, or for two, or for three distinct languages fundamentally different from one another, or for three differently coloured off-shoots of the same root language and whether such language is foreign or native to the Indian soil.

The question has become somewhat complicated and unhappy in South India, through the sudden uprising of an implacable Dravidian patriotism from the shoulders of the old non-Brahmin communalism which was allowed to rule the Madras Province for about fifteen years without serious opposition but was lately defeated at the polls by the nationalistic forces that had shunned office till then. To the fastidious Dravidian patriot of the present day, not only the long discredited Brahman but even the hitherto despised Sanskrit language are as gall and wormwood, both being regarded alike as the unholy instruments of Aryan imperialism, which enslaved the cultured children of the soil since Rama's time and robbed them of their most precious and ancient heritage of self-respect. Hindi, with its Devanagari alphabet and heavily sanscritised literature, which glorifies through every page of Tulsidas the destruction of the magnificient Dravidian civilisation of old that had attained its zenith under the enlightened rule of their mighty indigenous King Ravana, is thus more than double-dyed in their eyes with the hated colours of Aryanism which must be combated at any cost. The war-cry has, therefore, gone forth against the instruction of Hindi in the schools even on a lower footing than the Dravidian vernacular, and a declaration has also been circulated that "Hindusthani" is a mere invention of the Congress brain, having no recognisable existence in fact as the name of any human language. Urdu, of course, with its Semitic script and phraseology, is obviously a foreign language, to be favoured only by Muhammadans.

Subject to correction, however, the Congress view may perhaps be stated to be that there is, as a matter of fact, underlying the Hindi as well as the Urdu tongues, and giving a common substance and texture to both, a native language of India with a vocabulary and grammatical structure of its own and capable of functioning by itself. This basic tongue, together with such words, phrases and idioms, whether Sanscritic, Persian or Arabic, as have, by unquestioned and habitual use by Moslems as well as Hindus through many years, become part and parcel of both Hindi and Urdu alike, is what is to be officially recognised as 'Hindusthani' hereafter for national purposes, leaving each student and citizen free to implement it in writing with whatever script may appeal to his taste and sentiment, whether it be Devanagari or Persian, Arabic or Roman. To this end, it is said, Moslem scholars and Hindu scholars are to collaborate with equal voice to usher in a new dictionary of 'Hindusthani' acceptable to both communities. It is even reported that a Moslem Congressman, Moulvi Abdul Haq Saheb, has already produced one such dictionary, taking all the Urdu words found in the Benares Hindi Lexicon and all Hindi words found in the Osmania Lexicon of Hyderabad, and that Gandhiji has already recommended it to the Congress, suggesting also a mixed Board for further selection or coining of necessary words. (Harijan of 28th January 1939).

It does not, however, require a keen Congress mentality, or a profound scholarship in either language to grasp the outstanding fact that Hindi, as spoken and written by Hindus at the present day, is not merely Sanscritic but contains hundreds, perhaps thousands, of Persian and Arabic words in its composition. Similarly, the Urdu spoken and written by Indian Moslems is not made up entirely of Persian and Arabic words but possesses a substantial admixture of Sanscrit vocabulary and a grammatical framework of the same indigenous patent as that of Hindi. And whatever some of our Dravidian brothren near about Adam's Bridge may say out of sheer 'self-respect,' such of their kinsmen as are born and bred up in the northern districts of the Madras Province cannot so easily gulp the theory and acquire the conviction that 'Hindustani' is a modern political invention of the Gandhian era. It is, in fact, impossible for them to forget that long before any of them came to hear of the existence of any such names as Hindi, Urdu or Gandhi, they had already learnt at their mother's knee to identify as "Hindusthani" the forceful controversial utterances of the bearded Muhammadan gentry of one's neighbourhood and the frightful jargon of the bearded and mat-haired Hindu Sadhus who thrust themselves at every door demanding alms with impudent authority, as well as the spirited and entrancing melodies sung in unison along the streets by male and female wandering mendicants from Upper India.

There are fortunately more authentic and demonstrable proofs than one's own childhood experiences in favour of the existence of a quite recognisable and long recognised language known as 'Hindusthani' in this country. Munshi Mir Amman of Delhi, a learned Oriental scholar attached to the college at Fort William in Calcutta about 150 years ago, has left for us in his preface to the famous Bagh-O-Bahar, a prespicuous account of the Hindusthani which grew in Mahammadan times out of the native "Bhakha" of the ancient Hindu kingdom of Delhi that is still found spoken in its original purity and softness around Agra and Muttra and thereabouts. He first tells us how the high Government officials of his time, having imbibed a taste for science and learning, percieved that by acquiring "the Urdu tongue" they might converse with Hindusthanis and transact more perfectly the affairs of the country. He then narrates how the excellent and liberal gentleman Dr. John Gilchrist (who was the first to display the Hindusthani language correctly to his countrymen and to teach them to appreciate its merits and acquired its construction and took the trouble to prepare an Urdu-grammar himself for that purpose), very kindly commissioned him to put the Persian tale of the Four Fakirs into "the pure Hindusthani tongue" which is described in the same breath as "the tongue which the Urdu people, both Hindus and Musalmans, men and women, boys and girls, speak to each other." And he naively adds that he produced the Hindusthani version as desired by his patron "in the colloquial style of the Urdu."

It is thus clear that the terms "Hindustani" and "Urdu" were viewed and used by the old scholars of long ago as freely interchangeable both connoting the same thing, namely, the language of Hindusthan spoken by Hindus and Musalmans alike in and out of their homes including their women and children; all the people being equally known as Hindusthanis or "Urdu-ke-log," irrespective of their religion and race.

The venerable author Mir Amman, than whom there is no higher authority on the subject (as we are assured by his admiring contemporary, Lewis Ferdinand Smith, who was long resident at the Court of the then Nawab of Oudh in Lucknow before he joined the British Embassy to the Court of Persia), next proceeds to explain the name and history of the Urdu tongue as he heard it from his ancestors: During the various invasions of Mahamood Gazni and the comings and goings of successive Moslem rulers after him about a thousand years ago, the native language of the Old Delhi kingdom of the Hindus, which had been founded in the remotest antiquity, became a mixture of Hindu and Mahammadan tongues. From the subsequent coming and stay of the Mogal Amir Taimoor, the Bazar of his camp was settled in the City; for which reason, the Bazar of the City was called "Urdu" which originally meant a camp. In the time of his famous descendant, the Emperor Akbar, all tribes and castes of people from all the countries around, flocked to his Court; and though the tongue of each was different, yet by being assembled together they used to traffic and do business and converse with each other. From this mixture of tongues arose the Urdu, the language of the Bazar. When the Emperor Shah Jahan built the Fort and the Walls of the City and made the New City his capital, he named the Bazar of the New City the "Urdu-e-Mualla" or Great Bazar. From the time of Amir Taimoor until the reign of Alamgir II, the Urdu language received repeated polish till it was so refined that the language of no other City could be compared to it. And so it remained, but without appreciation for a long period after the Empire decayed; till at last the learned, acute and profound Dr. John Gilchrist from his own judgment, genius, labour and research, composed books of rules to acquire it. From this cause, the language of Hindusthan became general throughout the country and was polished anew.

As long as a century ago, the Honourable the Court of Directors of the East India Company, being "well aware how inefficiently their various employees in India must perform their duties without a knowledge of the language of the people" sent positive instructions to the Local Governments to the effect that all their junior officers, military and medical, must henceforth pass an examination in "Hindusthani." A G. O. dated 9th January 1837, which was incorporated later, in 1844, into the permanent General Orders on this subject, prescribed that the candidates shall be required to read and write the language correctly both in the Devnagari and the Persian characters; and further to make an intelligent and accurate written translation into Hindusthani, of an English passage in an easy narrative style; this translation to be written in a legible hand in both the Persian and Devanagari characters. Besides this, the Examiners were also enjoined not to grant a certificate of competency to any candidate without testing his proficiency in a colloquial knowledge of Hindusthani, "this being deemed an object of primary importance."

There may be room for honest difference of opinion as to the expediency of burdening the curriculum of young school-children, if it is already too heavy and unadjustable, with another compulsory language besides English and their mother tongue. But there can concievably be no excuse for acrimony and communal ill-feeling in respect of it, either between Hindus and Hindus or between Hindus and Mahammadans. Dr. Duncan Forbes, Professor of Oriental languages and Literature in King's College, London, who did yeomen service to India by implementing, with his helpful guide books and other publications in Hindi and Urdu and Roman, the enlightened governmental policy of the Court of Directors as above outlined, recommended "Hindusthani" to his countrymen whole-heartedly as "the most useful of all the languages spoken in our eastern Empire," and exhorted them untiringly to attain sufficient proficiency in this entirely foreign tongue "to converse in it with fluency and compose in it with accuracy," that their services may be more efficient and acceptable to the strangers whom they set out to govern. Surely, no Minister of an Indian Province can with justice be blamed, far less pursued with rancorous hatred, if, besides promoting the interests of the local vernaculars, he seeks also to imbue the rising generation of Indian children, now qualifying in the Schools for future citizenship and service to their own country, with the consciousness and a working knowledge of an all-India mother-tongue, and chooses for that high and natural destiny the well-tried, widely esteemed, elegant and powerful language of Hindusthan, the heart and seat of Indian Empire through all vicissitudes and under every race of rulers since Mahabharatic times!

THE SALVATION ARMY SUPPORTS PROHIBITION.

The Editor,
The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

I read with keen interest your remarks in the Reformer of the Congress Government's efforts toward Prohibition, and have noticed the remarks about Europeans and their attitude towards the Drink Problem. May I respectfully point out to you that all Salvation Army Officers in all parts of the world, members and adherants must sign and promise not to taste or handle any intoxicated drink of any description? Apart from this all the Officers in the Salvation Army must be non-smokers. I mention this to make the position of the Salvation Army clear to you as to our attitude. We are, therefore, with the Congress Government in seeking to achieve success throughout the Presidency as far as Prohibition is concerned.

I may say I look forward to the Social Reformer coming each week, and read its contents with great interest.

Yours etc.,
STEPHEN J. SEAGER

Chief Secretary.

DISCIPLINE AND THE CONGRESS.

(By J. M. Ganguli, Calcutta.)

Varied criticisms are often levelled against the Congress. It is adopting methods of Fascism; it suffers from Muslimphobia and always extends a favoured-wife treatment towards that community, regardless of what injustice is done to others as a consequence; while condemning bureaucracy it is itself tending to be bureaucratic; and so on, and so forth. I shall not go into them, for opinions may naturally differ thereon. I shall, however, refer here to a principle of propriety and discipline ordinarily observed in all good organizations and administrations but which is at times given a go-by by the Congress, namely, the priniciple of not encouraging subordinates to defy and over-ride their immediate superiors and negotiate with higher authorities behind their back. A significant breach of this principle by the Congress occured rather recently, and as such breaches may occur again it is worth while recalling it.

Mr. Nalini Ranjan Sircar, the Finance Member of the Government of Bengal, not long ago paid some visits to the Congress leaders at Wardha and Bombay, presumably, as it was understood, for discussing the possibility of a Coalition Ministry in Bengal. I am not interested in the various speculations, that were set on foot in political circles by those visits at the time and that have not died yet, as to what card that gentleman of high ambition and piercing vision had in his mind to play. I am only concerned with the principle referred to above that was not observed by the Congress in his case.

Mr. Sircar was originally a leading member of the Bengal Congress, and he was elected to the Bengal Assembly on the Congress ticket. But after his election, he joined the Bengal Ministry discarding allegiance to the Congress and in spite of the latter's warning. A lengthy and open correspondence followed between him on the one side and Mr. Subhas Chandra Bose on the other, but it left the position and action of Mr. Sircar unexplained and unjustified. The matter naturally and logically ended in the Bengal Congress Committee taking disciplinary action against Mr. Sircar, who was debarred from membership in the Congress for a period of twenty years and was placed under other consequential disqualifications.

After such open defiance of the Congress it was scarcely supposed that Mr. Sircar would again negotiate with the Congress. Whether he did so because of an apprehension of the growing strength of the Congress, or because of an intelligent anticipation of a break-up of the present Bengal Ministry as a result of its increasing unpopularity, might well be left to speculation. What is to be considered is, that it was proper for the Congress leaders to let, and by so letting encourage, an open defier of a Provincial Executive ignore and go over the head of his provincial authority, to which he had been consciously guilty, and seek to cultivate important and meaningful contacts with superior authorities. Such encouragement involves an impor- tant principle of organisational discipline and propriety, and in the absence of Congress leaders making up their mind on it, it is bound to lead to disregarding of the authority of sub-organizations and dangerous damage of their prestige and influence. It would virtually mean that, when it suited the immediate interests of an ambitious man, he could with impunity defy the organisation to which he was subject and, after attaining his object and securing personal advantage and influence, he might, whenever he found it advantageous to turn back or whenever he thought that it was unprofitable or even dangerous to continue on his new track, approach superior bodies, as if he had done nothing and get reconciled to them at the back of those properly authorised to deal with him and control his activities. The position of branch organizations will in such way become impossible, and their authority reduced to impotency.

In the case of Mr. Sircar, therefore, one would have naturally expected the Congress leaders to have told him clearly and in a few words to go and square up his accounts with his Provincial Committee before raising side-issues like coalition ministry, release of political prisoners, etc., questions over which his Provincial Headquarters was as competent to deliberate.

It may be further noted here that the Congress High Command have taken a serious view of the indiscipline and of what may also be described as errors of judgment or as hasty and impulsive doings of Mr. Nariman and of Dr. Khare. Mr. Nalini Ranjan Sircar's offence has been of a far more serious character. While the Bombay and Nagpur leaders did not, at any rate, go over to the other side, Mr. Sircar not only deserted his party after his election to the Assembly, but is said to have been chiefly instrumental in forming and stabilising the Bengal Ministry in open defiance of the Congress and in utter disregard of its warnings. Any indulgence or weakness shown by the High Command towards him would, therefore, amount to serious violation of the above-mentioned principle of not letting people over-ride their immediate superiors and negotiate matters over their heads, a principle necessarily observed in all good administrations and governments.

HINDU MARRIAGE AND STRIDHANA—II.

(By R. V. V. Tatachariar, Madras.)

With the disappearance of post-puberty marriage as a consequence of foreign hordes and armies conquering Indian states and carrying away the women of the conquered or marrying them and settling in the land, the Gandharva, Rakshasa and Paisacha forms also disappeared. And to this the Buddhist attraction of women to mutts and nunneries. The population was depleted of its women. Young girls of the ages of seven to twelve came to be hastily married and appropriated beforehand. A premium was thus given to the original principle of patria potestas of the father over the children. Brides came to be freely bought and sold, even as slaves of old and cattle and chattel, for huge sums of money.

Such brides were declared by sages of Aryan predilictions to be unfit to be associated in sacrifices to the Gods and Pitris or ancestors' manes. They could not be deemed wives but only slaves or concubines. The Asura form of marriage was tabooed as being but a sale of human flesh unknown to ages gone by. But sages of Dravidian or non-Aryan sympathies derided the Aryan and Vedic marriage in the Brahma and other approved forms and protested that a bride-purchase and bride-gifts stood on the same pedestal, as both equally dealt with her as if she were no sacred human being of free Aryan pretensions. It was argued that the Arsha-bride was taken in exchange for a couple of cloths or heads of cattle of smaller or greater value; and all the same it was only a sort of sale to the extent of their worth or value.

Necessarily, then, the law was re-stated that marriage was not complete immediately on the 'gift' or delivery of the bride with the pouring of water but only subsequently on the occasion of pani-grahana or clasping of hands, mantras, Saptapadi or seven-steps, homam, nuptials, pregnancy or birth of a child or two. So broad was the latitude given for remarriage of women, that sooner or later Yama finally fixed the irrevocable completion of marriage and of the transfer of the bride from the father's to her husband's gotra or family for all purposes of funerals, pollution, sraddha, etc., precisely at the point of time of "panigrahana," "Saptapadi," and "Seshahoma," all of which might be performed on the same or different days.

Now the quewtion arises whether, after emphasis had been so laid on the panigrahana-mantra and homa for the final and irrevocable step in completion of marriage, the so-called gift for gift's sake, or by way of reward or remuneration at sacrifices, or by way of inviolable stipulation of constant co-operation, or again gift as a token or farce of valuable consideration, in the four higher forms still maintained its original character of gift pure and simple, or grew into different shades of meaning.

All the four gifts cannot evidently be of the same kind. Before the disappearance of all of them except the first, after inter-caste marriages went out of vogue, it was clearly apprehended that 'gift' was not the right word to apply to all or to any of four higher forms also as well as of the rest as the patria potestas did not carry with it the unrestricted disposal of the daughter's person in marriage even as a son's in adoption; that both the son's and the daughter's disposals were only for purpose of Dharma or maintenance and spread of Aryan Law, and that adoption or marriage was only effected and completed by the Aryan or Vedic mantras and sacraments and none else. All roads only led to Rome. All the eight forms of marriage only led to a valid conclusion thereof on the occasion of observance of marriage mantra and homa. And 'gift' meant that of only 'custody in law' and not of dominion or ownership of the person of the girl or boy whether in marriage or adoption. The custody is that of a natural or legal guardian of the minor for purpose of care-taking, protection and education of the minor.

If the Rakshasa, Asura, Gandharva or Brahma instances of marriage persist at all now, they do so in mere form in the prior stages leading to the final conclusion thereof by means of sacramental or customary ceremonies. And the custody carries with it willing consent to its delivery or actual parting with, which is even now so essential in the case of minors, in any matter affecting them. Thus Dharmic or legal marriage has truly and rightly transcended the compartmental limits or limitations of the eight forms of the early times. The latter forms are now no part or factor of marriage and have been so ever since though not rightly understood by jurists and commentators or even by our British Courts.

Now what is the true nature of a Hindu Marriage? It is of a rather composite nature in a majority of cases, at least in South India, whether among Brahmins or non-Brahmins. Very poor parties who cannot afford it, may adopt the transcendent form merely and simply with or without a sense of social-reform and economy. But the rest of the people do spend a lot which, on a shrewd examination into details of expenditure, would show that the marriage gone through is of a composite type notwithstanding all talk to the contrary. The "nischitartham" or betrothal is never done without some money, jewels and costly cloths for the bride which reminds us of the ancient pariyam, parisam or bride-price in Asura. It has been renamed in several cases as "pal-coolie" or milk remuneration given to the bride's mother or father, if the mother is no more. The Gandharva form is discernible in the exchange of garlands and rings and joyous 'oonjal' or rocking together in the swing. The procession of the bridal pair almost at the conclusion of the marriage coupled with a presentation to the bridegroom of a gold or silver or other article as if in appreciation of a clever kidnapping of the bride, reminds us of the Rakshasa type of marriage. The sleeping together of the bridal pair for one to three nights near the sacred fire and tender shoots of the Palika-grains is perhaps in memory of the much maligned Paisacha kind. The gift of cloths with or without cows to the bride's parents on the heels of, and immediately after, delivery of the hands of the girl into those of the bridegroom cannot be anything short of imitation of the Arsha form. The recital of the famous verse from the Ramayana, "This Sita, my daughter is now your life-companion in all acts of Dharma. Receive her for your welfare; and take her hand in your own," is in essence of the Prajapatya marriage. The giving itself might look as if it were the gift of a slave or animal or other chattel. This is of Brahma character. And, lastly, the father asks the bridegroom to perform the pleasant function of the only Mantra Samskara for his dear daughter before the sacred fire, the only one allowed to women in general. And this Daiva element in the marriage function is soon followed as in all sacrifices by distribution of Dakshina or money to the Brahmins present on the occasion. Thus it is seen that the present-day marriage of a Hindu is wholly of a composite character embodying, in essential particulars or details of almost invariable procedure all the typical and distinguishing characteristics of every form of ancient marriages of Vedic and post-Vedic times.

In the light of the above discussion it would be clear that the so-called 'gift' did not mean gift of person of the girl, but at most only gift of its custody, if she be a minor, for purposes of care-taking, etc. Much less could it mean gift of all the jewels upon her person. They are primarily intended or presumed to be for her own personal decoration and temporary or permanent alienation in an urgent necessity. The husband could not lay his hand upon them even in days of yore without a reasonable expectation of restoring them to her after tiding over his distress demanding their pledge or sale. Such being the case, it is the intention of the girl's parents that should determine the devolution of Stridhana provided for her personal and peculiar purposes apart from her husband's. If she die leaving issue, then her daughters would be gladly allowed by her parents to take it; failing them or their female issue, their brothers, if any, would be prefered before her parents or brothers or sisters could think of taking the Stridhana. If none be available, then the husband has to come in and take it. But if the same be endowed upon her by her husband or his family-relations, then their reversion on failure of her issue should not be allowed to be affected by her parents' or brothers' or sisters' claims. This is the basis and reason of Stridhana succession even in olden times. And there is no reason why this should be departed from in these modern times when women's rights are improving all round at the hands of our legislatures, in their own and in their husband's property in divorce, and in remarriage. In other words a woman's stridhana endowed by parent or husband is mainly meant for herself and her issue; and on failure of both, whoever contributed towards it should get it back, as the object in view fails. It is preposterous for the husband to lay claim and knock away what was not meant for him in the least under cover of plea that his marriage was in the Brahma form. Similarly parents should not be allowed to lay hands upon what had been by him or his family endowed upon his wife under cover of plea of Asura or other inferior form of marriage. All such tricks are being every day tried in and out of court in all cases of wife's death without issue. The so-called Brahma and Asura pleas must be ruled out as being out of tune with the times besides being false in law and fact. Both the pleas are at once untenable and absurd, if not nefarious, dishonest and despicable altogether. In poorer families a much better state of things exist, and honour and peace obtain and endure.

A PRIMROSE PATH TO FREEDOM.*

(By J. Chinna Durai, London.)

India's political conscience is keenly awake. In fact it has been so for some years now. The leaders of India have at various times adopted one method or another with a view to obtain their cherished object, namely, complete Swaraj for India. Civil disobedience, non-co-operation, strikes accompanied by violent speeches and press propaganda have all been tried one after another and all that they have so far achieved for India, is the attainment of a sort of constitution far short of Dominion Status with no prospect of any improvement in her political status for perhaps some years to come. In this article I propose to suggest a new method which if adopted will, in my opinion, result in India attaining complete independence in the near future without the exchange of a single shot.

I have watched Europe at close quarters for nearly fifteen years now. I have been in the thick of its social and political life, particularly in England, and I may say, without exaggeration, that the most salient feature in European life is Sport. No matter how deep the depression, and, however grave the crisis, Europe refuses to go in sack-cloth and ashes. Even if the end of the world is predicted for the morrow, the love of sport is so deeply ingrained in the Englishman, I could easily picture him going to his doom either dancing or with a tennis racket in his hand. If you will pick up any European newspaper at random, you would notice that sixty per cent of the news is about sports and the rest devoted to a thousand and one other matters in which politics occupy only a fraction of attention. Even during the grave crisis of last September the newspapers devoted more space to sports items than the crisis itself. In fact, the strength of a nation in Europe is judged not so much according to the amount of arms or armaments it possesses—for they all have got them in an equal measure—but according to its achievements in the World of Sports. For instance, the International Lawn Tennis Federation in Paris the various Lawn Tennis Associations of the world are entitled to the following number of votes: Australia, France, Germany, Great Britain and the United States of America—12 votes each: Canada, Czechoslovakia, Italy, Japan, New Zealand and South Africa—9 votes each: Belgium, Denmark, Netherlands, Poland and Switzerland—7 votes each: Argentine, Egypt, Finland, Greece, Hungary, India, Iceland, Norway, Spain, Sweden and Yugoslavia—5 votes each. The assignment of the votes, it will be observed, is regulated not according to the size of the various countries but according to the merits of their respective achievements in Lawn Tennis.

And this is where I come to my point. If India can at any time win the Davis Cup or produce a champion who might win the Singles Title at Wimbledon, the number of votes she would be entitled to will be raised to the same level as that of Britain or America. Once India's civic rights in the sporting world are equal to those of the strongest nations in the world, it would constitute the strongest argument for India's complete emancipation in the political world, for judged by the recognised European standards of strength, India would then be a strong nation and the absurdity of Britain holding down India politically on the ground of her unfitness would stand revealed in all its nakedness before the foremost nations of the world and Britain will be obliged to find other arguments for subjugating India which will not be easy, as it is now common ground that the political and intellectual sense of India is as good as that of any other nation. It is for this reason, I would strongly advocate that India develops her sports to such a state of excellence that all the nations of the world, whether they like it or not, will be obliged not only to look up to her with respect and admiration but also seek her guidance and leadership in a manner that will automatically proclaim to the world the ridiculousness of any country dominating over her and dictating to her eternally what she ought to do and what she ought not to do. Political speeches of Indian leaders, however logical and fiery they may be, and the rare flashes of the intellectual exhibitions of India's Intelligentsia in the field of arts and science, do not cut much ice in England as they are only put down as the barking of a dog that can never bite, or the mania of an ascetic in pursuit of a pet hobby. What is wanted to impress on the English mind the power and superiority of India is some practical achievements in open physical competitions with Europe and it is for this reason, while I appreciate the political services of Gokale, Gandhi and Nehru in the cause of India, I appreciate even more the sporting services rendered in raising the prestige of India in the eyes of the world by such stalwart sportsmen as Ranjit Singh Duleepsinghji the Nawab of Pataudi and the Polo, Hockey, Cricket and Davis Cup teams of India. In short, argue with an Englishman and you will find he has no patience to lisren to you; but beat him in sports and you will find his respect for you almost amounts to worship.

In conclusion, may I urge, seeing that efficiency in sports is so inter-linked with the ultimate welfare of India, that India participates in the Olmypic Game and the Davis Cup and other international matches regularly. The Indian Government should make it a point to help financially the All India Lawn Tennis Association, and the Polo, Cricket, Hockey and Football teams in every way they can with a view to finding new talents that will one day carry everything before them and help India to hoist her flag right in the heart of Europe. I can prophesy that if the progress of Indian tennis is maintained as it is now and if young players are afforded facilities to compete in Europe every year, India will in the course of five years be the envy and the talk of the world, for by them she would have won the much coveted Davis Cup. My prophecy is something to reckon because when F. J. Perry was quite an obscure player I told him most seriously that if he kept it up he would one day be the champion of the world, and lo and behold it happened. I was very struck with the performance of the Indian Davis Cup team last year and although they did not make great head way owing to lack of experience of the western conditions, I could see they have the necessary knack and stamina to become world beaters, and in Ghaus Mohammed particularly India possesses a man who can be expected to spring the biggest surprise in Europe one of these days. I have dwelt on tennis at length because as the elected Foreign Secretary of the All India Lawn Tennis Association I am primarily concerned with tennis but my observations apply equally to field games, and Indian athletes must be sorted out with the financial aid of the Indian Government and trained systematically so that they can hold their own in the Olympic Games, that the world may look up to them as the finest specimen of India's manhood, whose body and soul will not tolerate any shackles in the shape of political serfdom. For a self-governing India—strength of character, strength of purpose, and stern discipline—the necessary attributes of a sound mind in a sound body are very essential and for this reason my final suggestion to the Indian Government is to introduce state-aided physical culture on a wide-scale all over India for both men and women (not confined to schools and colleges alone) which will be the prelude to the birth of a mighty India, which in full consciousness of her strength can go forward and take what she wants instead of always having to beg for what she wants.

Besides unity is strength and India's greatest obstacle to the achievement of such a unity among her various communities has always been her intricate racial, religious and communal difficulties. The predominant political party in India—the Congres—cherished the hope that the panacea for this evil consisted in making every citizen of Indian embrace its political faith. This hope, however, has failed to materialise, because in spite of the fact that Congress has been in power, political and racial differences still continue in an acute manner, often culminating in riots between Moslems and Hindus. The latest news is that even among the Congress party—at one time thought united to a man—a serious split has now occurred, which makes the already divided India, more divided. In these circumstances it seems to me that the one and only way to unify India is through the medium of Sports, which will inculcate in every Indian the spirit of give and take, tolerance, self-sacrifice and unselfishness—virtues in fact that will kill the distinction between a high caste and an untouchable and insure fairplay for all. My mind gees back to my college days in 1914 when I captained the Salem College Football XI which consisted of men drawn from various communities, professing different faiths in politics and religion. The team was made up of Mohammedans, Brahmins, Non-Brahmins, Untouchables and Christians and yet we pulled together in perfect unison, winning match after match as we went along. Sports alone—the greatest leveller of all beings—could have achieved that miracle and I therefore say with all sincerity that the salvation of India rests not with any particular political party but in the general adoption of healthy sports throughout the length and breadth of India whereby unity which leads to strength and strength which will ultimately lead to the moral, social and political uplift of India can be achieved.

THE PROBLEM OF THE STATES.

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

Your leader on Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru and the Indian States, the Viceroy's speech at Jaipur and Sir Shanmugham's defence of the Maharajahs, all give rise in me to the reflection that, if those who counted had paid more heed to the ideas adumbrated by me ten years ago, a great deal of the present confusion would have been avoided. There is scarcely a difficulty which is now agitating the public mind which was not foreseen in those articles.

I wish I could convince you that Self-Government for British India only could be (as I wrote) only a glorified form of local Self-Government, because Defence and Foreign Affairs would be necessarily separated, seeing that there is no political or ethical justification for putting the States under a Government of which they form no part; and hence the Treaties concerning Defence would work against giving real autonomy to India.

If this is admitted, the next idea is and was to fit the States for joining the Federation. I gave up majority government as voting would be communal, but advocated freedom being given to States to try experiments with elastic constitutions (precisely what the Viceroy says now) but, insisted on independence of the judiciary, and freedom of association and of speech being established at once. The point which all missed, was that Gandhiji had brought about a state of 'peaceful war' which justified under international law the revision or 'sublimation' of treaties for the greater good of the people. Instead of implementing this very sound notion, the States were permitted to spend a crore of rupees for getting legal opinion (lawyers must live) to prove the manifestly absurd proposition that the States are independent soveignties.

Even today, if peace is to accrue, the Viceroy in addition to advice, must insist on this being done. The number 600, however, is too large. Some method of reducing the number has to be thought of. It is no use simply condemning Pandit Nehru. It seems to me that there is not likely to be any second mutiny even if several of the tiny States are amalgamated with British India; and some are joined with other States, if that is possible. The new wine of democracy has spread even among the masses, and Princes are not now regarded as sacrosanct, any more than priests and Mahants.

They are, nevertheless, held in the highest regard, and their quality of non-communalism is a very great asset, which, as Sir Shanmugham says, could be made use of.

I am all in favour of giving more encouragement to the Panchayat idea in government in which minorities are persuaded and not coerced. I had developed this at great length in my articles. The only drawback is lack of momentum, which a Party would have, but when the Party is likely to be more Communal than national, lack of momentum seems the lesser evil.

I hope that the Tripuri Congress will not adopt the younger (or older ?) Bose's proposition of ultimatums and of treaty between Congress and the British Cabinet. That is the way to ruin, as Moslems and the Princes would fight against it.

A meeting between the Viceroy and a few leading Indians, the fewer the better but representing important sections of power politics seems desirable—but how to form a party for the realization of peaceful and progressive ideas for the consolidation of India, and its Defence in these most unsettled times, I have not the faintest notion of at present.

We have to recognize that the 'Liberal' notions under which we gret up are no longer in vogue, and must try to make the best use of the present temper of the people.

Yours etc.,

NOTES.

The Urban Tax :—As a concession to the opposition voiced against his new taxation measures, Mr. A. B. Latthe announced in the Bombay Legislative Assembly a modification of the original plan. At a sacrifice of Rs. 17,10,000 the Finance Minister announced the changes he proposed in the tax on immoveable urban property. The original scale was a flat 10 per cent levied on property in Bombay City and suburbs and in Ahmedabad. We had suggested a graduated scale of taxation as more equitable. In the course of the debate Mr. Latthe explained the difficulties of grading the tax. The Central Government, he said, would claim the revenue as income tax if there were more than two or at most three divisions. Therefore, he proposed as the limit of concession a five per cent tax on property of the annual letting value of Rs. 2,000 and under, and the original 10 per cent on property above Rs. 2,000, for Bombay City. The rates in the suburbs and Ahmedabad would be adjusted accordingly after the peculiar conditions of these places had been examined by Government. The suburbs, it must be borne in mind, have by their distance from the city to bear the extra burden of transport charges. It is in the suburbs as well that co operative housing schemes have been developed in recent years, not only for the middle classes but for backward communities as well. Mr. A. M. K. Dehlavi in suggesting a limit of Rs. 3,000 for the city and Rs. 1,500 for the suburbs was doubtless arguing on the premise that suburban residents are the wealthier sections of the community. But the premise is out of date. It would be but fair if the same principle of modification is extended to the other areas as well as to Bombay City. Mr. Latthe's concessions, however, should, taken as a whole, satisfy reasonable objectors to his taxation scheme. The policy of Prohibition is to that extent ushered in under more favourable conditions.

Prohibition Problems :—There are two suggestions which we have to offer to smooth the path of Prohibition not only in this province but throughout the country. The danger to the cause is not, as has been mistakenly pointed out, that of bootlegging and illicit distillation. We believe that the difficulties of enforcing the law will be small in India compared to those experienced by Western countries. In this connection the veteran Prohibition worker, the Rev. J. F. Edwards, has in a telling article in the Dnyanodaya refuted the propagandist theory that lawlessness grew in the U. S. A. after the introduction of Prohibition. The people of this country are law-abiding by nature and the public feeling is in favour of Prohibition. These are important aids to the Government and but for them the Kher Ministry, we are sure, would not have risked the attempt at enforcement. What is more to be feared is an impression carefully fostered by anti-Prohibition agitators that the whole of the Congress organisation is not behind the policy. A Congress Government will find it difficult to meet the subtle and insinuating charge that it is prevented from putting its policy into effect by lack of support within its own party. It is important, therefore, that the party insist upon a pledge of abstinence, at the very least, to be taken by every Congressman and woman. We would go even further. Not only a pledge of abstinence but an added clause to further the cause of Prohibition. We had urged a year ago that such a pledge was necessary if the public were to rely on the sincerity of Congress Governments in regard to Prohibition. Now the question of sincerity is no longer in doubt. The need for strengthening the hands of provincial Governments in their enforcement of Prohibition calls for this measure. There ought to be no difficulty in doing so. The other suggestion relates to funds. The new taxation is meant to cover loss of revenue and to provide for preventive measures only. We would be glad to see a voluntary Prohibition Fund set on foot by the Government. There are many individuals who welcome the reform. They would like to feel that they can help in furthering the cause by some contribution to a fund of this nature. At the outset, we admit, the amount so collected will be small but, as people begin to appreciate and to benefit directly by the policy, they will be increasingly willing to give. This money would be earmarked for constructive work—the provision of places of recreation and refreshment. It is essential in putting through a reform like Prohibition, that as many people as possible be brought into the scheme. When every one feels not so much that he has been taxed for Prohibition but that he has voluntarily assisted in bringing it about, the measure of success will be complete.

Parsis and Prohibition :—We can not think of a more misguided agitation than that which has been started to oppose Prohibition as detrimental to the Parsi community. The implied identification of Parsi interests with the drink traffic is not complimentary to the community nor is it true to facts. The Parsis owe their pre-eminence to their industry, enterprise, broad-minded philanthropy and well-ordered social and family life. These qualities will ensure their success under all conditions. That a number of them became associated in the past with the drink trade is due to the fact that their Hindu and Muslim fellow-countrymen were debarred by religious scruple from handling it. It does not follow, as one of the Parsi members asserted at the Municipal Corporation on Monday, that the Zoroastrian religion looked with more favour on the drink habit than other religions. It is true that there is no express prohibition of drink in the Zoroastrian scriptures as in the Koran or in the Code of Manu, but the whole trend of the teaching of the Persian Prophet with its constant insistence on purity of word, thought and deed, is patently opposed to indulgence in intoxicating drinks and drugs. The obvious explanation of the absence of specific prohibition is that the habit was not prevalent, not at any rate, to such an extent as to call for denunciation by the Prophet in his society and in his time. The evil had attained grievous dimensions in India and Arabia and therefore it had to be expressly denounced by Indian and Arabian law-givers. The great majority of middle class Parsis (and the Parsis are an almost exclusively middle class community) are abstainers from drink like middle class Hindus and Muslims. It is the very wealthy and the very poor who are addicted to the drink habit, the former to relieve their intellectual and spiritual ennui and the latter to forget momentarily the cruel hardships of poverty. Dr. H. P. Dastur's article in the Bombay Chronicle represents more truly educated Parsi opinion than the hysterical outbursts of those who profess to see the doom of the Parsis in the end of the liquor traffic. We are sure, on the contrary, that Prohibition will prove as beneficial to Parsis as to other communities and that its benefits will add considerably to the lustre of the great qualities which have placed this small community at the head of progress in education, industry and other spheres of national life. The pioneers in the Temperance as in other movements in India have been Parsis and it is a puerile fancy that the prosperity of the Parsis as a community is founded on the demoralisation caused by drink among their fellow countrymen of all communities. If there was even an iota of truth in this assumption, the Parsis would not have survived as a community all these centuries; they have not only survived but won the high esteem of their neighbours wherever they happen to be. Parsis, we are told, have been drinkers all along and that they are not the worse for it. We do not know. As we said, the great majority of Parsis today are practical abstainers. But even if it be true that they enjoy a constitutional immunity from the evil effects of the drink habit, it is among the great precepts of their ancient religion that piety consists pre-eminently in doing good to one's neighbours; and they should bear in mind St. Paul's saying: "If meat (liquor) make my brother to offend, I will eat no flesh while the world standeth, lest I make my brother to offend."

A Temperance Colony in Hyderabad :—While the provinces under provincial autonomy are steadily pursuing a policy of Prohibition, in the Indian States as well there are signs that public opinion is beginning to stir in the same direction. In Hyderabad a Temperance Colony was opened recently when prominent State officials were present including Sir Akbar Hydari, the Prime Minister. The Central Temperance Committee had twenty different branches in the Nizam's Dominions and they conducted propaganda by means of publishing literature and organising lectures and by opening libraries. The Colony which was opened by Prince Moazzam Jah Bahadur at Dadirpura, Hyderabad, was constructed at a cost of Rs. 20,000 and is set up for the benefit of the poorer subjects of the State who solemnly pledge themselves to abstain from drink and drugs. The Committee in their address referred to the money spent by the labourers on drink in the State which they estimated must amount to five crores. The Temperance Committee are doing a great amount of spade-work and they are to be congratulated on the official sympathy they have won.

Religious Education in Schools :—In an address presented to Sir Mirza Ismail, Dewan of Mysore, by the Muslim Educational Association of Mangalore, among the difficulties of the community in keeping pace with other communities in education mention was made of "the craze for insisting upon religious studies." This is the first instance that we have come across of a Muslim organisation complaining of this handicap. Sir Mirza, too, seems to have been taken aback, as he advised caution in pressing for reform in this matter. "The roots of religion," he said, "are delicate and should not be lightly bruised." As a matter of fact, however, there is very little of the root of religion in the teaching given in schools. There can not be. Religion is a thing to be lived and if the home surroundings of children do not instil in them the religious motive and not merely the routine of religious practice, the teaching of it from text-books by masters who are not themselves inspired by that motive, can only create disharmony between the home and the school, which is one of the most potent causes of the vitiating tendency usurping the place of character. Sir Mirza suggested that the members of the Association should make the people realise that learning does not consist nowadays of theology, and that the changing conditions required an equally assiduous pursuit of the secular branches of learning. While the Muslim leaders of Mangalore are finding religious teaching a grave handicap to the educational progress of their community, there are people in other parts of the country who want to introduce this handicap from which they are happily free, in schools in their locality. We profoundly believe that religion is indispensable to an integrated life, and equally profoundly believe that it can not be imparted by being taught as part of a school curriculum. The primary duty, in this matter rests with parents. No amount of schooling in the scriptures of the different religions will provide godless parents with godfearing children. Persons who are keen on religion being drilled into their children in schools, will do well to realise their own responsibilty in this direction. There is also the danger that cramming young minds with passages from the Gita, the Bible or the Koran, will create in them a permanent distaste for these scriptures which, even as literature, rank high among the world's classics.

Confessions of Pandit Nehru :—It was the Pioneer, if we remember rightly, that created a sensation by printing the first personal pronoun with the small 'i' in reporting one of Lord Curzon's speeches, with the explanation that it was obliged to do so as the capital 'I' in the printing-room had been exhausted in the first half of His Excellency's address. The story came to mind when reading Pandit Jawaharlal's rambling statement on his position vis-a-vis of Mr. Subhas Bose's re-election to preside over the Indian National Congress. After the almost cynically frank avowal by Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel and others of how Presidents were elected until Mr. Bose broke through the convention, the Pandit should have lost any illusion that he might have cherished about his own re-election for a second and a third time. As Lord Melbourne remarked when he accepted the Garter, "There's no disputed merit about it." The Pandit pathetically observes, "Often I have felt that I was a square peg in a round hole," and that "during the year of my office I have frequently been on the verge of resigning because I felt that I could serve the Congress better if I did not have the responsibilities of office." Nevertheless, he stuck on because he says he was firmly convinced that "in the dynamic and critical times we live in, we must present a united front and subordinate our individual opinion where these tend to impair that front." One has heard a similar reason assigned by persons who held high office and let things be done which went against the principles professed by them. Another stock reason, which the Pandit has mercifully not advanced is that if one resigned on the ground of principle, another who had never professed any principle would step into one's shoes. "How would that be better in the interests of the country?" Notwithstanding his feeling that he was a round man in a square hole, the Pandit stuck to his seat and he implies that he did something sacrificial in so doing. It was, to our mind, the plain duty of the Pandit to resign when he felt that he was a misfit in his office. He not only did violence to his own convictions but he let the public believe that he was pulling his weight in the movement on the lines he believed to be right. If every man who is entrusted with the responsibility of office, conceives his duty to be to preserve at all costs a semblance of unity in the face of the outside world, the movement must inevitably lose its vitality. A touch of fresh air is enough to topple it. If the Pandit and others had better realised their duty to serve the movement not merely with their bodily presence but with their mind and soul, the election of a candidate to the Presidentship who was not favoured by the seniors, would not have caused all this fuss. Where there is no real agreement, it is no good to pretend that there is.

Mr. Subhas Bose on Spain :—There are two news items which seem to have been brought out by Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru's letter to the Congress President regretting Mr. Bose's lack of definiteness in international and national politics. On Wednesday the Press published the news that a Chinese organization had sent its congratulations to Mr. Bose on his election as Congress President because he it was who had "organised the medical mission to China." The same newspapers carried the message which Mr. Bose had sent to Mr. Chamberlain before the British recognition of Franco but after the Congress Working Committee resignations, protesting against the step. "India has throughout given her sympathy and support to the Spanish Republican Government and considers the recognition as a violation of international law and morality," cabled Mr. Bose. We are surprised at this message of the Congress President who has held different views in the past. If now he commits India to Republican support we can only put it down to Mr. Bose's present and urgent need of friends within the Congress. Spain is dear to the heart of Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru and Mr. Bose's cable is not likely to change the course of events in Europe. Hence this concession to the group Pandit Nehru is believed to influence in the Congress.

A Bad Mistake :—By an unaccountable freak of memory, due perhaps to the first news of Lord Brabourne's illness and operation being published on Monday, the day of his death was wrongly mentioned in our editorial note last week as Monday instead of Thursday.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER
BOMBAY, March 4, 1939.

THE POLITICAL GOAL.

In his presidential address to the National Congress held in Benares in 1905, Mr. Gokhale for the first time in the history of the movement prescribed a goal for Indian politics. He said :

> The goal of the Congress is that India should be governed in the interests of the Indians themselves, and that, in course of time, a form of government should be attained in this country similar to what exists in the self-governing colonies of the British Empire. For better or for worse, our destinies are now linked with those of England, and the Congress freely recognises that whatever advance we seek must be within the empire itself. That advance, moreover, can only be gradual, as at each stage of the progress it may be necessary for us to pass through a brief course of apprenticeship before we are enabled to go to the next one; for it is a reasonable proposition that the sense of responsibility, required for the proper exercise of the political institutions of the West, can be acquired by an Eastern people through practical training and experiment only.

In a message to Mr. Gokhale, Mr. Dadabhai Naoroji put forward the same goal 'freedom and self-government like that of the colonies." The concluding sentence of his message has a special significance in view of the present attitude of Congress leaders to Indian States. Mr. Dadabhai wrote :

> Self-government is the only remedy for India's woes and wrongs. For this purpose we must strengthen this Congress, our great body, representative of all India, to go on making every possible effort to accomplish this end, which is quite practicable, and has been already successfully carried out very far by British rulers themselves so far back as thirty-eight years ago, in the case of Mysore.

The event of thirty-eight years ago to which Mr. Dadabhai referred, was the Rendition of Mysore to the Maharaja after it had been for fifty years under British control. It is clear that Mr. Dadabhai regarded self-government as synonymous with indigenous rule and that he had no pedantic theory as to the form of its constitution. Mr. Dadabhai Naoroji presided over the Congress session in Calcutta next year. He devoted a great part of his address, which was read by Mr. Gokhale, to urging on the Indian people to agitate and never cease agitating for self-government. Self-government to him as to Gokhale was government of the country in the interests of the Indian people, by Indian agency within the British empire.

In many respects the most virile personality among Congress leaders was Sir Pherozeshah Mehta. He had definite convictions from which he never swerved. He did not believe in laying down a goal in politics. He concluded his powerful presidential address to the fifth Session of the Congress with the lines from Cardinal Newman's hymn :

I do not ask to see
The distant scene, one step enough for me.

The history of Indian politics during the last twenty years has shown that there is much wisdom in his attitude. To the statesman the goal is always the next step. If this is soundly judged and taken, those who come after him may be relied on to act their part in the same spirit. This is particularly the case when as in politics the goal is changing its shape every day and every year. Colonial self-government which Gokhale declared to be our goal, gave place to dominion status. Within the last few years the Westminister Statute has revolutionised the content of dominion status. Within the last few months and even weeks dominion status has undergone still further change. In India the Liberals adopted dominion status in the place of the colonial model and are still clinging to it. The Congress party has adopted complete Independence as its goal. The example of the Czechs and Arabs, lured by the shadow of Independence, to find themselves deprived of the substantial measure of it which they enjoyed under Austria and Turkey, should be a lesson to us. It should be the care of the social reformer and the statesman by cause not a whit more than the minimum of dislocation that is absolutely unavoidable in effecting innovations and replacements in an existing system. "The more violence, the less revolution," is a profound observation of Bart de Ligt whose untimely death is an irreparable loss to the cause of world peace. Violence is not merely abstention from physical force. Everything is violence which causes a violent reaction in those with whom we deal. Doing your utmost to rouse men's passions to a dangerous pitch by speech and writing and then crying out to them to be non-violent is a contradiction. It is the essence of violence. Ahimsa is primarily a subjective quality. Physical violence indeed may be ahimsa if not prompted by anger or hatred, as when you hold back a child from falling over the parapet wall in its eagerness to snatch the moon out of the heavens.

THE WAR IN SPAIN.

The Spanish civil war is fast drawing to a close. The period of intense fighting has given place after Barcelona to a period of international negotiation in the capitals of Europe. The Republican leaders in Paris and in Geneva have been trying hard to reorganise resistance or, failing that, and in some cases in despair, to obtain a reasonable peace. In their divided attempts the Republicans are faring badly. President Azana has resigned and the peace party is for the moment without office but not without influence. General Franco has been more fortunate. He is not the seeker of friendships abroad. As the dictators did in the early days of his struggle, today the democracies are presenting themselves to him as so many friends. Great Britain and France have been in unseemly haste to recognize General Franco. Mr. Chamberlain, it was reported recently, had decided to recognize General Franco's Government if certain humanitarian conditions relating to treatment of prisoners and to reprisals were conceded. General Franco not only did not give any assurances but in a note expressed with sardonic humour his indignation at any attempt of a foreign power to impose terms on Spain. Only those guilty of "criminal" acts were to be punished. It is easy to see what acts will be considered "criminal" by a victorious party after a civil war. But the British Premier was apparently content with this.

On Monday in the House of Commons, Mr. Chamberlain announced that both France and Britain had decided to recognize General Franco's Government. He made it quite clear that this was the only reasonable course of action since the richest districts in Spain were now in General Franco's possession. The Premier, therefore, as a shrewd businessman, hastened to make friends with the Mammon of unrighteousness. There was more to come. On Tuesday provoked by Major Attlee's virulent speeches, Mr. Chamberlain asked whether any one could say what or where the Republican Government was. Not content with recognizing General Franco, Mr. Chamberlain belittled the Republican Government. It was indeed a greater victory for General Franco than any won at home. The repurcussions on European politics of recognition are tremendous. In Britain, grave disquiet is felt at this second international decision taken by the Government without the previous sanction of Parliament. Major Attlee gave expression to his dissatisfaction with the methods adopted and the irritation displayed both by him and by the Premier seem to show that Labour is at last preparing for organised opposition to the Government outside Parliament if necessary. The policy pursued by the Baldwin and Chamberlain Governments in recent years may well be a factor in bringing down the Parliamentary structure in Britain. The fear that the British Labour Party has always had of its own extreme element, is now overshadowed by the danger of rising Fascism.

At first sight, the peace of Europe seems more secure than it was before the recognition. The main cause of disagreement with Italy has been removed now that General Franco and the old Government have changed places. For now General Franco is the Government and, under international law, it is highly commendable for one Government to help another to put down rebels. On the other hand, by recognition Britain and more specially France have certain responsibilities towards General Franco's State which will not permit their receiving new refugees or even harbouring old ones. How the present position will be adjusted is not known. Neither Italy nor Germany, however, regard the latest developments as an improvement. The dictators feel that Anglo-French manouevres are aimed at preventing Germany and Italy from collecting their reward. Major Attlee in asking the Primier if he had any assurance that Spain would not join the Fascists, no doubt expressed it crudely but he gave expression to what many Britons feel is the only justification for recognition. Mr. Chamberlain must have had in mind the fact that General Franco would be better able to resist German-Italian demands on his gratitude if he had other friends as well beside him. It is gratifying to think of the carefully built up policy of Fascist intervention in Spain toppling down like a house of cards at the first breath of British diplomacy. The only blot in this happy scheme is the Spanish leader who, in a speech closely modelled on those of his dictator allies, expressed his public gratification at Britain's recognition but stood firm by his old friends. The position of France which has been persuaded to recognize General Franco from reasons of self-interest if not self-preservation, is rendered more precarious by the result. In their public utterances the dictators and General Franco as well, carefully avoid any reference to France. Reports of trade negotiations between Soviet Russia and Germany do not improve the French position. The Russians are apparently trying to pay back Western European democracies in their own coin. Just as France and Britain in their Munich and post-Munich policies were prepared to encourage German ambitions in the East if they were left alone, Russia is adopting like tactics to secure peace on the East. A wedge has been driven in between the democracies and the Soviet States. By that alone Germany has immeasurably improved her position in European politics.

For Spain herself, we do not think it makes much difference which side wins so long as she has peace even now. Writing last year, Senor Manuel Chaves Nogales, a leading Spanish liberal, who continued to edit a Republican paper under a Council of Workers after the outbreak of war, has summed up the position. "The final issue of the present struggle, he says, in his prologue to "And in the Distance a Lights" 'does not interest me very much. I do not care if the future dictator of Spain springs out of one or the other side of the trench.....One cannot for a moment believe that the old state of affairs will be restored; for it is not possible even to imagine that the politicians, whether monarchist or republican of pre-war times, will step back into their places again. These men are dead to public life.....Spain will be neither a fascist colony nor an advance post of communism; neither enslaved under a landed gentry or the dictatorship of the proletariat." It is well to bear this in mind. Whatever survives in Spain, democracy is dead—was dead long ago. It could hardly have been expected to survive the terrible cataclysm of the past thirty months.

INDIA AND RESPONSIBLE GOVERNMENT.

(By Politicus)

Responsible Government of the British type implies that

(a) a Ministry should be a Committee of the Legislature;

(b) at least two parties, one of which (the majority) is in power and the other (the minority) is in opposition;

(c) a Ministry should resign, the moment it ceases to command a majority in the Legislature.

Taking the first, a Ministry is not really a Committee in the sense that it is a replica of the entire House, it is only a replica of the majority party therein.

As regards parties, advocates of responsible Government always insist that, unless there is an effective opposition, we can not be sure of a reasonable standard of good government. It is implicit, therefore, that a Ministry representing the majority party successful at an election, is very likely to exploit power for furthering party interests and their conduct of the administration has to be under the vigilant scrutiny of an Opposition ever on the alert to expose the mistakes and mischiefs of the party in power and thereby slowly to convert itself into a majority, defeat the Ministry in office and seize power itself. The race for power thus pursued on narrow party lines is prima facie unhealthy from the public point of view—even in countries where parties, are divided on political issues,—i. e., issues relating it may be, to the best methods of achieving the greatest good of the greatest number—especially as the motto of the opposition is 'to oppose, whatever the merits of the Government's proposal or policy may be.' The third feature again necessarily and further implies that the party in opposition which, for the time being, is in a minority in both the legislature and the country, can convert itself in due course into a majority and bid for a spell of power and that people, both in the legislature and in the country, are free to transfer their allegiance from one party to the other according as they feel persuaded for a particular period. This state of things is possible when persons are elected to the legislature on political issues; it is non-existent where legislatures are constituted on a communal basis.

As regards the third, it has to be remembered that Minstries should have reasonable stability,—i. e., should be in office for a reasonable term—if they are to have a chance of doing good or even of giving the nation, whose destinies are for the time being in their hands, a sense of ordinary security. Where the conditions relating to the constitution of a legislature—where, e. g., it consists of a number of communal and sub-communal groups each suspicious of the other—are such that reasonable stability is not likely to be attained, it is dangerous to good government to insist on this.

Self-government may be better than mere good government by, say, a foreign agency, but not at the expense entirely of good government, especially where it is possible to achieve such good government through your own agency.

Again, self-government (or any other kind of government for that matter) is not the mere possession or exercise of power. The task of every government is to exercise power fairly and impartially. Could a government drawn from a particular party altogether eliminate unfairness or partiality in day-to-day administration? The high traditions of public office in England and the development of parties therein on exclusively political issues have reduced unfairness and exploitation of power to the minimum, but even England is not altogether free from them.

Whether in British India or in an Indian State, the constituencies electing members to the Legislature are frankly communal. But a heroic attempt is being made in British India out of the legislatures constituted on communal lines:

(i) to group members so elected into political parties;

(ii) and, to draw the personnel of Ministries from such political parties but taking care to ensure communal representation even in doing so!

It accordingly happens, for instance, that the solitary Congress Muslim in the House goes into a Congress Ministry. Every other Muslim being, say, a Leaguer, the Muslim community as a whole feels that in the Cabinet it has no effective representation and the majority which supports the Ministry in the House is almost entirely Hindu. No wonder the Muslims are violently kicking against Congress Governments in the Provinces. This discontent is bound to grow and, in the process, embitter communal animosities further unless one of two things happens, viz.,

(1) communal electorates as well as candidatures are done away with.

(2) communal representation both in the Legislature and the Ministry is reckoned with as a permanent, not a transitional, factor, and the Ministers representing each community are the men who command the largest number of votes in that community.

Now as to (1), I would just say in passing that I do not think joint electorates with reservation of seats will mean any substantial improvement.

As to (2), the implication is that Ministers so chosen may not be of the same political views. It will, therefore, be necessary, while they are in office that they should to some extent behave like members of the permanent service and carry out the orders of authorities competent to issue them—in this case, the Legislature or the Ruler. And inside the Cabinet itself, the procedure should be on the lines of Council Government—differences being settled by the majority in the Council. Government by Council—manned in the earlier years entirely by service men and in later years by a combination of service and non-service men—has had a long and distinguished history behind it, and I rather think Council Governments manned entirely in due course by elected men—holding office for a definite term and not removable by a vote of the Legislature merely but removable at the pleasure of the appointing authority, viz., the Ruler—should be able to give a better account of themselves on account of their intimate connection with the electorate.

In any case, the chances are remote of the success of a system which tries to constitute Ministries on political lines out of legislatures elected from communal constituencies.

II.

Of the three principal organs of Government—the legislature, the executive and the judiciary—the first is a deliberative body and is engaged in laying down broad lines of policy; the evil influence of party does not produce much mischief in a large body with such functions.

But the executive and judiciary are engaged in the application of law to and in the exercise of equitable discretion towards, individuals; and administration—

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

whether executive or judicial—must be not merely legal but just also and, therefore, must be impartial and above party. It is now an axiom that, when a party man is appointed to a judicial office, he should shed all party considerations and deal out justice impartially; indeed this is expected of every man appointed to any office in the permanent service whatever his policies or community be. The principle underlying this code of correct conduct is obviously equally applicable to Ministerships. Ministers should do their administrative work on thoroughly non-party lines. If that should be the code of honour for every person appointed Minister, should he necessarily resign on the first adverse vote in the legislature?

The elimination of party from Ministries will tend in course of time to eliminate party voting in legislatures and opposition on mere party lines. Criticism and voting on the merits—and not engineered by caucuses will be more in keeping with the essential purpose of a deliberative assembly. Government by discussion necessarily involves that those who participate in a discussion, will feel themselves at liberty to arrive at a decision on the merits as a result of the discussion. Otherwise, it is a denial of freedom—a fundamental right on which every party man loudly insists.

An efficient executive must be united and have joint responsibility under the leadership of a Prime Minister. Responsibility should, therefore, be to one authority—I mean real responsibility, not merely nominal. Unity and joint responsibility are inconsistent with any form of diarchy in which some Ministers are responsible to one authority and others to another, or the same Minister is responsible to one for certain things and to another for others. A diarchic executive can never be independent or strong either.

In Indian States, there are different categories of executive action, viz.,

(a) those relating to Paramountcy—relations with the Paramount power, outside relations, etc.;

(b) administration of subjects as to which the State has federated;

(c) administration of what would be provincial subjects in British India;

(d) administration of what would be federal subjects in British India as to which the State has not federated or has federated only subject to reservations;

(e) subjects excluded or reserved from the control of the legislature by the Constitution.

It is obvious from this classification:

(i) that the responsibility of the executive cannot be to the State legislature in respect of (a), (b), and (e) at present;

and (ii), that, if the Ministers who will as a body administer all the subjects, have to be responsible to any single authority, it must be to the Ruler who in his turn will be accountable to outside authorities such as the Federation in the case of (b) and the Crown representative in the case of (a).

A fixed executive which holds office for a term and owes responsibility not to the legislature but to the nation directly as in the case of the United States, is also usually visualised as a non-parliamentary one. But it need not necessarily be so—cf. the Swiss system.

Similarly, the fixed executive in Indian States which will owe responsibility to the Ruler and not to the legislature should it be parliamentary or non-parliamentary, i.e., should its members have seats in the legislature, and its Chief function as leader of the House? I think that the answer should be in the affirmative as this system will make for smooth relations between executive and legislature and ensure informed and trained guidance in the transaction of business. It need, however, not be parliamentary in the sense that the whole of its personnel should be drawn from a communal or other party having a majority in the House.

Is not a link—in the shape of one or more liason officers—desirable between a Minister, who owes his office not necessarily to membership or voting strength in the legislature, and the House with a majority of elected members? I should say again, Yes, for the following reasons:—

(a) They with their intimate touch with the electorate and co-representatives will place public opinion before the executive and interpret Government policy to the electorate and their colleagues.

(b) In the House, they will be useful in debate and in guiding voting.

(c) The device will satisfy to some extent the natural ambitions of elected members for office.

(d) In due course, the arrangement will throw up a band of men who will combine parliamentary gifts with some experience of the way in which a fixed irremovable executive should deal with parliamentary business without weakening executive efficiency or character — a band from which the Ruler may well choose some or all of his Ministers in the fullness of time.

It should, however, be insisted that these liason officers—whatever name may be given to them—are not intended as a half-way house to a parliamentary removable executive. They are intended, rather, as a permanent device for linking the executive with the legislature and promoting the smooth working of a fixed executive in relation to the legislature.

There are likely, it might be urged, to be possibilities of the undivided responsibility to the Ruler conflicting with due responsibility to the legislature. But this is reduced to a minimum, if not entirely, eliminated, by the constitution providing—in a fully developed and competent democracy—how the legislature can legally assert itself over a recalcitrant executive. An instance of this is that a President's veto in the United States can be overridden by both Houses of the legislature passing again the vetoed measure by a two-thirds majority. The Courts will enforce this constitutional provision.

In an Indian State, with a Ruler and the inhabitants in their present state of political development such a constitutional provision for overriding the Ruler's veto would be both premature and unwise.

Until the legislature and the executive have accumulated experience of functioning in their respective spheres in a spirit of active cooperation for the public good and without quarrelling on narrow party lines, the Ruler has to stand between the two, overriding the one or the other in cases of conflict between the two, judging each case on its merits.

RESPONSIBLE GOVERNMENT FOR INDIAN STATES.

Outline of a Constitution.

I. Legislature.

(a) Constitution:—Single Chamber—Elective majority now—Fully elected in the fullness of time.

(b) Powers. (1) Normally the only authority for law-making. (At present power to be reserved to the Ruler for making all laws without reference to legislature, if necessary, but this should in due course fall into desuetude. But power to executive to issue ordinances to meet emergencies and for limited periods.)

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

(ii) Assenting to appropriations and taxation proposals.

(iii) Guiding and controlling executive as to policy and administration.

(c) No parties—neither Ministerial nor Opposition—voting on merits not according to party whips.

II. Executive:

Fixed (i. e. irremovable for a term subject to pleasure of Ruler).

To have seats in legislature ex-officio.

Appointment on merits—not to be confined now to members of Legislature.

Responsibility to Ruler.

Should submit to and carry out decisions of legislature which by law are binding on them. In other matters,—i. e. where such decisions are not legally binding but are only recommendations, etc., within spheres in which legislature could make such recommendations—Ministers, if they disagree, should submit them for Ruler's decision.

If Ruler agrees with the legislature, Ministers must carry them out or resign. The procedure will indirectly enforce responsibility to the legislature where the Ruler is in agreement wtth it. Where he is not in such agreement, Ministers should be free to reject the recommendations and continue in office—conduct quite consistent with the responsibility which is owing to an authority outside the legislature, in this case the Ruler.

Responsible Government in this sense is not dissimilar in principle to what obtains in America. Only

(a) the outside authority there is the nation, here it is the Ruler;

(b) the executive known to the law there is a single individual, the President, here it is a group of individuals, the Council of Ministers;

(c) during the tenure of office of the President in the United States the outside authority, the nation, has no normal legal method of asserting itself between the executive and the legislature when they disagree or defy the each other, except when such disagreement or defiance can be adjudicated upon by the Supreme Court. Here provision will be made for the outside authority, the Ruler, to assert himself in every case of such disagreement for which the law does not provide another effective solution. (The violence to democracy in this latter case will arise only when, the Ruler's decision is in fact at variance with the probable will, i. e. the real interests of nation, whether that will is in favour of the executive or the legislature). Wherever the Ruler is a true interpreter of the nation's interests and will—and this should be normally assumed—this would be a better arrangement for enforcing responsibility to the nation.

III. Judiciary.

The Judiciary should be independent— vis-a-vis both the Executive and the Legislature.

THE CONGRESS PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION AND AFTER.

(By J. M. Ganguli, Calcutta.)

In spite of the manifesto issued on the eve of the Presidential election by several leading members of the Congress explaining to the voters the non-importance of the President's position in the Congress, wherein he was more a figure-head than a governing force, Mr. Subhas Chandra Bose's election has assumed considerable significance. It has been discussed also widely in the country from various points of view—from the point of view of the country's attitude further stiffening against Federation, from that of its inclining more and more towards Leftism, from the point of view of indicating a growing tendency of revolt in the Congress against the so-called methods of Fascism in it, and so on. But the possible results of Mr. Bose's victory on the future cultural progress of the country have been little considered. In the rush and roar of political agitation and in the heat of polemics thereabout, it is not uncommon for leaders to neglect the cultural side of a national movement. But if that be the case now, following the election of Mr. Bose and the drift of the Congress towards Leftism, Mahatma Gandhi's efforts during the last two decades to direct Indian thought towards the native culture of the land will have gone to waste. Mahatmaji's influence in this respect has not yet gone deep enough among the educated people to prevent their relapse into crude imitation and adoption of Westernism, which they have been doing for the last few generations. Most of even the stalwart leaders, while adopting Indian ways and manners outwardly under stress of the prevalent national movement set on foot by Gandhiji, inwardly think un-Indian-wise. Whatever they may say, and however they may write or orate, their heart has been so completely swamped by Western civilization that it is difficult for them to come to surface and see anything inspiring in the apparent rusticity of their own native culture. Gandhiji's realization of this state of things was the best evidence of his possessing a far keener political insight than any of his contemporary and preceding leaders, and his most valuable contribution to the Indian cause has been his insistence, by precept and personal example, on people living and respecting their own national traditions, manners and institutions. National dress, national modes of address, national language, national education, national cottage industries, and so on, and even national and traditional, as opposed to western, conceptions of ethics and morality, Gandhiji placed on the forefront of politics, which he did not construe in the ordinary conventional manner as being unrelated to the above. Congress sittings be held in villages, delegates squatted on the ground not only for deliberations, but even for their meals, though many of them at their home would not think of it and would invariably sit at their dining-table in the right English style. A small matter, that,—many would no doubt say; but these simple things, these simple details of life often throw much light on how an individual's mind is working and on how keen he is to discard his own manners and customs and to adopt those of others instead.

Gandhiji's advent in Indian politics, when his educated countrymen were thus losing their heads and were being denationalised, brought about a turn in the tide, which would by all means be maintained and preserved. If the direction of the country's politics with the control of the Congress were to pass out of Gandhiji's influence and fall into the hands of Socialists and the so-called Leftists, India's future, cultural as well as political, could only be viewed with grave misgivings. There are, no doubt, capable and sincere people among them, but not many deep thinkers with long penetrating future vision. Fewer of them still are un-denationalised at heart. They think mostly in terms of the West, of Western ways, Western methods, Western policy, Western civilization, and would love to transplant them wholesale on the Indian soil. But nothing could be more suicidal and unfortunate for Indian nationalism than that. A nationalism that is sucked out of its nativity, that dismembers its hands and legs to put on borrowed ones instead, and that is unable to draw inspirafrom its own inherited culture and its great traditions, is as good as not living, and is certainly not, at any rate, capable of attaining proper stature. "But, look at Japan," they would report—though most thinkers and keen observers of the world would agree that the present denationalised civilization of Japan, in spite of its present passing material successes, is more to be denounced than praised, and has been more harmful than beneficial to the people of the land, if things are viewed from a high perspective. For an old country like India, with very precious traditions of its own, social, religious, and cultural, to imitate the soul-less, denationalised civilization of Japan, based blindly on the western model, would be calamitous in the extreme to the country itself, as well as to the world at large, to which true and unadulterated Indian culture and civilization have a valuable message to give.

It is such thoughts which generate misgivings in one's mind on account of the prospects of the present mass national movement going out of Gandhian influence, as a result of the Presidential election. Flushed with victory at the polls, some may think of forcing the pace of political freedom, and of drawing up a high-sounding and sensational political programme. But let them not forget that for all that the nation's cultural foundations must be strong and broad-based on native traditions that, from the scientific point of view, have much more evolutionary significance than impulsive, short-visioned people would care to give them.

I commend these considerations to the delegates to the Tripure Congress, who will be called upon to give a lead to the national movement, not in an atmosphere of calmness free from bias and prejudice, but in one surcharged with them and heated by passionate fury, partisanship, high-sounding rhetoric deceptive advocacy, prophetic sayings uttered with, theatrical posings and vote-capturing canvassing.

HINDU MARRIAGE AND STRIDHANA.—I.

(By R. V. V. Tatachariar, Madras.)

My object is to show that all the eight forms of Hindu marriage are now obsolete, and that a transcendent or composite type of it alone prevails today and that succession to Stridhana must accordingly vary its course.

Sir Henry Mayne has shown how in South India the Asura form prevails among the non-Brahmins and the Rakshasa form is formally gone through among certain warrior peoples of Central India. He says of the orthodox opinion handed down from the days of Commentaries that, barring the two instances, all other forms except the Brahma form have gone out of vogue, and the Brahma marriage is presumed in all cases to have been invariably performed. But it is submitted that this is wholly incorrect as will be seen on due and careful attention being given to the subject.

The original definition of 'Brahma' was that the Brahmin bridegroom must be invited to receive the hand of the bride in marriage; while the later one, consistent with the immemorial tradition among non-Brahmins, was that the bridegroom seeks and asks for the girl's hand. Secondly, a true 'gift' of a girl of any caste, including the Sudra or the fourth caste, could be made only to a Brahmin as said of all other gifts on all occasions. We do not hear of gifts being made to Brahmins of any other castes than the Brahmin. The Asura form was adopted in such cases, wherein the bride was received in exchange for a gift of cattle or cloth. The Daiva form was gone through when the girl was given to an officiating young priest at the close of any great sacrifice along with, or as part of, Dakshina or the customary fee due to him. The Prajapatya form was to be found where the man and wife, both being well versed in the theory and practice of Karmayoga, stipulated that nothing would be done by either without the other's company and co-operation. This too meant that a Brahmin bridegroom was involved.

It is not too much to say, therefore, that in every one of the four approved forms a Brahmin bridegroom only was concerned and that the term 'gift' of the girl was not always a gift in the true and precise sense of the term, but involved different shades of meaning—viz., reward, stipulation, token of consideration. Even in the Brahma form 'gift' implied different shades of meaning ranging from full ownership, through dominion, to mere custody or courtesy.

Originally, it meant actual bodily or corporal gift of the girl as any other object of gift and was attended by the significant pouring of water simultaneously from the hands of the giver into those of the taker, implying thereby that the girl never more reverted back to her parent's gotra (family) and their dominion or possession, even as the water did not get back to the giver's from the taker's hands.

The gift included all jewels on the person of the girl at the time, which on her death without issue went logically to the husband, and not to her parents. And the marriage itself was irrevocable and indissoluble by divorce, unlike the case of other forms of marriage. This aspect is, no doubt, observed by certain non-Brahmin communities also in the wake of Brahmins. But the original state of affairs among non-Brahmins is now being sought by the Legislature to be applied to Brahmins as well, in order to give relief to women in some extreme cases.

But, as the status and dignity of person of a wife, son and slave rose up gradually by reason of recognition of stridhana, partition of ancestral estate, and emancipation, the notion of gift and sale of girls and boys in marriage and adoption was becoming increasingly felt to be incongruous and disconcerting. Apastamba ruled that it was all wrong and took the trouble to explain away the 'hundred pieces of money' given to the bride's father seated in the carriage, by the bridegroom's party as either entirely optional with him or merely intended to bring about the relationship or bond of marriage in the eye of the law.

By this time the four inferior forms of marriage had come to be denounced and even penalised. But what was the fate of the girls who had been dealt with, unfortunately, in ways prohibited or penalised by law? The answer is twofold. After the prescribed prayaschittam or expiation of consequential sin, the victimised girls were, by Devala and other sages, declared pure again and fit for marriage with any decent and proper bridegroom and, where the society was not prepared for it, the violator was compelled to pay a heavy fine that looked like or amounted to a bride-price or sulka, and not at once to marry the victim under social pressure. He was also punished with the expenses of marriage and the loss of his right to her stridhana if she died without issue, even if the form formally gone through were of the Brahma or any other approved kind. In other words, the hard fact could not be altered by a hundred texts, as the maxim says.

But let us note the progress in history of what happens in a Brahma form of marriage. It is true that time was when a mere promise to offer a girl in marriage induced at once the transfer of dominion over her to the promissee, in the event of whose death pending marital ceremonies, his brother obtained her person for raising issue on her by Niyoga for the benefit of the deceased. If and when, the girl were given away to another family in breach of promise though after the promissee's death, it was held to amount to the heinous sin of untruth relating to person. For even the promissee husband could not by gift or sale part with his wife or dominion over her person. Similarly a girl bought in Asura form of marriage had to wed, on the death of the proposed bridegroom, his own brother provided that, in later epochs, the girl consented to the course.

The bride-price was either paid at once in a lump sum to the father of the girl or in easy instalments, the first being paid to him when he arrived with the girl in his carriage in front of the bridegroom's house. But the failure to pay the subsequent instalment neither entailed forfeiture of those paid already nor rendered the marriage void or voidable, especially after the customary marriage ceremonies were gone through. These payments, mostly the later part payments, gradually came to be returned to the girl by her father to serve as a sort of provision for her against a future accident or contingency or as part of other stridhana which naturally and necessarily devolved on her parents and their issue if she happened to die childless. But what became of the first part-payment made to her father? Perhaps he took it for himself or for the use of the girl. In such circumstances, the first payment, be it a hundred coins or a petty fraction thereof, easily disclosed and determined the true nature and form of the marriage and the line of future succession to her stridhana on her leaving no issue by the marriage.

When the first instalment ceased to be followed by the rest or when the law discountenanced the recovery of the rest it stood there merely for the purpose of distinguishing the type of marriage and discovering the true line of stridhana succession. The first or original payment might be a good figure or a paltry amount; but when it became altogether optional or nominal, it lost all its original sting of being the nefarious bride-price, and came to be treated as a mere formality or innocuous usage; but all the same it has been a very useful relic of the past in that it helps us to discover and decide as to which of the contending husband and parents of the deceased lady is really entitled in law to her stridhana.

There might be other ways and means of discovering whether a particular marriage followed the Brahma or Asura form; for instance, the invariable custom in the community or usage in the family, the so-called gift or rather, delivery of the custody, of the bride preceding or succeeding the homam if any, the observance or non-performance of the homam, the fasting or otherwise of the giver, taker and the bride; the number of days of marriage celebration, etc. The cumulative effect of all these particulars coupled with the observance of the relic of the bride-price and above all, the logic, reason, justice, and the source or origin of stridhana, whether it issued from the parents' or the husband's side—all these have to be taken into consideration in deciding the question of stridhana succession, whether it be among Brahmins or non-Brahmins.

RABINDRANATH TAGORE ON HIS WORK*

From the banks of the Padma I came to settle down in Santiniketan Ashrama, forty years ago, with the idea of starting work in education and village reform. My resources as well as practical experience were meagre; most of my life, from childhood, I had been immersed in literary activities.

My work in our zamindary in North Bengal had given me an intimate contact with the village life. With my own eyes I had seen how scarcity of water affected rural homes; I had observed the effects of disease and starvation on the emaciated population. Repeated events proved to me that apathy born of ignorance plunged men into utter misery and made them easy victims of betrayal. The anglicised urban gentry of that period, engaged in pursuing the reverse tide of progress, could hardly dream that the weight of helpless humanity would sooner sink our craft than make it advance.

A tornado of self-rebellion had come to our land shaking our political delusions. That was a time when even an uninitiated person like myself was made to accept presidentship of the provincial Congress. I got acquainted with many of the political leaders of the day. To some of them I pointed out that the drama of national self-expression could not be real if rural India were banished to the outer darkness behind the stage.

My suggestion was turned down in very unambiguous language. On that day I decided that a poet's dream alone could offer companionship to my project: there was, apparently, no place for it elsewhere.

Long before this I had started rural service with scanty means and a few companions. There had not been enough time for any history of that work to become recognisable. Let that be.

My agony did not merely show itself in my poems, it dragged the poet himself to the arduous field of work. What power could an indigent worker possess save in his vision of truth.

My aspiration did not claim any wide area for cultivation; it did seem possible, however, that a strip of land could be found for sowing seeds.

In the hard soil of Birbhum I started planting seeds. The promise of the seed lies secret in the ground beneath. Being invisible, its existence can be doubted; nobody can be blamed, at least, for affecting derision. I had the bad reputation, moreover, of being rich and, what is worse, of being a poet. Aggrieved, I wondered—where then are those competent persons who were neither rich nor poetic? But the period of obscurity is that of true preparation. For long years I did not attempt to bring my work before the public. Had I done so, my immature work would have merited neglect.

No clear-cut plan was ready in my mind when I began. Indefiniteness is perhaps natural to the initial stages of work launched by a poet. Creation, in all its forms, starts at the threshold of the unrevealed, from the sub-conscious it evolves towards the conscious. Construction, on the other hand, begins with a plan; any deviation is promptly corrected. Where living growth is concerned, I believe in natural unfoldment. My rural service has followed such a course; this takes time but the roots go deeper.

Though I had no definite plans, I had some general principles. Readers of my "Sadhana" period know that I repudiated political dependence in no uncertain terms. Fight for freedom would be absurd while hugging the tters of dependence. Not only in foreign rule, but ay in home affairs, the shame of slavery must lie equally heavy. Attempting to help villagers from outside would be, I knew, an unnatural procedure. People have to find faith in their own strength and in the organising of strength. That, for me, is an essential principle.

Creative joy, we must realise, is natural to man. This, again, is a principle for our workers to remember. Villagers do not merely exist to carry on agriculture, to fill their own stomachs merely and ours to repletion. Folk literature, folk arts, folk music, and folk dances have appeared in all lands in a wealth of spontaneous expression. Our village ponds have now gone dry and become polluted: the same applies to rural reservoirs of happiness. Consequently, the villagers have been driven away from man's supreme privilege—the creation of beauty—what is more, chronic illness has sapped their body and mind.

My aim has been to assist in bringing the flood-tide of life's joy to the arid villages, urging them towards diverse self-expression. Creative work is undertaken, not for mere affluence but for self-attainment. Permeation of this spirit would surely lead villages to new paths of self-preservation. Barbarians, bound in the coils of livelihood, unable to express their joy in life, offer the most lamentable spectacle of humiliation.

We have not ignored the problem of livelihood; but we have also recognised man's essential hunger for beauty. Assessing culture by economic standards I consider to be wholly unworthy; distributing human privileges according to the weight of ledger books is sordid commercialism. Financial difficulties have prevented me from fully applying my ideas but it also takes time to train up the minds of workers. My own time will be probably have ended before that happens, but I must leave my ideas explained.

I should like, before I conclude, to make an appeal. You are leaders in the field of politics. Once upon a time the kings offered their patronage in the production of national wealth. Such wealth was not merely in riches but is the creation of beauty. Not Kuber's treasury but the lotus of Lakshmi is its abode.

You are the symbols of our nationhood. My prayer at your door is laid not before that of the king, but of my Motherland. Accept from me, on behalf of the country, the fruits of my life efforts. In this work as in others I have met with much opposition from my countrymen. It has often taken the form of criticism that the temple of service raised by me will disappear with my life. If this is so, whose failure will it be, mine or yours? I appeal to you, therefore, examine if there is any truth in my work, whether sacrificial service has flowered it with wealth from within. If the results satisfy you, take upon yourself, with a gracious heart, the task of preserving this work, and of making it grow. Entering even through the portals of my death, may your own vitality give it perennial life.

THINKING WITH SPINOZA.

BERNHARD MOLLENHAUER in Unity:

"Great geniuses," says Emerson, "have the shortest biographies." The biography of Spinoza is short: he died at the age of forty-four, and his life was outwardly not spectacular. Yet in a way his life and strange Odyssey of the Jews. We little realize the deep inwardness, the vast endurance, the patience, the tragedy, and the loneliness of this man.

Benedict Spinoza was born in the Ghetto of Amsterdam, in 1632. While still a boy, he became aware of the contrast between the narrow schooling of the synagogue and the liberal culture around him. His interest in the new learning of Europe found no favour with his strict and cautious elders. His student days were hardly over before they asked him to recant certain of his views which had become known to them. Finding him unmoved by their promises and threats, they cut him off from his people, a severe sentence in those days. Spinoza accepted his ostracism and persecution with quiet resignation. He was too well-balanced to become an embittered radical, and managed to preserve his mental health under seemingly impossible conditions. He found all society for a time against him and heard no friendly voice except that of his Latin teacher, Van den Ende, who was himself under suspicion of heresy. And so Spinoza took refuge in the trade of lensmaking. Heine says, "All our modern philosophers, though often perhaps unconsciously, see through the glasses which Spinoza ground."

The philosophy of Spinoza has some points in common with contemporary Humanism. It stresses human values and banishes all things supernatural and occult. Spinoza's emphasis on the unity of God and Nature does not debase God but elevates nature. Three centuries of science have made it easier for us to grasp the God-idea of Spinoza. Perhaps the best introduction to the philosophy of Spinoza is his short treatise On the Improvement of the Understanding. It is his voyage of discovery, beginning with an account of his search for truth and the way to lasting happiness. We see here that Spinoza was no ascetic who scorned the refinements of the life and saw nothing but vanity in the ways of the world: his nature was too strong to need the stimulant of pessimism. There is no posing in his confession that he believed the exclusive pursuit of worldly pleasures and titles is vain and futile. It is the frankest confession in the world. He knew what it was to have a secure position in society and what it meant to walk on the outer wastes of spiritual darkness, poverty, and failure. More than once he refused tempting offers of gain and worldly recognition, because he loved his hard-won independence. He believed the pursuit of truth our greatest adventure, for to understand the world, to be in it and yet not of it, is to inwardly possess it. When a man see life from that point of view he can have no desire to exploit his fellowmen. He is more concerned with a new criterion of values, and finds happiness in service rather than in being served. Spinoza believed that all science should be inspired by an ideal of human freedom and the "intellectual love of God."

Discrimination between the real and the unreal, and the ideal of a human character more stable and perfect than our own, turn us in the direction of a higher level of experience. Yet the goal is far off. While we are endeavouring to bring the mind into the right path, we may lay down provisional rules of conduct. When setting out on his quest for truth as a young man, Spinoza made three rules for himself.

To speak in a manner comprehensible to the people, and to do for them all things that do not prevent us from attaining our ends.....

To enjoy only such pleasures as are necessary for the preservation of health.....

Finally, to seek only enough money.....as is necessary for the maintenance of our life and health, and to comply with such customs as are not opposed to what we seek.

Spinoza associated the degrees of knowledge and understanding with the several stages of moral progress. At the lowest stage of thought man is without any conception of natural law and is a creature of circumstance, swayed by superstitious fears. His knowledge is not above the level of hearsay evidence and opinions formed from chance observations, more often from fanciful traditions. Life is passed in a state of bondage to things little understood and often feared. We read in Homer how helpless were even kings before the play of wind and tide. They were often reading omens and seeking favours of the gods. Organized experience, scientific thought, taught man to seek in nature not a fairy realm of gods of wood and stream, but a world order with a rationality akin to mind. When he rose above myth and fancy, above a crude picture logic, to think in terms of law, cause and effect, the unseen relations of things and their properties became controlling interests. The individual is seen in the light of the universal. Insight into natural law brought man a measure of freedom unthought of before. But even in Spinoza's time the conception of natural law was not universally accepted. The ignorant still carried amulets, and a powerful priesthood thundered its anathemas against the youth who were giving renewing ideas of natural science that were lifting humanity out of superstition and stagnation. Galileo was forced to recant, and Bruno was burned at the stake. A whole century passed before the mission of Spinoza was understood.

For Spinoza there is no conflict between mind and nature, religion and natural law. The natural world without and the spiritual world within are not hostile and intrinsically alien to one another, but co-operative expressions, of one reality. The infinite variety and change we see in nature are the expression of divine law. Everything grows, or endures, according to the law of its own being. Nothing arises out of nothing or is the creature of chance.

Like our Puritan tradition, the medieval divine had put a gulf between spirit and matter, God and the world. They identified ethics not so much with rational conduct as with ceremonial observance and arbitary prohibitions. The blessed life was represented as impossible without Divine Grace, and even then it assumed the character of a forced conventional existence in a lost world. Like the great humanist Socrates, Spinoza identified virtue not with a strained attempt to observe arbitrary commands blindly, but with a recognition of the fact that the origin of moral law lies in the spiritual nature of man himself. "To act absolutely in conformity with virtue," says Spinoza, "is nothing but acting according to our own proper nature."

FASCISM, SOCIALISM, COMMUNISM AND THE NEW DEAL.

In veiw of the increasing interest in political slogans which has arisen in this country since the slection of Mr. Subhas Chandra Bose to the Congress Presidentship, we reprint from Time the following terse and handy definitions:

C. F. Childs, investment dealers, in their January bulletin speak thus:—

Socialism means that if you have two cows, you give one to your neighbour.

Under Communism, you given both cows to the Government which gives you back some of the milk.

Under Fascism, you keep the cows but give the milk to the Government which sells some of it back to you.

And under New Dealism, you shoot one cow, milk the other and then pour the milk down the sink.

THE TRADITIONAL HOME OF THE SANDALWOOD TREE.

It is in perfumery that the greater proportion of Sandalwood Oil is employed at the present day and to discriminating buyers, such as perfumers and soap manufacturers must of necessity be, it is hardly necessary to extol the virtues of the East Indian Oil which is without equal, both as a fine perfume base and a fixative for the increasingly popular bouquets of the Oriental type, In addition it is now being used extensively, and with marked success, in the creation of some of the more delicate perfumes in which the Sandalwood odour is not required as a predominant character.

A few trials will convince the perfumer who has not taken full advantage of the odour-value of this oil, that is of the greatest use to him, not only for predominant Sandalwood odour where required, but also a modifier and a fixative for other odours. This is true for liquid perfumes, soaps, creams, powders and all other cosmetic preparations. It will be found invaluable to those up-to-date perfumers who pride themselves on their own "creations."

NOTES.

Lord Brabourne:—There is no instance within living memory of the Governor of a Presidency dying during his term of office. This itself makes Lord Brabourne's death on Monday at Calcutta an event calling for special notice. Besides this, Lord Brabourne had established himself in the affections of a large circle of friends in Bombay where he was Governor for four years and in Bengal where he has presided over the administration for the past two years. For four months of this period he acted as Governor-General during Lord Linlithgow's absence on leave in England and did so with perfect propriety. His period in India has witnessed the transition of the provinces from diarchy to autonomy, and, though the hand of the Secretary of State guided the operation at every stage, credit also belongs to Lord Brabourne for the efficient manner in which he handled the delicate processes involved in two important provinces. Great sympathy is felt for Lady Brabourne in her unprecedented bereavement far away from her family and relations.

Constitutional Reform in States:—Kashmir and Baroda announced within the last few days measures of constitutional reform. These are mainly the enlargement of their existing representative assemblies, increasing the elective element in them, and nominating from among the elected members Ministers and Parliamentary Secretaries to Ministers. Cochin led the way a year ago by nominating a Minister responsible to the popular Assembly and entrusting him with a portfolio. This was on the Diwan's plan. The subject entrusted to the Minister was to be administered under the guidance of the Assembly. The first Minister appointed under this scheme unfortunately died prematurely after giving evidence of his great ability and zeal in the public interest. His successor from all accounts is acquitting himself equally well. This shows that there is no dearth of men in Cochin who can be entrusted with the responsibility of administration in the complex political structure of an Indian State. Kashmir announced a few days ago certain constitutional changes which have obtained the Maharaja's sanction. The chief feature of them is the appointment of Parliamentary Secretaries from the elected members of the Popular Assembly to be a link between the Executive Government and the Legislature. This, of course, falls far short of responsible government but responsible government has not given a very good account of itself everywhere and the Government of Kashmir does well in hastening slowly in improving its machinery. Baroda has taken this week a bolder step than either Cochin or Kashmir. It can do this because of the great advance made under the late Maharaja in every direction by the State. The popular Assembly is to be enlarged considerably and one of the elected members, the one most acceptable to a majority, is to be taken into the Government as a full participator in the administration, with access to all the proceedings and papers including those within the purview of the Dewan himself. No other State so far has taken this step.

Nagpur Vice-Chancellor's Apologia:—The Vice-Chancellor of Nagpur University, Mr. Kedar, made a statement to the University Court on the 11th February explaining why he favoured the admission by Nagpur University of the students who have left Osmania University. The spokesman of the students has declared that he and his friends would have stopped singing Bande Mataram had they been approached by their fellow Muslim students who regarded it as offensive to their religious sensibilities. To persist in the face of this explicit declaration in representing that the students left their University as a vindication of Bande Mataram as a national song and their right to sing it, as the Vice-Chancellor did, was not fair to the University Court. We have said that the matter would best have been left to be settled by the students among themselves and that the Hyderabad authorities might have kept out of this students' affair. But the point we wish to press on the attention of the Nagpur Vice-Chancellor is, whether it is in his power to guarantee the future of these students after they have completed their

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

University studies in the Central Provinces where they are strangers. The interests of the students and not the personal prestige of the Vice-Chancellor, should be the primary consideration in deciding in this matter. The Vice-Chancellor's plea that Bande Mataram is entitled to be sung in all surroundings is not supported by the decision of the Congress that only parts of it can be sung at its functions. The Central Provinces Government has wisely agreed to let Muslims call its Vidya Pith schools by some Urdu name, although the objection to the use of the original term was wholly unreasonable. Universities should take the lead in promoting inter-communal harmony, and the action of Nagpur University and the arguments of the Vice-Chancellor are not calculated to promote this end.

The Congress Split:—The differences between Mr. Subhas Chandra Bose and the Congress Working Committee have culminated in a breach between the Congress President and the Congress Executive. The course of the dispute is important. There was nothing in it which could not have been settled differently had there been mutual respect. What after all is the quarrel? Maulana Abdul Kalam Azad issues a statement withdrawing his candidature and recommending Dr. Pattabhi Sitaramayya. Mr. Bose replies pressing his own claims to the Presidentship. The Working Committee at once jumps in to support the rival candidate, in preference to its present head. Mr. Bose apparently suspecting a conspiracy against himself, questions the attitude of the "right wing," as he calls it, towards Federation. Dr. Pattabhi issues a statement which reveals him to be a man unable to make up his mind whether to stand or not for the Presidentship. Mr. Bose gets elected. And the "right wing" resigns. If the "right wing" resented the allegations of Mr. Bose about their opposition to Federation they should have resigned without waiting for the result of the Presidential election. To resign now seems rather late in the day. Mr. Bose, not to put too fine a point to it, got the impression that the old Working Committee was manoeuvring to throw him out. This is not the first time a responsible Congressman has suspected the "right wing" leaders of leading themselves to intrigue. Dr. Khare proved that he was not able to rely on them in fighting the disloyalty of his ministerial colleagues. Pandit Jawaharlal has not resigned along with the other members but he has addressed a long letter to the President explaining his point of view. Mr. Bose who is possessed of the context may be able to see more in it than is apparent to the public. But the Pandit's letter strikes us more as an explanation of his own peculiar difficulties than as an elucidation of the position. The Pandit remarks that he has not been able to understand Mr. Bose's politics. Pandit Jawaharlal makes a special point of international politics. There is meaning in this. The Statesman recently charged Mr. Bose with being a Fascist and the Congress President promptly denied it. But the accusation has stuck. To Pandit Jawaharlal this is the sin against the Holy Ghost, and somebody has played it up skilfully. The Pandit, however, seems to have realised that there was little to choose between the two parties. His separate letter and his statement in it that he has often felt himself a "square peg in a round hole" prove this. In the present state of the Congress the "democrats" can only be square pegs in a round hole, if they can be in the Congress at all. Only those who are not particular as to the weapons they use in the struggle for power, can hope to capture this great organisation. Mr. Bose unfortunately is ill at present and it will be a great strain for him to meet the crisis created by the collective resignations. He has the sympathy of the country in the difficult times that lie before him.

Jewish Refugees in India:—In reply to a question in the Indian Legislative Assembly a few days ago, Sir R. M. Maxwell, the Home Member, stated that arrangements had recently been made to admit Jewish refugees from the dictator countries, provided they obtained a guarantee from the Council of German Jewry in England or from the branch at Bombay which the Council of Jewry proposed to establish to maintain them for five years, and if unemployed at the end of that period to repatriate them to the United Kingdom. He added that persons in employment at the end of the period were to be regarded as standing on their own feet. In pursuance of this arrangement about 20 Jews out of a total of 500 who were passengers by the Italian boat, the Conte Rosso, were landed this week on their giving guarantees either through relations or the Jewish Relief Committee in respect of their maintenance while in this country. Mr. K. F. Nariman has denounced in the Bombay Chronicle the action of the Government of India in requiring guarantees from the refugees, as a departure from the ancient Indian tradition which welcomed Jews, Christians and Parsis who sought asylum with generous hospitality. Mr. Nariman, we are afraid, does not realise the consequences of allowing present-day refugees unrestricted freedom of entry into the country. The conditions of the ancient world were very different from what they are today. The refugees who came to India from motives of conscience, were a very different type to the refugees who are expelled from their country for political reasons. We have much sympathy for them. But sympathy is not everything. To allow refugees to swarm into the country will do good neither to them nor to the people of India. The refugees are Europeans and Europeans cannot thrive in the Indian climate. They will rapidly deteriorate and in a generation or two will become a serious social and economic problem. The more competent and eligible of the refugees have found asylum in Great Britain, France and the United States. It is the remnant whom these countries will not admit, that are driven to go to Shanghai on the chance of finding occupation there. The Government of India's arrangement is by no means satisfactory. We are almost sure that it will be evaded. The only reasonable arrangement would be to admit only such refugees as can be easily assimilated by the Bene-Israel and other Indian Jews who, having lived all along in an atmosphere of tolerance, have not acquired or inherited the mentality of the ghetto. In aggravation of the plight of the Jews from dictator countries, the Palestine policy of Great Britain is advertising the Jew as an exploiter of oriental races and nations who have not discarded all values but those that make for worldly prosperity.

Linguistic Acrobatics:—We publish in another column a letter from Mr. Z. A. Bokhari, the eager and enthusiastic Director of the Bombay Broadcasting Studio, announcing a series which he has contrived on "What is Hindustani?" There is to be six talks by six men, three Muslims and three Hindus in order to maintain the communal balance. Evidently Christians and Parsis, not to speak of Anglo-Indians, are not considered competent to have a voice in deciding this national question. Mr. Bokhari, we hope, is not thinking of following up this series with others on "What is Marathi?" "What is Gujarathi?" "What is Bengali?" Hindustani is unique in that even after the six Bokhari experts have enlightened the expectant world as to what it precisely is, there would still be the same state of uncertainty about this elusive and imaginary lingua franca that is to be in preference to other languages whose presence and personality need no broadcasting. It is stated that, among the terms for Hindu-Muslim understanding which have been agreed upon between Mahatma Gandhi and His Highness the Aga Khan, is one for the compilation of a grammar for the Hindustani language. The cry today, however, is for "basic" or rudimentry languages the great attraction of which is that they have no grammar to worry over. Basic English has been invented consisting of about 800 words and a 'basic' Hindustani, it is understood, is being got ready. The rudimentary needs of man which the 'basic' language is intended to convey, do not need as many as eight hundred words. The mass of mankind can express all their animal needs without articulate speech. A grunt and a groan, the first to denote satisfaction, the second to indicate discomfort, are all that is necessary. The Times of India, we note, has taken up basic English with enthusiasm. If it is not merely business enthusiasm, we shall look forward at no distant date to enjoying its editorials written in basic English.

A Governor's Day:—Sir Roger Lumley raised a corner of the veil which shrouds the mysteries of a Governor's life in an autonomous province, in an unconventional talk at the Bombay Rotary Club on Monday. His Excellency divided a Governor's work under two main heads; political and social. The latter he subdivided into three, namely, touring, the encouragement of social service and entertainment. The work which fell upon a Governor and his wife, said Sir Roger, left very few moments which were dull or unoccupied. Unless the Governor and his wife are exceptional people with an insatiable and unlimited capacity for enjoyment, they must feel terribly bored at some of the functions at which they have to play the leading role. Many years ago a Governor of Bombay who knew nothing and cared less for Indian music, was persuaded to distribute prizes to the students of a music school. When he came into the hall he had a gloomy, preoccupied face, but when he stood up, after a long and tedious programme of vocal and instrumental music during which he heroically suppressed several yawns, he spoke as if he had no greater enjoyment in life than to listen to Indian music. Every body understood that it was an act of courtesy and no one took him at his word and proposed that His Excellency should forthwith 'Indianise' his official Band. Talking of the Band, and entertainment functions generally, whatever might have been their necessity in the old days when hotels and theatres were few and primitive, there is none whatever nowadays. Not only that but they deprive Mr. Latthe of a substantial sum in the shape of entertainment tax, which may go some way to fill the large hole made by Prohibition in his bottomless purse! His Excellency's account of his political work leaves a disturbing thought in the mind of the reader. The safeguards provided in the Government of India Act certainly created the belief that the Governor's intervention can be relied upon by interests adversely affected by Ministers' measures. Sir Roger Lumley said, and experience during the past eighteen months has shown, that the use of the reserve powers is governed by considerations not exclusively related to equity. The restoration of confiscated lands by reconfiscating them by a special law, is an instance in point. Since it is desired that the responsibility should be understood entirely to be with Ministers and that the Governor should be exculpated from all responsibility, it would be fair to all concerned to repeal the clauses conferring the reserve powers which create expectations, and lead to disappointment at their non-fulfilment.

University Inspection Committees:—In the article on the Bombay University which we published last week, Prof. P. A. Wadia refers to the practice of the Vice-Chancellor playing an active part in Inspection Committees. We understand from reliable authority that the Vice-Chancellor has only figured on an Inspection Committee in the case of the Law Colleges when the question of revising the Law courses was under consideration.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER
BOMBAY, February 25, 1939.

PANDIT NEHRU ON INDIAN STATES.

It is a great advantage to all concerned to have at the head of the States' People's movement a man of transparent sincerity like Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru. In dealing with him one knows exactly where one is. He is a sworn enemy of British Imperialism. At all times and on all occasions he openly proclaims his unswerving antagonism to it. He does not call himself its opponent today and its ally tomorrow. Of all Congress leaders of the first rank, he is the one man who, so far as we know, has seldom or never had occasion to explain that what he said had some other meaning than what it had been generally understood to mean according to the sense commonly attached to words. Another advantage is that he is not a hedgerow politician. He has a political philosophy and does not despise books. One, therefore, feels in approaching a pronouncement by him that one may safely dispense with tentative and conditional expedients.

The presidential address which the Pandit delivered at the All Indian States Peoples Conference held at Ludhiana on the 15th February, was evidently intended to be authoritative as an exposition of the policy of the Indian National Congress on the problem of Indian States. The latest phase of that policy is illustrated by the satyagraha raids encouraged, promoted and controlled from Congress headquarters. This the Pandit definitely endorsed and justified. From his point of view, he can not do otherwise. He regards the States much as Lord Dalhousie regarded them. Dalhousie was actuated by the passion to paint the whole of India 'red' because he thought that alone would bring peace and prosperity to the people of this country. Philip Cox in his "Rani of Jhansi," a very sympathetic presentation of an important episode in Anglo-Indian history, marred by a single lapse due to ignorance of Indian sentiment, pictures Dalhousie talking down Colonel Low who, with other seasoned Anglo-Indians, stood out against his annexation policy:

> Colonel Low! I admire your sentiments, but I can not congratulate you upon your reading of the times. Do you not see, Sir, that our very presence in this country is bringing new forces into its life, regardless of our intentions? That, no matter what our aims may be, we are creating new standards and satisfying agelong needs? The Moghul power failed because it could not respond to the demands that were made on it. The rulers lacked the ability to adapt themselves to the challenging and changing requirements of the new age. We can only succeed, Colonel Low, if we pay less heed to the past and think more of the future. These petty little States of which you are so fond, Colonel Low, what are they but centres of selfishness and misrule, blocking the path of progress and hindering the work of those who see a future vision of this land of vast opportunities? The times cry out for co-ordination, education, system, efficiency, good communications; and unless we can supply these elements of progressive administration to this country, our rule will be as brief as that of the Moghul. The good of the people, Gentlemen! That is my criterion, and by that I shall stand or fall.

Readers of Dalhousie's papers will see that Cox has admirably represented the point of view of that great Governor-General. Convinced as he was that Indian States could be only hindrances to healthy progress, Dalhousie did not, nevertheless, propose to extinguish them outright. His policy was the gradual elimination of the States created by the East India Company when their rulers died without issue. The right of adoption would be recognised in the case of the older States, absolutely in the case of those which were independent of Moghul and Mahratta suzerainty before the establishment of British rule, and conditionally on good behaviour in the case of those which came under the British Crown as the successor of those powers. Fifty years later, Lord Curzon in his speech at a State banquet in Gwalior, earnestly admonished the Princes to make the good of their people their supreme end, that by that test would he judge them and that by it they as an institution would perish or prosper.

Dalhousie and Curzon were arch-priests of British Imperialism but passages in their despatches and speeches, bear a close affinity to the sentiments expressed by Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru, its arch enemy, in his Ludhiana address. The Pandit defined his plan for the States thus:—

> There is no independence in the States and there is going to be none, for it is hardly possible geographically and it is entirely opposed to the conception of a united free India. It is conceivable and desirable in the case of the larger States for them to have a great deal of autonomy within the framework of an Indian Federation. But they will have to remain integral parts of India and the major matters of common concern must be controlled by a democratic Federal centre. Internally they will have responsible government.

Without reading much between the lines of this rough sketch of the Pandit's plan, one can see three main points emerging from it. The States can have no independence. The "larger" States may be allowed to exist as integral parts of a democratic federation exercising powers devolved on them from above. The smaller States, by implication, must cease to exist. The tolerated States must have 'responsible government.' On the first point, the Pandit maintains that the States have no real independence now and what is called "independence" in their case is a fiction invented by the British Government for its own imperialist ends. This is Imperialism with a vengeance and, if Dalhousie and Curzon were present in spirit at Ludhiana, they would have clapped their hands in sheer delight at this Indian, a product of English Public School and University like themselves, preaching their gospel with a thoroughness which they themselves had not dared even to imagine. Though the Pandit implied that the smaller States will have inevitably to go, he extolled and held up the example of Aundh, decidedly one of them, for introducing 'responsible government.' Apparently, even small States can survive if they introduce 'responsible government.' In other words, the distinction between the greater and the smaller States, is not to be absolute. All can save themselves by donning the 'silk belt of responsible government.'

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

What is this "responsible government"? Every government is responsi ble ultimately to the society which sustains it. Even a martial law regime in the last resort must have the support of a modicum of public opinion, as Dicey points out. But the phrase has come to be used in a special sense in which it is associated inseparably with the Parliamentary system on the British model. This system, it may be observed in passing, is as unsuitable to a small State like Aundh as a steam plough to turn up the earth in a half acre backyard. A Panchayat, not a Parliament, is what it needs. The Parliamentary system can not function in a State, small or large, deriving its powers by devolution from a superior authority. This is so elementary in constitutional theory and practice, that we are surprised that Pandit Jawaharlal should have overlooked it in his plan.

The Parliamentary system or responsible government is not an infallible means of assuring good or even tolerable government. The Balkan States had "responsible government" and some of them have it even now. But they had none of the attributes of "responsible government." There was no such thing known to them as civil liberty. The Pandit frequently claimed the authority of history for his propositions. But he overlooked one important chapter of contemporary history, which shows that the Parliamentary system and responsible government cannot be mechanically introduced into every country like the radio or the gramophone. The Turkish Dictator, Kemal Ataturk, tried to introduce it in his Turkey with all the authority of a man who had saved his country from going under foreign domination. He had secured it Independence : he wanted to give it responsible government. The attempt collapsed in melodramatic circumstances.

"This system (prevalent in Indian States) has vanished," said the Pandit, "from the rest of the world." May we remind him that "responsible government" has fared no better. If survival is the test, "responsible government" has no more value than the system which the Pandit condemns, of the States. Would the Pandit prefer the systems which have succeeded "responsible government" in European countries today to that which prevails in the average Indian State ? The fact is, the world has yet to evolve a system of government which will be free from the humbug and hypocrisy of the Parliamentary system, as well as from the tyranny of a soulless autocracy. Meanwhile, it is not wise to thrust "responsible government" which, as it functions today in Great Britain, France and the United States, is, as the Pandit well knows, the complete negation of responsibility, upon the Indian States as a condition of their being allowed to exist.

The Pandit wants to get rid of British Imperialism and the States at one stroke. Historical precedents on which he rightly lays store, suggest that one of the larger States will take the stage on the disappearance of British Imperialism. The Pandit is totally mistaken in thinking that British Imperialism has kept the States alive. The fact is that they have survived because they have roots in the national life which British rule had not ; and if either has to go, it will be British Imperialism and not the home-made autocracy. We have drawn a parallel between Dalhousie and the Pandit. Dalhousie's policy led to the Indian Mutiny. Is the Pandit sure that his drastic proposals for the States, if given effect to, will lead to no upheaval ? It certainly will. He is playing with fire, trying, without intending it, to bring on a conflagration. A foretaste of what may happen is already visible in the disturbances caused by the satyagraha operations in Jaipur and Limbdi. The woes of the Spanish people which have wrung the heart of the Pandit, will pale into insignificance compared with what India will have to pass through if the Pandit desires comes to pass.

PROHIBITION FOR BOMBAY.

In his Budget speech in the Bombay Legislative Assembly on Tuesday the 14th February, Mr. A. B. Latthe, the Finance Minister, outlined the Prohibition policy contemplated by the Bombay Government. He concluded :

> I cannot lose sight of the fact that we shall still have to unload ourselves of the remaining Excise Revenue of almost a crore and a half in 1940-41.....there is little left to fall back upon for completing the Prohibition programme and expanding our other national services. We cannot, simply cannot, leave the task at this stage and must find the needed money to carry the programme to its natural consummation. And let me say this on behalf of the Ministers. It is our object to complete this work next year.

There are few Budgets which have arrested the attention that Mr. Latthe's has done, and certainly none in India. The press in Bombay has not been able to give the Prohibition scheme the dispassionate consideration it deserves, because it is directly affected by the ban on liquor advertising and to some extent by the new taxation. The press outside the province even has shown restrained enthusiasm for the Budget, because of its possible repercussions on other provinces, and not on Congress provinces alone. Every Finance Minister is casting about for new sources of revenue and Mr. Latthe's departure from gradualism may infect governments in other provinces. But as a topic of discussion the Latthe Budget has won supreme place in the city. And whether one likes it or not, there is no denying the courage and imagination which Bombay's Finance Minister has brought to his task. In the debates in the Bombay Assembly, it is significant that no Indian speaker expressed himself against the ideal of Prohibition. Even the representatives of the drink trade who took it upon themselves to demonstrate outside the Assembly Chamber against the policy, seem to have pleaded for no more than a greater opportunity for adjustment with a longer transition period. The Times of India to which all talk of Prohibition was anathema in the past, has been converted by Mr. Latthe's extremism to support Mr. Rajagopalachari's systematic Prohibition policy. This is no mean achievement. The Bombay Government deserve the thanks of all social workers for bringing prominently before the public eye a question which was too often dismissed as a fad. The debates in the Assembly have shown the reactions of various speakers to the policy set out in the Budget speech. Their attitude towards the Budget has been a reflection of their feeling for Prohibition. For though all were agreed that drink was evil, not all were prepared to accept that Prohibition should be carried out at so great a cost. Dr. Ambedkar in his speech gave expression to a certain wistfulness that all the liquor revenue was being abandoned when money was needed so pressingly in other departments. It is not easy to follow Dr. Ambedkar's logic when he says that drink is an evil but its eradication is not an urgent need, especially so when one recalls that the Committee on the Depressed Classes appointed in 1930 by the Bombay Government of which he was a member, categorically stated that there was no hope for these classes, even economically, unless total Prohibition was introduced. The speeches in the Assembly, however, were so many lamentations on the high taxation proposed and not reasoned contributions to questions of economy or policy. Mr. Jamnadas Mehta was probably the only constructive speaker and his survey of the possible consequences of the new taxation on municipal life and civic amenities deserve close consideration.

In the Prohibition policy announced by the Finance Minister, Mr. A. B. Latthe, there are some features which might well have been avoided. In the first place, it was unfortunate that Mr. Latthe should have linked the policy with the proposals he put forward for new taxation. It is not improbable that the Bombay Government had hoped that the national sentiment for Prohibition would be strong enough to carry the taxation schemes as well. As a matter of fact, the reverse has happened. The opposition to the new taxes has prevented a clear discussion on the Prohibition policy itself. Sir A. M. K. Dehlavi, the leader of the Opposition in the Assembly and the head of the Muslim League Party, actually declared his rejection of total Prohibition as an impractical ideal. It was a regrettable feature of Sir A. M. K. Dehlavi's speech that he should have represented the liquor traffic as an unconquerable evil. His reference to the inability of Islam to fight the evil was in peculiarly bad taste and would have been resented if any non-Muslim had suggested it. Mrs. Faiz Tyabjee who spoke later on the subject, had a juster appreciation of the strong anti-liquor influence of her religion. She did well in dissociating herself and the Muslim League as well from the conditional Prohibition of the Opposition Leader. In the criticism which Government spokesmen launched on the Dehlavi attitude, Muslim League men were able to redeem their position by referring to Mrs. Tyabjee's emphatic stand for Prohibition.

Secondly, it is regrettable that the Bombay Government in the method in which it seeks to bring in Prohibition, should have deprived itself of a great amount of valuable support. In the matter of exemption to Europeans, the Government shows little appreciation of that body of enlightened European opinion including the Christian Missions and the Churches, which supports the reform. We realise that, in allowing the system of permits to the community, the Bombay Government was making a concession to the fact that European society has not a teetotal tradition behind it as Indian society has. Yet in the very act of introducing Prohibition, the Ministry is breaking with administrative tradition and it should have availed itself of every support it could call upon. In the individual option which is allowed to Europeans in Bombay there will be some, perhaps many, who will have the courage to stand out but their position will be made needlessly invidious by this exemption. The European representative, Mr. Bramble, made a not unsympathetic speech in the House, concluding with the assurance his community would sooner or later "obey" the law if Prohibition is enforced. The only interpretation we can give to this is that the community as a whole will throw its weight against the seeking of licenses. The meaning otherwise would be that Mr. Bramble merely offered on behalf of his community not to take up illicit distillation or smuggling, and the words "sooner or later" are inane. Dr. Gilder, the Minister for Health and Excise in his speech appealed to the European community to come into line with Indian sentiment sooner rather than later. He asked them for their cooperation and he rectified to some extent the mistake of the exemption.

The other matter in which the Bombay policy works against the grain, is in seeking to introduce the reform first in the cities where public opinion on drink is obscured by a variety of interests rather than in the villages and rural areas where the force of social opinion is strongly on the side of the Prohibitionists. We are not concerned here with the new taxation. Anyone who has the slightest acquaintance with the ambitious programme of the Congress in regard to village reconstruction, must realise by now that, if Mr. Latthe had not taxed Bombay for Prohibition, he would have taxed it for something else. For the many items of the programme all need money and, if Prohibition is the first item on the reform scheme, it is not the only one. It is well to remember this. We have heard that one reason for applying Prohibition first in Bombay City was that urban residents would not readily agree to taxation when the benefits from it would go mainly to the villages. The fallacy behind this argument is the assumption that vested interests in Bombay would agree to taxation if the City itself was to gain from it. There has been enough to show the weakness of this premise in the budget discussions.

Those of us who have the cause of Prohibition at heart, can not object to the Bombay policy on the ground that the price to be paid for it is too high. The method now proposed is that of fighting the evil at its worst and strongest. If once, it is argued, liquor is beaten back from Bombay, the problem ceases to exist for the province. It is true that with other Prohibition workers we would have preferred a more systematic approach to Prohibition. But after a succession of Governments all committed to a policy of "Prohibition in twenty years" with the goal receding into a more distant future, we are not going to quarrel with a Government whose enthusiasm suggests a courageous handling of the problem. Besides this is not the time for doubt and hesitation. The die is cast. Mr. Latthe made it perfectly clear that, while he is ready to consider other methods of raising the necessary revenue which might be more equitable than his own proposals, the Ministers were not ready to go back on the Government's Prohibition policy. The Ministry is determined to show in putting the plan into effect a steadfastness equal to the inspired courage of their programme. By their very attempt the Kher Ministry have deserved the support of all sections of the province. If they succeed they will have won an abiding name in the history of the Province and of the country. They cannot and must not fail.

BOMBAY AND MADRAS.

In commending his taxation proposals to the Assembly, Mr. A. B. Latthe, the Bombay Finance Minister, stated that the province had reached, if it had not crossed, the utmost limits of taxation. To obtain finances for the next and final Prohibition measure next year Mr. Latthe proposed:

> To approach the Central Government with a request to give us the full share of Income Tax now, instead of at the end of ten years, which may be expected to bring in about a crore, and to ask the authorities concerned to agree to a reduction in salaries of all the services including those under the control of the Secretary of State. With the full support of all sides of the House, I feel confident that we shall succeed in this object of fulfilling the first great part of our pledges to our Province.

There is nothing in this statement which savours of an ultimatum. Yet the Evening News presented this in its front page summary as a threat to quit office if the Central Government did not concede the demand. It even gave a time limit, April 1939, which reduced the entire Budget to a farce. Many people looked on Mr. Latthe's carefully drawn up schemes as a mere excuse for precipitating a crisis. The Times of India in effecting a retreat from this misrepresention, retained the original sentence but added a modifying class which made nonsense of the paragraph. The two sentences read :—

> The boldest stroke of all is disclosed in a passage in the Minister's speech in which it is stated that unless the Government of India advance the provisions of the Niemeyer Award by eight years and agree to pay the Government of Bombay annually the sum of one crore of rupees as from April 1, 19 9, they will quit office. This is not said in so many words but the implication is there and inquiries in authoritative quarters have confirmed this.

We do not know what inquiries the Times of India made and what the authoritative quarters were, but it is not unfair to infer from its subsequent silence on the subject that it has found out its error. The Bombay Government have no intention of quitting office without being asked to do so by the Congress Party or by the province. "We cannot, simply cannot," said Mr. Latthe, "leave the task at this stage." If words mean anything, this should surely imply that the Bombay Ministry propose to stick to their guns till Prohibition is put through. In confirmation of this interpretation we have the Madras Premier's Budget speech. Mr. Rajagopalachariar's point of view is not different from Mr. Latthe's in this matter. He said :

> It is practicable in India to stop the consumption of intoxicating drinks and narcotic drugs by abolishing the State trade in it and enacting laws for total Prohibition. It is practicable in India satisfactorily to enforce Prohibition. There is no difficulty except of finance. The proper solution of this financial problem on which Prohibition hangs is finally the reduction of Central expenditure and the transfer of more revenue to the Provinces. This is true, but it is not right to proceed from it to the logical corollary that Prohibition must recede from the picture and the constructive plane of provincial administration to the status of a mere slogan and focus for the development of a political crisis against the Centre. We cannot be content with this translation from the region of tangible though partial realization to the region of mere political battle, until we reach the time and circumstances favourable for a victory over such a political crisis. Such an attitude does not at any rate content me. Hence we must tax ourselves. The time will arrive when the weight of these burdens that we take up on behalf of the poorest will furnish the justification and the strength for re-adjustment between Centre and Provinces. Any other policy would amount to evasion which we charged previous governments with.

We regret that even after the Budget speech of the Madras Premier, the Times of India has not thought it necessary to admit its mistake. Instead it carries an editorial commending the Madras Premier's policy to the Bombay Government, ignoring the different conditions that prevail in the two provinces. Mr. Rajagopalachari had the speech of the Bombay Finance Minister in his hands before he introduced his own Budget. Both of them belong to the same political party. Apparent divergences of policy resolve themselves when one bears in mind the importance which Bombay has in relation to the rest of our province. In Madras the influence of the districts is strong. It cannot be said of that province that eradicating liquor from Madras city would mean winning more than half the battle. One must not lose sight of the fact either that Madras does not lend itself to the same taxation as Bombay does. An urban immovable property tax, for instance, would bring in little revenue and cause much annoyance. The Premier realised this when he said:

> It may seem to be but snail-pace advance to go only as far as one district this coming year. My only explanation is the need to preserve financial stability and for the necessary time that is required to build up alternative taxation. To go forward irrespective altogether of financial considerations, however attractive it may be in enunciation, would be to impair the credit of the Government and cause a setback to the movement of Prohibition itself. We have to secure the financial adjustments necessary and we have to consolidate the position at every stage. We have to combine the crusader's spirit with the wisdom of sound management of large responsibilities, unless indeed we would make Prohibition only an excuse for a crisis and an escape from responsibility.

It is fatuous to assume that the Bombay Congress Government is preparing to do just what the Madras Congress Premier denounces as improper. We welcome the different tactics adopted by Congress Governments in different parts of India as a realisation of the vastness of the problem. It is a devolution of authority which augurs well for the future of provincial autonomy.

THE HUSSEIN-McMAHON LETTERS.

A Reuter's message reported on the 15th February that His Majesty's Government were publishing the letters which passed between King Hussein of the Hedjaz and Colonel McMahon as the result of which the Arab ruler threw off his allegiance to Turkey and joined the British in making war on that country in 1915. (A Reuter's message published on Thursday says that the issue of the White Paper containing the Hussein McMahon letters has been delayed at the request of the Arab delegation which wants to verify the correctness of the translations. A later message added that the British Government had all along maintained that Palestine had been excluded from the territories promised to the Arabs as the price for their alliance. The British Government have not published the correspondence but the substance of it has been published on the Arabic side, and British and American writers on the subject have consistently maintained that Hussein for his part had all along believed that Palestine was included in the territories promised to him. The Palestine Royal Commission reproduced McMahon's letter of the 24th October 1915 in their Report but refrained, as not falling within their province, from expressing an opinion as to whether the portions of Syria which were specified in it as being excluded on the ground that they could not be said to be purely Arab, comprised or did not comprise Palestine. The map attached to the Report, however, clearly shows that Palestine is not west of Damascus but south, the Vilayets adjoining it on the East being Hauran and Maan. Writing on the Palestine Report in the American Foreign Affairs for October 1937, St. John B. Philby who had been in charge of the British Political Mission to Central Arabia in 1917-18 and British Representative in Transjordiana in 1911-1924, and whose book "The Heart of Arabia" is a classic, observed:

> British recognition of the independence of the Arabs in all the Arab territories except Aden was the first and principal stipulation of Sheriff Hussein in his first formal letter of July 14, 1915. Sir Henry McMahon accepted this condition with certain modifications in his famous letter of October 24. Sheriff Hussein knew that the British had promised more than the Turks ever would or could. No one doubted that that promise would be fulfilled in the event of ultimate victory.

The very next year Britain, France and Russia signed the Sykes-Picot agreement behind the back of the Sheriff dividing the Turkish Empire among themselves. The publication of this shameful document by the Soviet Government in 1977, was a bitter shock to the Sheriff, which was aggravated by the issue at about the same time of the Balfour Declaration promising to make in Palestine a National Home for Jews. Stephen King-Hall in his "Our Own Times", writing of the position at the Peace Conference, observes: "The Arabs, who, under the leadership of the Emir Feisal, assisted by Colonel Lawrence, had rendered valuable assistance to the British army in Palestine, had reason to anticipate British support in a claim to found an Arab Empire with its capital at Damascus." And it is well-known that Lawrence himself thought that the Arabs had been deceived and refused on that account any recognition of his services from the British Government.

The authorities cited above are all British. Professor Hocking of Harvard University studied the question on the spot and has dealt with it at length in his "The Spirit of World Politics." An interesting document printed as an appendix to this admirable volume is the letter which Emir Feisal wrote to Professor Felix Frankfurter, recently appointed a judge of the Supreme Federal Court of the United States by President Roosevelt. That letter has been some times cited as showing that the Emir approved of the Balfour Declaration. It was repudiated by the Emir but Professor Hocking thinks that it was framed by Lawrence and that the Emir put his signature to it without understanding its contents. He adds: "The chief point in interpreting the letter in the circumstance is that when Feisal signed its Arabic equivalent (for at the time he understood English imperfectly if at all) he had every expectation of ruling in Damascus with Palestine as a part of the Syrian state." Regarding the McMahon correspondence, Dr. Hocking gives in a footnote the contents of Hussein's version of them published by him and his son Feisal.

> Hussein himself published in Al Qubla (Mecca) what purported to be a definitive agreement, July 29, 1918. Feisal shortly before had published substantially the same document in Al Mufid (Damascus). These Arabic versions give the following boundaries of the independent Arab Kingdom-to-be: 'In the East, from the Persian Gulf: in the West, the Red Sea, the Egyptian Frontier, and the Mediteranean Sea; in the North, the Northern limit of the Vilayets of Aleppo and Mosul to the Euphrates and the Tigris; whereupon the boundary follows the length of the Tigris to its mouth in the Persian Gulf,—excepting the colony of Aden.' Within these boundaries, according to these versions, Great Britain pledged herself to help in establishing an Arab State which should be independent in 'every sense of the word'.

Professor Hocking thinks that Sir Henry McMahon's letter of October 24, 1915 was not the last which passed between the two high contractors.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

He suspects that there are other letters but he finds otherwise most tangible evidence of the substance both of Arab will and British consent. Here it is:

On October 3, 1918, Feisal was permitted by Gen. Allenby to enter Damascus with shout and flourish and hoist his flag on Government buildings. Also to issue on October 7, a proclamation to the Syrian people announcing an independent Government for the whole of Syria. In pursuance of Hussein's declared purpose, Feisal further hoisted the Arab flag by proxy in Beirut (October 7); and Gen. Allenby in pursuance of England's equally declared obligation to France, required him to take it down (October 10); and after protest, he did so. (October 12). Thereby lending sufficient emphasis to the fact that the Damascus flag was not ordered down! Nor those at Homs, Hama and Alepps.

The weight of opinion as well as evidence, independent of the Hussain-MacMahon correspondence, is thus on the side of the Arabs. If subsequent events have made it necessary for Great Britain to go back upon her word, it is best to avow it and be done with it.

THE THEATRE IN SOVIET RUSSIA.

(By Shakuntala Paranjpye)

Mr. Norris Houghton in his "Moscow Rehearsals" gives an account of the methods of production and inner workings of theatres in Moscow as they existed in 1935. It would be unwise, however, to draw any inferences from it as to what they might be today because things in Soviet Russia move so rapidly, that the author himself when he revisited Moscow only two years later, discovered that some of its theatres had changed out of recognition, some of its leading directors and authorities on dramatic art had been quietly deprived of their power.

There are about forty theatres in Moscow. The respective sets of people working at these theatres do so, not only for a season as in Europe and America, but for years on end, toiling and striving for the good and prosperity of its theatre. As a result every theatre develops a tradition of its own with its members really devoted to its work as to that of an institution. Eight of these theatres have a technicum each, controlled and managed by its particular theatre, where potential members receive an education and training in keeping with the traditions peculiar to the institution. Thus from the very start the students imbibe a culture and technique which is exclusive to that particular theatre. This training is begun at a very young age when the body and mind of the pupil are easier to mould. Great emphasis is laid on physical training in Russia and the actors have to undergo a strenuous course of gymnastics and even of acrobatics. There are other theatrical schools in the country organized and administered under the direct supervision of the People's Commissariat of Education. They number 64, their collective strength being 26,000. Each school has a course of studies extending over four years. A list of the subjects taught at these schools will give one some idea of how earnestly and seriously the Russians treat the dramatic art. The subjects are:—History, History of the Communist Party, Political Economy, Economic Politics, Dialectic Materialism, Russian Language, Russian Literature (19th Century), Literature, Military Affairs, Psychology, History of Ancient Theatre, History of Modern Theatre, History of Art, History of Literature, Gymnastics, Rhythmics, Dancing, Physical Culture, Acrobatics, Fencing, Diction, Mastery of Speech, Music Appreciation, Make-up, Play-writing, Directing, State-craft. The eschewing of any foreign languages in the curriculum is worthy of note.

No wonder Tovarisch Furminova, the Director of the Technicum of the Central Theatre Combinate, remarked to the author, that 'the demand for actors and theatre-workers exceeds the supply.' Few, indeed, would care to go through such hard training to be followed up by a still harder life at the theatre. Tremendous pains are taken over the production of a play. Rehearsals are very thorough and sometimes a play is rehearsed for over a year before it is performed in public. Perfection is what every theatre aims at and no play is acted in public before that is reached. There are instances of a play being completely abandoned after many rehearsals because the performance could not attain the standard that the director wanted it to do. Several dress rehearsals take place before the actual performance of the play, thus enabling the actors to acquire the requisite ease and naturalness of manner. Every theatre has a repertoire of its own, and it has a change of programme every evening—a system which prevents the artists from getting into a rut wherein they are bound to fall by the constant repetition of the same play night after night. This naturally means extra work for the artists as well as for the technicians. These latter have daily to pack and unpack different settings for a different play every evening. And settings in Russia are far from being simple! This explains why, for instance, the Moscow Art Theatre has as many as 260 members on its technical staff alone.

In Soviet Russia theatres are not run on commercial lines and as a consequence the stage not having to keep an eye on the box-office, can lift the people up to its own levels of culture rather than sink down to theirs as is the case in other countries. 'The Russian more than anyone else, is infected with the passion for spectacles,' writes Stanislavski, 'the more the spectacle excites and captivates the soul, the more it attracts him. The simple Russian spectator loves a drama at which he can weep a little, philosophize about life, listen to words of wisdom, more than any noisy vandeville act after which nothing is left to feed the soul.' With this characterization of the Russian by one of its greatest authorities on drama, one can well imagine how richly Russian drama must have been fed by the revolution, and how Soviet Russia must have made use of the theatre to carry on its propaganda. Although theatres in Russia have existed for over a hundred years, the revolution has no doubt innovated them. Every factory has its dramatic club and, if a member of it shows special aptitude for the art, he is sent to be trained at a theatrical technicum, the factory bearing the expenses. The taste and the appreciation for dramatic art is universal. Even children have special theatres conducted wholly for their benefit. Valuable research in child psychology is carried on through this medium. During the intervals children are encouraged to ask any questions that crop up in their minds, and the members of the theatrical staff hold personal conversations with their juvenile audience. Special note is taken of the manner in which the children react towards the play, and further writing of plays for children is based on the conclusions drawn from such reactions. And this can be said to be one of the numerous ways in which 'Education through Art' is imparted in Russia.

The adult audience at every theatre is truly representative of the proletariat and not restricted to an exclusive class as it used to be before 1917. As compared to England or America, Russians visit a theatre much more frequently, take an emotional, artistic and intellectual interest in the plays, in fact it seems almost as though the theatre were to the Russian people what sport is to England and America.' The Soviet theatre has no snobbery about it and people walk into the theatre straight from the factory, without bothering to 'dress' or look smart. Late-comers have to wait for the following interval before they are allowed to enter. The modern Russian plays depict real life. They have a utilitarian message to carry and they are so captivating as to make one forget one's own troubles. The auther gives us a very vivid account of a play "The Iron Flood" staged at the Realistic Theatre, as an instance:

> "There was no curtain, no proscenium, no stage at all.....That evening we spent four hours with the Red Army in the field; that was all.....The action was all around you. The wounded dragged themselves across your feet, the people were cheering each other or beside you. The relieving troops you could hear coming behind you and sweeping over you; above your head the night sky hung."

There being no copyrights in Russia the same play can be staged by more than one theatre. And it is there that one can best study the difference in style and production of various theatres. For there are a good many schools of dramatic art in Moscow. Stanislavski was an apostle of the naturalistic school. He was the director of the Moscow Art Theatre which has existed some forty years. An actor of this theatre is expected to put himself in the place of the character he is representing and have the same absolute faith in the imaginary episodes he is acting as a child has in the existence of her doll. This is a theatre of inner feeling and is essentially a theatre of actors. No actor is dictated to. He himself has to work and train his mind to fall into the 'circle.' And it is only when every actor has come to believe that he is actually living the part he is acting, that the regisseur starts to work at the ensemble and give the play such treatment as is necessary to make it a smooth, harmonious and connected whole.

Directly opposed to this style of production is that of Meierhold. With him actors are not consulted any more than they are in the talkies. Every detail of sound and action is dictated to them by their regisseur, Meierhold, and they have no say in the matter. His word is law. He believes in symbolism and constructivism. In the Meierhold theatre the stage is set up in the middle of the theatre and actors emerge direct from their dressing rooms into the view of the spectators. There are no architectural barriers between spectators and actors. Meierhold studies his productions with a view to the collective effect. "His characters also are symbols. They are depersonalized representatives of type.....They are empty masked automatons." The author gives us an instance. Meierhold believes "that the emotion of abandonment and joy with which a man is filled can much more accurately be revealed if he slides down a ten-foot S curve to meet his lady than if he follows the dictates of natural movement." Kamerny Theatre is another autocratic theatre. It was founded by Tairov. This theatre is meant to be theatrical. Its plays are heroic rather of the type of the Greek Theatre. This theatre has also abandoned naturalism for the sake of formalistic style. It went in for futurism and cubism. Huntly Carter has neatly characterized the three directors: "Stanislavski told the actor he must forget that he is on the stage. Tairov told him he must remember nothing else. Meierhold told him he must remember he is one of the audience."

Vakhtangov was a director who united the Stanislavski and Meierhold school in his productions. He believed that the actor must both give the image of the character and then make his own comment upon it. For instance he believed that Julius Ceasar should be given an expression of the collective's own civilisation and its own thought. He did not sever his activities from the Moscow Art Theatre and directed its Third Studio, which after his death did part connection with the mother institution and was named after Vakhatangov. Many other schools of dramatic Art are described by the author and they mostly fall in between the two opposing schools of Stanislavski and Meierhold.

As regards designing, Soviet Russia is rather backward. None of the theatrical technicums give any training in designing. The designer of the Soviet theatre is no more than a painter. The art of lighting also has little to recommend itself to the Westerner. Very little colour is used and little effort is made to eliminate shadows. At present there is no training school for theatre technicians is Moscow. This seems strange when one considers what elaborate courses it runs for its actors.

The play-writer in Russia has not yet attained a very high standard. He has "no idea of unity and concentration.....He works too diffusely, using a dozen scenes and two dozen characters when his story would be much more forceful if told in a third as many scenes and by a fourth as many characters.....Plots, also, are at the same time both too complicated and too simple. They are too complicated because as often as not the writer is trying to tell two or three stories at once..... the plots are too simple because in the great majority of cases one can foretell the outcome of a play by the end of its first act.....In characterization the Soviet dramatist also falls down. His chief trouble is that he tries to paint his people only in black and white..." As a consequence of the lack of good plays, the Moscow Theatres produce a good many foreign classics. The Russian productions are grand but the part played in them by the writer is insignificant. A theatre when it undertakes to produce a play does more or less what it likes with it and seldom consults the writer.

The artists of Moscow are not jesters to the public, they are its leaders, its teachers, its servants. They are Russia's respected citizens, its great men, and if an aristocracy exists in the classless society of the Soviet Union then the artists are a part of it.

REGISTERED GRADUATES' CONSTITUENCY

The Editor,
The Indian Social Reformer,

Sir,

There are various constituencies such as the College Teachers Constituency, the Principals, the Head Masters, which are entitled to send their representatives to the Senate of the Bombay University. There is also the Registered Graduates' Constituency provided by the Act. The object certainly is that there should be proper representation on the Senate from amongst the Registered Graduates who are engaged in independant trades and vocations and who are not connected with any Educational Institution. But unfortunately in the election from this constituency, the Principals and Professors of the Colleges always offer themselves for election, inspite of the fact that they have got their own constitutiencies. In this way the very object in creating this special constitutiency is defeated. Surely this is objectionable. The registered graduates should, therefore, make it a point to elect their own representatives on the Senate.

THE BOMBAY UNIVERSITY—III.

(By Prof. P. A. Wadia.)

Any one who has followed the history of the Bombay University during the last ten years and more, will have become increasingly aware of the friction and conflict between the various statutory bodies of the University. The Act was the outcome of a desire to divide the different functions of the University between bodies competent to deal with them, whilst at the same time it sought to correlate and co-ordinate the work of these various bodies with a view to securing harmony and singleness of purpose. Where we have a body of like-minded men interested in the cause of higher education even the most clumsily worded body of laws can be used as an instrument for the expression and realisation of educational ideals. Even the most carefully drafted Act may give rise to conflicts of jurisdiction and powers where the will to co-operate falls short of reasonable expectation.

We shall take first conflicts that appear from time to time between the Senate as a whole and the Syndicate which is a permanent executive body carrying out from day to day the policy laid down by the Senate and the details in the shape of regulations laid down by the Academic Council. The executive powers of the Syndicate are usually expressed through the frame-work of ordinances which are subject to the approval of the Senate. Very often it happens that the Syndicate in the exercise of its powers frames ordinances which involve questions of policy, and on these questions of policy the Senate may not be of the same mind as the Syndicate. Thus, for example, the Syndicate has the power of framing ordinances determining the scale of fees for University examinations. The Senate with its democratic composition is usually inclined to scale down the fees, having in mind the burden on a poverty-stricken populace like that of India. The Syndicate has a temptation to scale the fees in an upward direction with a view to balancing its revenue and expenditure.

This is a source of constant conflict between the Senate and the Syndicate; and this conflict becomes very prominent at the time of budget discussions when motions for a cut are proposed and debated for hours together giving opportunities for the ventilation of all kinds of extraneous grievances on the part of members of the Senate.

Sometimes the Syndicate succeeds in cleverly playing its own game. The question, for instance, of conveying an address of congratulations to a new King-Emperor, may be removed from the field of seemly discussion on the floor of the Senate, by the device of including the expenditure under contingencies in the budget figures. The most fruitful source of conflict between the Senate and the Syndicate is in practice. The Senate always prides itself on being the supreme authority of the University on questions of finance. As such, it very often seeks by way of amendments at the time of the budget meeting to introduce such radical alterations in the budget figures that it becomes difficult for the Syndicate to accept them. Even when this is not done, motions are moved, by way of censure, are proposed and carried by a majority who combine together for the one purpose of expressing their lack of confidence in the Syndicate, though on the merits of the cut and the principles involved in the cut the members who vote with it may hold different and even opposite views.

The same lack of confidence on the part of the Senate in their own executive is manifested in questions like affiliation of new colleges. The Syndicate, in determining the terms of affiliation, is led by considerations of efficiency to impose rigid conditions more especially in matters of financial stability. This, of course, may not happen if the new aspirant for affiliation has powerful backing from members of the Syndicate or Academic Council. But when it does happen, there is a conflict between the Syndicate which seeks support for its action in terms of efficiency and the Senate which, with its democratic constitution and its contacts with the people, is inclined to give every possible opportunity to the new aspirants for affiliation to found institutions for the spread of higher education and for the dissemination of culture

Conflicts, such as we have noticed, are not to be regarded as very unusual or abnormal in the history of the relations between governing bodies like the Senate and the executive bodies like the Syndicate. But those who have followed the proceedings of the Senate as actual spectators, must reluctantly confess that there is an element of unnecessary bitterness and dissatisfaction on the part of the Senate in relation to its own executive. When we use the word, 'unnecessary,' we mean not that this bitterness has no foundation but that it is not desirable.

Let us analyse the causes that are at work in producing this lack of confidence and this sense of bitterness. One reason may be found in the fact that, in the case of a substantial number of propositions brought in the name of the Syndicate before the Senate, when trenchant criticism of the proposals is offered at a Senate meeting, it is difficult to find a single member of the Syndicate prepared to reply effectively to the criticisms and to defend the action of the Syndicate. A body like the Senate expects proper guidance and explanation from a representative of the Syndicate when a controversy thus arises. Silence on the part of the representatives of the Syndicate on such occasions is construed or misconstrued as wobbling or something worse. It might be that, when no official defence of the Syndicate resolution is forthcoming before the Senate, the reason may lie deeper. The resolution brought before the Senate in such cases may be the expression of a single will or the will of a small minority rather than that of all the members of the Syndicate. It might also be that reluctance to speak on the part of some members of the Syndicate is due to lack of knowledge or incompetence. Another reason for this constant conflict and lack of confidence may be found in the fact that the Syndicate is elected by two different bodies, five being elected by the Senate and seven by the Academic Council. Moreover, the electoral machinery based upon proportional representation with the transferable vote and upon a system of voting by post, lends itself easily to abuse and the influence of cliques bent upon the preservation of vested interests and sanctified by blessings from on high.

An analysis of the composition of the Syndicate in the past few years might reveal weaknesses which can account for the silence of some of them in defence of their own resolutions. But it is not necessary nor fair to confine one's attention to the composition of the Syndicate in accounting for lack of co-operation between the two bodies. One has to remember the composition of the Senate as well. It is a mixture of various elements—a body of 150 members, made up roughly of a 100 elected members, 40 nominated by the Government and 10 ex-officio. The elected members include not only educational interests like the colleges, the schools and the graduates, but representatives of the Municipality and of local boards and of chambers of commerce. It is difficult for such a heterogeneous body to have a single mind and purpose in questions of educational policy. Personalities prevail where singleness of purpose is lacking. One has also to remember that, where there are questions of sharing material benefits which are limited in amount, conflicts of interest may easily arise. All these conflicts find partial expression on the floor of the Senate in the shape of drastic comments and expressions of dissatisfaction with their own executive.

Under the present Act it may not be possible even to reduce the occasion of conflict between these two bodies. Honest difference is a thing to be welcomed. Without such differences and the freedom of ventilating such differences, the University would not be a living and growing educational institution. All that one can hope for is, that, in the work of dissemination of culture and the promotion of research, personal likes and dislikes, the formation of cliques bent on the division of spoils or influenced by a parochial spirit, should be entirely absent. Where men come together in the name of culture and research, and higher education, there could be and ought to be no regional barriers, much less barriers raised by a material profit or gain. It may be human to erect such barriers, but it is human to get over them in a sphere of work like education. No one can claim that the Bombay University is a perfect institution either in its framework or in the spirit in which its affairs are being conducted. Much depends on the human factor. But the flesh is weak, and our liberty may be used as an occasion to the flesh. Wise leadership has been lacking in the past. The spirit of commercialism has entered into its working. One can only hope and pray that these traditions of commercialism and intrigue that have in recent days been sedulously injected into a corporation that stands for whatsoever is beautiful and good and noble, may be replaced by a healthier tradition of co-operation and good will in the search for human values which transcend the distinctions of race and colour and nationality.

"WHAT IS HINDUSTANI?"

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

A series of six talks entitled "What is Hindustani"? has been arranged by All India Radio. These talks will be given by some of the most prominent people of India, and will be radiated simultaneously from Peshawar, Lahore, Delhi, Lucknow, Calcutta and Bombay.

These talks are designed to help listeners to arrive at some sort of clear notion of the kind of language that is implied when we speak of "Hindustani" as "a lingua franca for India." A great deal has been said on the subject during the course of the last year from various angles. This has roused a considerable amount of interest in the matter, but at the some time created a certain amount of confusion in the mind of the average man. Apart from the general interest that All India Radio has in movements that aim at a greater unity amongst the various sections of the people in this country, any attempt toward creating and popularising a common language, is of special significance to broadcasting which employs the spoken word more than any other agency in this country, and whose constant aim is to make itself intelligible to the largest possible number of people.

We do not under-rate the difficulties of the problem, and in fact we consider that All India Radio has been made more conscious of them than was necessary by the constant and at times conflicting criticisms which our spoken word items in general and Hindustani news bulletins broadcast, in particular, have elicited. Nevertheless, the problem is of such great importance to India that, however great the difficulties, the efforts that are being made to arrive at a common language, should not be relaxed.

In this series of six talks entitled "What is Hindustani?" arranged by All India Radio which will be radiated by all the Stations on 20th., 21st., 22nd., 23rd., 24th., and 25th. February, 1939 at 7-45 p.m., Dr. Tara Chand, Maulvi Abdul Haq, Babu Rajendra Prasad, Dr. Zakir Husain, Acharya Narendra Deva and M. Asaf Ali, will give their views on this important problem.

All those who have at heart this vital question of common language for India will not miss the opportunity of listening to the view of these prominent persons.

Yours etc.,

Z. A. BOKHARI,

Bombay, Station Director.

THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS FLAG.

For years the League of Nations has found itself without a symbol, says No-frontier News. Various improvisations were resorted to—for example in Letitia and the Saar. But whenever the question of a League flag was mooted in Geneva it always came up against the fears of sovereign states—chiefly the Great Powers—that a superstate was being foisted upon them. Now, with the League neglected, it is to have a flag, at least for the purposes of the New York World's Fair. The matter has not been decided in the Council, to be sure, and if questions should be asked there one day, doubtless it will be said that the flag is only a provisional symbol invented to meet a special situation. Yet the situation is that the League's pentagon based building now in process of construction at the Fair just had to have a flag to fly as all the other buildings will. A League flag was also imperative at the Court of Honour where all the flags of the participating nations will float together on the appointed day. The flag is very simple. It bears a pentagon, with a five-pointed star within, upon a white ground. The pentagon and star are symbolic of the five continents of the world, as is the form of the League's pavilion at the Fair.

NOTES.

Death of the Pope :—Pope Pious XI breathed his last in the small hours of the morning on Friday February 10. Cardinal Achille Ratti was Archbishop of Milan when he was elevated to the Papacy. Milan was also the scene of the pre-Fascist days of Signor Mussolini who was present in the crowd outside St. Peter's to which His Holiness gave his first blesssing on his accession. Eight months later the Fascist revolution placed Signor Mussolini at the head of the Italian State. In 1929 was signed the Concordat which made a State of Vatican City. There have arisen complaints on both sides of violations of the terms of the Concordat but on the whole they were fewer and less serious than those about the observance of the terms of the Concordat with Nazi Germany signed in July 1933. Pope Pius the Eleventh during the seventeen years of his reign has had to deal with many and varied problems concerning his Church both in its internal organisation as well as in its relations with other countries. One great achievement which will remain a memorial of his Papacy, is his policy of admitting non-European ecclesiastics to Bishoprics in their own country. The example set by him was followed by the Anglican Church and by the American Methodists. India has special cause to remember Pope Pius XI as during his regime and undoubt on his inspiration, the Catholic Church in India had openly identified itself with the national sentiment in respect of Swaraj and Prohibition. The Papacy itself has for centuries been filled by Italians. The probability of an American Cardinal being elected as his successor has evoked protests in the Italian Press. We daresay that the election of a Pope is not free from diplomatic and other wirepulling. But we think that there is much less of it than in an American or French presidential election. In all three cases, in theory the highest office in the State is open to the poorest lad in the land. But in the United States the office has all along remained a preserve of a ruling caste consisting of Anglo-Saxon or Dutch families as the Papacy has been the monopoly of Italians. No Roman Catholic, Jew or Negro has a chance of being elected President of the United States. Though there is no legal bar as in Great Britain the convention is not less strict. Pope Pius was not only a great Churchman but also a great diplomatist. His attitude on the Italian invasion of Abyssinia was not uninfluenced by the prospect of establishing the Catholic faith among the Copts of that country. His greatest troubles have been with Herr Hitler and it is probable that his frequent controversies with the Fuehrer brought on the heart disease to which he succumbed after several years of patient endurance. Pope Pius was held in high respect by Protestants as also among non-Christian peoples on account of his high personal character and liberal outlook. The Papacy has been greatly enhanced in prestige by tenure of Pope Pius XI.

Christianity and World Problems :—The Rev. Walter Foley of Manilla writes on another page on "The Voice of Tambaram." Tambaram is the suburb of Madras where the World Missionary Conference met in Christmas week. Dr. Foley does not, as some other commentators have done, gloss over the difficulties which confronted the Conference owing to the presence in it of representatives from nations with new political and social ideals. Especially noteworthy are his observations on the difficulties of the German delegates; Chinese and Japanese Christians did not view world problems from the same angle. Dr. Foley does not make any reference to Indian delegates, no doubt because they made no contribution worth mentioning to the deliberations of the Conference. To the onlooker, the difficulties of the Conference appear to be difficulties always attendent on efforts to put new wine into old bottles. Nearly fifty years ago, Principal Wordsworth of Elphinstone College, Bombay, a grandson of the Poet, wrote that the evolution of Europe had escaped the control of Christianity. The fact was not recognised until the War made it impossible to ignore it. In the Tambaram Conference too, there was considerable circumlocution employed to hide the plain truth that Europe is no longer Christian—more than half of it not even in name. The problems of the modern world can not be solved exclusively by recipes derived from the New Testament. Some of them have had solutions offered for them centuries ago in India and China. We are sometimes surprised by European writers floundering in their search for light on social problems, which they would have spared themselves had they turned to the East for guidance. A rather glaring case is that of Dr. Pryns Hopkins in his book "Psychology of Social Movements" noticed in two recent issues of the Reformer. The World Missionary Conference was not the success which it might have been, because it shut itself against the light of Indian thought which was streaming on it on all sides.

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The "Economist" on India:—We print this week an article on India from the Economist. The Economist surveys the field of Indian politics without bias and, if the article is an indication of the trend of British opinion, the Congress Party, it will be seen, has a great measure of support in Britain. On two points, however, it is out of sympathy with Indian aspirations. The reference to Prohibition "eating into the liquor excise revenue," lacks appreciation of the national sentiment which lies behind Congress policy. No one in Britain, for instance, would seriously advocate the cessation of rearmament on the ground that it "eats" into the national income. The feeling that rearmament is necessary and must be carried out, has overcome all thoughts of economy. Men of all political parties support the "Defence" measures undertaken by the Government. If Indians are prepared to pay the price for Prohibition we do not see how it concerns any one else. Prohibition in India is regarded as the first measure, the foundation stone in fact, of economic and social reform. The other issue which the Economist eyes with distrust is that of support to Indian industries, "industrial protection which eats into the yield of Customs." This is the Ainscough argument again. In bureaucratic India, economic progress had lagged behind progress in other fields. If the national life of the country has to be a full one, obviously we cannot expect perpetually to balance our Budgets with Customs revenue. It is economic extravagance to suggest as the Economist does, that one of the main reasons for the demand for Indianisation of the Army is the difficulty of finding money for financing Prohibition and industrial enterprises. Even if Britain took over the entire bill for military expenditure, the demand for "a people's army" would still be insistent. The trend of recent international events have shown that no country can rely on the arms of another. In presenting the financial problem as a choice between maintaining military expenditure at the present level and of putting into effect policies of Prohibition and of support to Indian industries, the Economist sidetracks the issue. Sir Thomas Ainscough was nearer the truth when he remarked on the difficulty of India meeting her commitments abroad if her Customs revenue falls. But Sir Thomas believed that faced with the choice, Indian economists would or ought to subordinate the development of Indian industries to the demands of foreign creditors. This is expecting from India a "higher" standard of international finance than Britain herself has set up. The problem is identical. Faced with the difficulty of paying her War debts, meeting rearmament expenses and maintaining her social services, Britain under Mr. Chamberlain's guidance chose to repudiate her debts abroad. If Indian Finance Ministers have to decide between military expenditure, social and economic relief measures and her foreign commitments, there is no reason to think that they will prove more quixotic than Mr. Chamberlain proved to be. The over-emphasis on economics in Britain is probably a reflection of the over-emphasis placed by many Congress spokesmen on the economic aspects of Indianisation of the Army. Recent Assembly debates have, however, revealed a gradual change in Indian politicans which has passed unnoticed in Britain.

The Bombay Budget:—On Tuesday the Finance Minister, Mr. A. B. Latthe, introduced the Budget for the coming year in the Bombay Legislative Assembly. Mr. Latthe's speech was a clear and lucid exposition of the proposals. The public have learnt to expect a judicious mixture of idealism and reality in Mr. Latthe's public utterances and they were not disappointed on this occasion. The main proposals of the Finance Minister relate to the enforcement of further measures of Prohibition. The introduction of total Prohibition in Bombay city and in the suburbs is the outstanding feature of Government's proposed Prohibition policy. The loss of revenue which is expected to be Rs. 155 lakhs, is to be met by new taxation. The Bombay Government are to be congratulated on the fact that they have not allowed the bogey of loss of liquor revenue to hold back their Prohibition programme. We have in the past expressed the view that in regard to Prohibition the Minister in charge had too often been overwhelmed by the opinions of his departmental staff. That reproach is no longer tenable. The first two years of office apparently were utilised by the Government to survey the field before launching on action. Yet we have grave misgivings as to whether the present step, which is without doubt a bold one, is the best way of tackling the problem. In other fields mistakes might be necessary to progress and, therefore, a certain measure of experimentation is obviously desirable. But in Prohibition one wrong step might ruin the cause. The drive for Prohibition should be from the rural areas to the urban, from the interior out towards the sea-ports. That is the natural line of action. The Government proposals work the other way. It will need a tremendous effort to enforce the scheme. Then again, granted that Bombay city and suburbs are the best territory to introduce Prohibition in, we do not know how advisable it to allow exemption certificates even if only to Europeans." In Bombay unlike Ahmedabad where the experiment is reported to have been encouraging, there is a large unofficial European population which will feel little compunction in applying for permits. Besides from this community the supply will spread to Indians. In the more fluid conditions of Bombay social life, such exemptions are dangerous. There is no argument in support of these permits and we would not be surprised if a good number of Europeans themselves resented this discrimination as an undeserved reproach on their community.

New Taxation :—To meet the Prohibition bill, Mr. Latthe has several proposals for taxing the people. The main proposals fall into three groups: The sales tax, the tax on competitions and the immoveable urban property tax. There was some talk last year of bringing in a tax on agricultural incomes with a view to levelling distinctions between the urban and the rural residents. Mr. Latthe in his speech, however, regarded the new tax on immoveable property in the cities as bringing urban property taxation to the rural level and told the House that he would place before the Assembly at the Poona session, Government's conclusions relating to agricultural incomes. Mr. Latthe was most hesitant in commending his tax on immoveable urban property and he concluded this part of his speech with an appeal for a necessary sacrifice which he hoped would be accepted cheerfully until at least "the Congress was in a position to replace it in some other way." One way he indicated was that of appealing to the Government of India for a greater share in the income tax receipts. That Bombay should receive the full share of income tax now instead of at the end of ten years is Mr. Latthe's plea and he suggests that the Government of India can accede to his request by reducing salaries all round. Here he will have public support. But Mr. Latthe made it clear that any amount he might receive from this source, would be earmarked for pushing Prohibition still farther. The property tax has two disadvantages. It encroaches on the rights of Municipalities which will lose an important source of revenue after the margin between the municipal tax and the taxable capacity of house-holders has been appropriated by the Government. And again it falls heavily on the class of house-owners in the suburbs, for example, who in depression years invested their money in small buildings which they either occupied themselves or let to others. We strongly urge that a graded property tax would be more effective and less burdensome on the taxpayer than aflat 10 percent. The sales tax on petrol was expected but there are other commodities on which it will not be as easy to collect a sales tax, and Mr. Latthe later contemplates extending the principle farther. Why can we see why hand-spun, hand woven cloth should be exempted from the sales tax on textile fabrics and so on, which Mr. Latthe proposes to enforce during the year. Hand-spun is more expensive than mill-cloth, therefore a luxury article. Even if the Gandhian principle is strictly adhered to, there should be no objection to taxing Khadi sales since the true follower is not supposed to buy his Khadi at a shop but to spin it with his own hands.

Hyderabad Students' Response :—We regret the tone and purport of the statement issued by the so-called Council of Action of the Hyderabad students awaiting admission to Nagpur University in response to what we advisedly called the generous gesture of the Minister of Education in the Nizam's Government towards them. But we do not blame the students for it. They have but repeated the practice of many of their elders nowadays, of mistaking insolence for independence. Nawab Mahdi Yar Jung's declaration was clear, explicit and unequivocal. There was no attempt at hedging. As we understood it, it meant that the whole episode is considered closed and that the students, if and when they came back, will be received without demur. The Nawab expressed on behalf of His Exalted Highness' Government their deep concern for the future of the students who are and will always be subjects and citizens of their State. The Council of Action says that the orders of the Government are not withdrawn. That is not its concern. The responsible Minister has given publicly the assurance that the past is regarded as closed and that there is no bar to the students coming back. He has imposed no conditions. If what the students want is that the Government should go down on their knees to them and beg them to condescend to return to their alma mater, they will not have it and they should not have it. After the statement of their spokesman, Mr. Dutt, which we quoted last week, that, if their Muslim fellow students had told them that singing of Bande Mataram was objectionable to them, they would have readily ceased to sing it, there is no question of principle involved in continuing the controversy. The past, as the Hon. Education Minister has declared, is wiped out. As regards the future, the students may shape the course of their conduct in consultation with their Muslim fellows. We do not see what purpose is served by their holding out longer. The glamour of their enterprise will soon fade away, if it has not already done so. They will realise when they seek a field of activity that they are after all refugees in Nagpur, depending on charity, whereas in Hyderabad they will be citizens in their own right. The springs of political generosity dry up very quickly. Scores, perhaps, hundreds of volunteers who gaily walked into prison during the Civil Disobedience movememt, were thrown on the streets and their bitter complaints of betrayal brought them no relief. Mr. Dutt in his statement averred that the students wish the preservation of the integrity and culture of their State. They can best help to preserve both by returning to the State and working for its progress.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER
BOMBAY, February 18, 1939.

WELLS ON IMITATION NATIONALISM.

Mr. H. G. Wells during a brief halt in Bombay on his way to Australia commited the mistake of identifying Gandhian non-violence with the effortless strength of vegetable resistance. In Australia he described Hitler as a certifiable lunatic and Mussolini as a renegade socialist, and drew down on himself a severe rebuke from the Prime Minister of the Commonwealth for embarrassing it in its relations with Powers with which it was and wished to be on terms of friendship. On his way back home he halted a few days as a State guest at the ancient Rajput State of Jaipur. He must have seen and heard something more than he knew when he was last in Bombay of the methods and motives of non-violent civil disobedience. That only confirmed him in his previous opinion of that policy. He described Indian nationalism, as expounded by Pandit Jawaharlal and Gandhiji, as a cheap imitation of European nationalism and the two leaders themselves as imitators of the West. That Mr. Wells should have discerned this fact hidden behind the trappings of Indianism in dress, manners, and other externals, speaks much for his intellectual acumen. Pandit Jawaharlal will not be perturbed by being called an imitator of the West, though he may resent the adjective "cheap" being used to qualify his imitation. He is a product of the West in all but birth and he makes no secret of his spiritual home from which he draws most inspiration. But Gandhiji has not only disclaimed but openly revolted against Westernism in every shape and form; and to describe him as an imitator of the West, seems on the face of it an abuse of language. Nevertheless, there is truth in Mr. Wells' estimate, which is more evident to the man who is a western himself than to those who have only an academic knowledge of Westernism. Gandhiji's dislike of Westernism was originally inspired by Tolstoi, Ruskin and Thoreau who had violently reacted against their own social and economic surroundings. The natural reaction of the Indian to Westernism is a tolerant indifference. It is all right, he feels, for westerners though it differs and in some respects is even repugnant to one's Indian notions. We may accept what suits us and reject what does not in Westernism: we are not called upon to pronounce judgment on it and to denounce it as wholly evil as we are not called upon to extol it as wholly good. There is imitation in avoiding imitation. The Indian when he wears clothes cut in the European style does not feel that he has become a European. W. C. Bonnerjee, one of the founders of the Congress, who was completely Europeanised and remained so to the end of his life, warned the late Professor Sundararaman not to judge of his sentiments towards Hindu conservatism by his dress and manners. Most people do not attach the same rather morlid importance to dress as an expression of their nationalism as Gandhiji and his following. In fact, they do not feel the need to counteract by their externals an inward urge to denationalisation which they do not feel.

The truth in Mr. Wells' charge of cheap imitation comes most clearly in Gandhiji's politics. Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru, of course, makes no secret of it and there is, therefore, no need to mention him further in this discussion. Mr. Subhas Bose's election to the Presidentship and the hullabaloo that has been raised about it, has thrown the superficially imitative character of Gandhiji's politics in high relief. Here was an election according to the rules laid down for such elections. No irregularity has been alleged. The defeated candidate accepted his defeat with good grace and offered his congratulations and good wishes to his successful rival. There the affair should have ended. But it did not. Gandhiji who persists in remaining outside the Congress—not even a four anna member—comes out with a statement declaring that not Dr. Pattabhi Sitaramayya but he (Gandhiji himself) was the defeated party and suggesting that those who shared his views should cut loose from the Congress, virtually making the election of Mr. Subhas Bose to the Presidentship a nullity or his position as President untenable. Gandhiji declared that he was opposed to Mr. Subhas Bose's election from the first, and Mr. Mahadev Desai has revealed from Delhi that Gandhiji sent a message to Mr. Bose advising him to stand aside and let Dr. Pattabhi Sitaramayya be unanimously elected. It has also come out that this is the normal way followed in choosing the President of the Congress and that the formalities of nomination and election are so much camouflage. This kind of wire-pulling, normal in Western democracy, is an imitation and a cheap imitation in India. That leads us to observe that democratic institutions as they have developed in Western countries, require devices which would be regarded as dishonest in private life, to enable them to function. Men with intellectual and moral scruples, therefore, do not seek a political career. In the middle of the last century when the British Parliamentary system was at the zenith of its power, Tennyson described politics in a vigorous couplet:

> Lies upon this side, lies upon that side, truthless violence mourned by the wise,
> Thousands of voices drowning its own in a popular torrent of lies upon lies.

Ruskin thought much in the same way and so did Carlyle. Should India borrow this kind of politics from the West? That brings us to an important point. Western political institutions are the outgrowth, and part and parcel, of the machine civilization which Gandhiji has often denounced. They are designed to mechanise life just as the machine has done to industry. To denounce machine civilisation and to insist in the same breath on imposing its concomitant of mechanised politics on Rajkot and Jaipur, is nothing but cheap imitation. Surely these States require to be overhauled. Will the Parliamentary system rid them of their abuses? Would it bring more freedom to the people or will it merely substitute in place of a hereditary ruler, a political boss?

New Friends for Franco :—Many straws last week-end showed which way the Spanish war was going. The British cruiser, the "Devonshire," played an important part in putting through negotiations for the peaceful surrender of Minorca. The German press commented bitterly on what it considered to be Anglo-French overtures to General Franco, calculated to deprive the Italians and Germans of their Spanish reward. It was a natural reaction to a third party's attempts to reap the harvest of German sowing. General-Franco himself was not averse to using the British and French to check his tried allies. On the Spanish-French frontier care was taken to keep the Italian forces from coming into conflict with French troops. Mr. De Valera who had kept official Eire with unwanted caution out of the Spanish dispute, has recognised Franco's Government. In the House of Commons Mr. Chamberlain, by asserting that the Government must take the responsibility, refused to give any assurance that Parliament would be consulted before General Franco's regime was recognised. An earlier Reuter message announced that the only bar to such recognition was the fear that General Franco would initiate peace in "a welter of horror and reprisals." If this is true, the Madrid Government has little hope of survival. General Franco might safely give the assurance—for what it is worth. If the British Government was reluctant to intervene in the interest of Republican Spain when it was the effective Government, still less will it be ready to act when the Spanish Republicans are a minority in the State. In a more painful manner, Spain has passed through the experience of Czechoslovakia. But there is a difference. Geographical conditions make Czechoslovakia dependant on Germany. In Spain, as Senor Madariaga has pointed out in his brilliant book in the Modern World series, Britain has always held the key position. That predominance has been shaken by the Nazi-Fascist policy in the present conflict but it is beginning to assert itself again. The most prominent symptom of this is the report published last week that General Franco supports the restoration of the monarchy rather than the establishment of a Fascist regime. It is not improbable that the historian will be able to trace a link between Mr. Chamberlain's announcement last week of Anglo-French solidarity and French policy towards Franco now. In spite of repeated declarations that British policy will conform to French, it is more than likely that France will be guided by the advice of the Chamberlain Government. General Franco is apparently enough of a patriot and a politician to seize the opportunity afforded him now to slip out of any commitments he may have with Germany and Italy. The emergence of diplomatic manouevres indicates that the Spanish war is nearing its end.

Press Securities :—A Bombay Government communique announces that under the Emergency Powers Act of 1931, four newspapers have been called upon to furnish securities for "publishing and printing matter tending to promote feelings of enmity and hatred between the Hindu and Mahomedan communities." Two of the papers are published in Sholapur, the Ansar and the Angad. One, the Trikal, is published in Poona and the fourth, the Rozgar, in Ahmedabad. The Prime Minister's warning on which we commented last week was evidently meant to prepare the public for the announcement of this application of the Emergency Powers Act passed eight years ago and all along since denounced as a revival of Star Chamber methods in the twentieth century. The communique does not give any idea of the contents of the writings for which these papers are penalised, not even whether those writings were published after the Prime Minister's warning of the 5th February or before it. In a similar case the Madras Government prosecuted the Viduthalai under the provisions of the ordinary law. The Bombay Government owes an explanation to the public for its preference of the emergency law. We trust it will not be the hackneyed one of the publicity attending prosecutions. If the use of such emergency powers by a bureaucratic Government was tyrannical, it is not less so when used by a popular Government. When a popular government borrows from the armoury of its bureaucratic predecessors, it becomes itself a bureaucracy. The personalities of the members of Government, the proofs which they have given of their self-sacrifice and patriotism by some of them having courted imprisonment by breaking the law (also an emergency law!) are irrelevant in assessing the character of their measures on well-established political principles. The demand of securities under the emergency law instead of prosecuting the papers under the ordinary law, is an invasion of the freedom of the press by a Government professing to value civil liberty.

Bewildering :—Gandhiji referred on a recent occasion to the existence of a tacit understanding or pact between Congress and the Government. In his article in the Harijan of February 4 on the Rajkot episode, he declared that "it is insufferable that the Congress, which is today in alliance with the British Government, should be treated as an enemy and an outsider by the States which are the vassels of the British." Pandit Jawaharlal on the other hand is proclaiming all the time that the Congress is fighting British imperialism which the British Government represents, and as whose ally Gandhiji demands submission by Rajkot. The British Government neither confirms nor denies the existence of a tacit pact or open alliance with the Congress. All the same, the avowal of an alliance by Gandhiji, gives colour to Mr. Subhas Bose's suspicion that Federation will not be opposed as strenuously by Gandhiji's nominee as it should and would be by himself.

BOMBAY UNIVERSITY — II.

(By Professor P. A. Wadia)

The Affiliated Colleges.

The Colleges that are affiliated to the University fall into two groups: (1) the older Colleges which enjoy an unconditional and permanent affiliation, as their existence has dated with the beginnings of the University; and (2) the Colleges that have come to be affiliated at a later stage, under conditions attached to the affiliation limiting the subjects to be taught for the degree courses, as also limiting the period of affiliation. It has been a standing grievance of the new Colleges that they are treated in a step-motherly fashion by the University, or that, at any rate, they do not enjoy the privileges which the older Colleges enjoy. Thus, for example, if one of the newly affiliated Colleges is affiliated for teaching only Sanskrit and French Honours, it will have to apply and proceed through all the formalities of a new application, if it desires to prepare students for the Honours Examination, say, in Persian. An Inspection Committee has to be appointed, whose Report has to be presented to the Academic Council and to the Syndicate; and, if these two bodies are satisfied, they have to make their recommendation to the Senate for the grant of such a privilege; finally, after the Senate has agreed to these recommendations, sanction of the Government has to be obtained in order that the Senate resolution can become effective. In the case of the older Colleges on the other hand, a College could teach and send on students for Honours courses in any of the languages and at any time, without making any formal application and without passing through any of the other formalities just referred to, and even without making adequate provision for the teaching of such a language course.

It is obvious that the hold of the University in the case of the old Colleges is not so effective as its hold over the younger Colleges. For example, there is one of the old colleges, affiliated to the University, which like any other College, is inspected by a University Inspection Committee once every three years. In the case of this College, a number of successive Inspection Committees have recommended definite changes in connection with the location of the College Library; these recommendations were forwarded to the authorities concerned time after time; these recommendations and the reminders were disregarded in a cavalier manner by the college in question; and yet the University authorities have remained unconcerned. Now, in the case of a new college, if a default half as serious had been brought to the notice of the University, peremptory demands for compliance with the recommendation of the Inspection Committee would have been addressed to the authorities of that college, and there would have been no rest for those concerned till the recommendation had been given effect to.

The difference in treatment by the University authorities is not only as between the old and the new colleges; it exists also as between one old college and another. We have glaring instances of this before us. Some years ago in the case of one of the older colleges, the Report of an Inspection Committee objected to a practice which prevailed in that college, of permitting some of the professors to do full-time work simultaneously with some teaching and administrative work in schools belonging to their own organization. The objection was raised on the ground that such division of attention on the part of a professor between work in a school and work in a college was undesirable from an academic point of view, and was likely to affect the efficiency of the professor's work. But more. For the last few years, one of the Bombay colleges affiliated to University has adopted the practice of appointing part-time professors on a low salary; and the professors so appointed have their regular appointments as salaried officers in joint-stock companies or share-brokers' firms. So far as we know, no notice seems to have been taken of such a practice either by an Inspection Committee or by any Statutory Body of the University. Either the earlier Inspection Committee which objected to the principle of allowing College professors to do part-time work in schools as detrimental to the efficiency of college teaching, was mistaken in its view, or the University authorities concerned should have taken serious notice this time of a practice which clearly concerns efficient teaching and the retention of an academic atmosphere. Similarly, some years ago, on the recommendation of an Inspection Committee, the Syndicate laid down a rule limiting the number of students to one hundred and fifty in any single class in the interests of efficiency in teaching. This rule was sought to be rigidly enforced in one of the new colleges; but it was patently disregarded in more than one of the older colleges.

This difference in treatment may be due to more than one cause. For instance, there is the established prestige of an old institution which permits it to enjoy privileges which the younger would not be allowed to enjoy. And, the manner in which any affiliated college is treated much depends upon the extent to which the college is represented on the Senate and the Syndicate, as also on the Academic Council.

The same differential treatment is sometimes to be noticed in regard to the affiliation of new colleges, both at the earlier and later stages of affiliation. For example, the application of the Amalner College successfully stood the Reports of the Inspection Committee and even obtained the approval of the Senate for affiliation; but as ill luck would have it, the Government asked for a further report; a new Inspection Committee was appointed; this Committee, as was expected, made an unfavourable report; and in this way, what would have been probably one of the weaker institutions affiliated to the University was thus prevented from coming into existence. But equally weak, if not weaker, institutions have been brought into existence by those who can successfully employ methods of diplomacy and wire-pulling. Institutions which are well represented on the Senate and the Syndicate often succeed in getting weaknesses glossed over which in the case of other institutions call for criticism and even severe reprimand.

The compositions of Inspections Commitees and Local Enquiry Committees may have partly to do with these inequalities in the treatment meted out by the University to the institutions under its control. Sometimes an outstanding educationist from beyond the limits of the Province is appointed to bring a fresh and disinterested outlook to bear upon problems of education in the Presidency. Such men were sometimes appointed on the triennial Inspection Committees. But, as a rule, these Committees include businessmen who happen to be on the Syndicate, or others who at times fail to secure the confidence of the institutions inspected. The Inspection Committees, instead of being respected as bodies of people who would not merely endeavour sympathetically to understand the difficulties but even guide aud advice the authorities of the institutions they visit, are looked upon as inquisitorial bodies of people inclined to find faults and weaknesses; in fact, these Inspection Committees are sometimes composed of men who often subordinate visions and ideals of educational policies to the elaboration of petty details like the violations of mechanical rules that can not possibly work everywhere with the same uniformity. Here, again, it is not so much the machinery as the human material that fails the University. More recently a new feature of a doubtful character has entered into the composition of Inspection Committees; we refer here to the inclusion of the Vice-Chancellor as a member of an Inspection Committee. To our knowledge, in the history of the University, this is the first time when the Executive Head of the University has become a member of an Inspection Committee. This practice is most undesirable; the Principal of an inspected college may have something to say against the behaviour and recommendations of an Inspection Committee; and, he must hope that the Vice-Chancellor, as the Chairman of the Syndicate, will guide the Syndicate properly after hearing what the Principal has to say; but when the Vice-Chancellor himself is a member of the Inspection Committee, there can be no hope for a square deal on an appeal by the principal of a college against the conclusions of such a Committee.

Anyone who has carefully observed the relations between the University and the Affiliated Colleges cannot help feeling that there is an unhealthy suspicion on the part of the Colleges in relation to the executive of the University; so, there is an unhealthy competition on the part of the colleges to get hold of as large a share in the material gifts which it is the privilege of the University to bestow upon the colleges and their constituent members. Unfortunately material gifts cannot grow by being shared; and the limitations of matter react most unfavourably on the spiritual gifts which should link the affiliated colleges into a harmonious corporation in the interest of the search of whatsoever things are true and of good report.

THE VOICE OF TAMBARAM.

(By Walter Brooks Foley).

The story of 470 delegates from 70 countries, with their differences and similarities, will be told in a wide variety of forms and settings. Frankly, I am not greatly interested in many of the details, regarded by some as of great significance.

Facts of vital value are, however, beginning to emerge with clarity. We met as world Christians—and, most of us did. Here and there delegations still seemed impressed with national and racial significances. But the outlines of a world Christian culture were clearly apparent. There were comparatively few assumptions of superiority of one nation as over against another. It seemed most difficult for Japanese and Germans to get away from the limiting concepts of Nationalism stimulated by the high pressure propaganda of governments interested in mutual co-operation with other countries. The Chinese were outstanding as they helped lift the Conference to international levels.

The hindrance of the rationalized crisis position of the German delegates slowed up much of the work of the Conference. There was a continuous effort made by the delegates to inflict their limited and limiting position on the whole conference. They were eschatological and other-wordly. They met for constant consultation on the progress of their concerted campaign. They received the most kindly treatment. Again and again statements of delegates from other countries were tempered to meet German last objections. Yet, finally, on the full day of the Conference the German delegates brought in their own statement of theological position. A sentence or two from the statement will illustrate the difficulty that hundreds of other delegates felt in trying to work out any constructive Christian programme.

Here are the sentences. "... there are distinct orders which God has established and which are eternally valid: the sexes with their perpetual relation of attraction and repulsion, the structure of family and clan, nations with their different forms of government, races with their special gifts. In spite of God's love to all human beings, which does not respect persons—we have to recognize the validity of these orders... .." "Therefore we are not allowed to dissolve these orders of sex and family, nation and race." ".....the church has not to bring into force a social programme for renewed world order or even a Christian state." ".....we live as citizens of two different orders, until Christ himself will appear to transform the whole structure of this world."

Likewise there was constant pressure to avoid the use of terms like "aggression," "persecution" with the general idea of keeping delegates like those from Japan out of difficulty with their government on their return home. Any condemnations were expressed in comparatively mild terms with realistic content rather thoroughly washed out.

From the point of view of radicalism, or even of any advanced social position comparatively little was done. Yet the significant fact was that throughout the sixteen major sections and the ten or twelve special groups the great problems of all humanity faced the delegates constantly above and below the surface. Questions that twenty-five years ago would never have appeared on the Agenda of a Missionary Conference held the centre of the stage.

There was a deep realization of the need for unity of Christians in a world of chaos, disaster, and uncertainty. That really held the Conference together. Nothing else could have. Regardless of differences, which were many, Christians from seventy countries thought and worked and planned and wrote and talked and walked together. Agreements could not possibly be unanimous, but, as the Germans stated, it was recognized "that we are one in Christ our Lord and in the faith in the Church as His body."

We used a common language—English—which greatly facilitated all our work. No interpreters were used (though often it was difficult to understand the many dialects of English which have grown up in the different sections of the world). Christianity was definitely recognized as a world movement with a belief in Christ and his pre-eminent significance in the life of practically all nations. The common base of language and the belief in a great central fact were points of contact that proved of high value as the days and weeks passed.

Attempting to estimate and state the "faith by which the Church lives," evolving practical literature methods, acknowledging weaknesses in Church organization and practice, postulating Christian ideals for international economic development, advocating a Far-Eastern Office of the International Missionary Council to promote research and extensive consultation, all will have place in the Christian programme of the future. But by far the greatest influence of the Conference will come in the next ten years as the nearly five hundred delegates weave the new world Christian pattern into the warp and woof of thousands of local churches, into the thinking of millions of national Christians, into the practice of a new sanity among nations and races.

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The Conference was one of advance, though Chinese and Japanese found it practically impossible to agree on Christian attitudes in a time of war, though missionaries to Muslims found it difficult to unravel the right solution of Arab-Jewish disputes in Palestine, though missionaries in Turkey cannot conduct any of the usual missionary activities with an emphasis on Christian teaching, though German Christians made no vital statement of protest against the treatment of Jews in Germany, though wars continued in China and Spain, though aggression against groups and races and nations was maintained in many lands of Europe and Africa, though political national units insist still upon promoting their own selfish interests regardless of effects on other nations.

The advance came in a realization that all are affected by the rise or fall of anyone. Individualism while advocated, was clearly seen to be no solution. Mutual consideration, understanding, and co-operation were so obviously required that they became a sort of key-stone arch in the proposed World Council of Churches. The kingdom of God was given a wider significance than that of any one Church, nor was the conception confined within the borders of all churches. It was agreed that "God has not left himself without witness as men have been seeking Him all through the ages." Christ is to be presented "so that he will not be foreigner" to any.

The great challenge to Christianity was seen to be not in any ancient forms of other religions, but in new paganisms which can be called substitutes for God. "Communism when based on a materialistic philosophy is an outstanding example; so are the new nationalistic systems when they make nation, state, or race the object of worship." "The Church" was, indeed, "called to the encouragement of co-operative relations between its members and those of other faiths.....in combating the evils which cripple the life of man."

Extremely important in its new inter-national conotation was a penitence for "the greed, racial arrogance, and callousness toward personality that mar the civilization in which the Church is set" and a declaration that the Church "is not to be confused with any one civilization," for "beyond the frontiers of the Church itself multitudes today professing other faiths stand in awe and love before Jesus Christ and.....acknowledge the wonder of His peerless personality."

We live in a non-Christian world—East, West, North, South. The Christian Churches everywhere are now "sending" churches, reaching out to revolutionize in Christian ways the whole of society through individuals acting singly and in groups. The divisions of "older and younger" churches now have much less significance. The task is a common one in which all must share. The wealthier Churches may well assist the poorer Churches. The poorer Churches may well furnish creative ideas for more rapid advance.

The voice of Tambaram is one of dissatisfaction with human performance, but of certainty that God alone may be offered to an otherwise lost world.

No one of us who came away thinking from Tambaram can ever again be Indians, or Chinese, or New Zealanders, or Japanese, or English alone. The world is our problem. We must see it as a whole, so far as we are able. We must be citizens of an international order—citizens indeed of a Christian kingdom on earth and beyond.

Dr. John R. Mott, the President of the International Missionary Council, stood out as a Christian leader par excellence. His agreement to continue to serve for the next three years was most acceptable to all who know his breadth of vision and experience. There is a strong possibility that these years when he will advance in age from 73 to 76 will prove among the most fruitful of his more than half a century of active leadership in Christian organization. If there is any one voice capable of speaking for the World Church it is his. Under his chairmanship the voice of Tambaram gave evidence of amplified, unified and continuous power for the Church in the immediate future.

WOMEN IN HINDU LAW.

(By Sir Sitaram Patkar.)

The legal disabilities of women with reference to marriage, divorce, guardianship and inheritance are manifold. The Hindu Law as administered by the Courts is based mainly on Smriti texts and the commentaries thereon. Hindu Law which was devised to meet the exigencies of society existing many centuries ago is archaic and unsuited to the present environments of society. The commentators on Smriti texts made innovations from time to time according to the changes in the customs of the country by putting a construction on the texts which was consistent with the changed circumstances. But since the British Courts of Justice were established, Hindu Law in many respects became static and incapable of any modification. The British Courts followed the letter of the texts. Most of the Judges who administered Hindu law were ignorant of the Sanskrit language in which the Smriti texts are written. They depended on translations which were sometimes incorrect and erroneous. Another difficulty was caused by interpolations in the original texts themselves. To add to these difficulties many of the commentators expressed their emphatic opinion that the texts which were favourable to the rights of women were Kali-Varja, i. e. inapplicable to the present age. The original texts allowed widow remarriage and inter-caste marriages. The British Courts laid great stress on custom. The Bombay High Court under the inspiring influence of the Chief Justice Sir Michael Westropp put a construction on the texts which was favourable to the rights of women, and therefore in the Bombay Presidency a daughter and sister get an absolute interest in the property inherited by them. The injustice to which women have been subjected cannot be remedied merely by persuasion or appeal to reason. Legislation is the only remedy. It is therefore suggested that legislation may be undertaken by the Central and Provincial Legislatures.

Representative committees should be appointed with an adequate number of women members to examine the whole question and recommend effective legislation. There are several schools of Hindu Law in India and the views of the different schools are divergent. In Bengal, there are two schools the Mitakshara and the Dayabhaga school. In the rest of India Mitakshara is predominant but the interpretations put on the Mitakshara, a commentary on the Yagnavalkya Smriti, in the different schools are divergent. In the Bombay Presidency Mayukha and Mitakshara govern—Mayukha governs in certain parts, Bombay and Gujerat and the Mitakshara governs in other parts. There is divergence of view between Mitakshara and Mayukha on certain points. It is therefore more desirable that the legislation in such matters should be undertaken by the Provincial Legislatures, than by the Central Legislature. There may be legislation in the Central Legislature on points which are of universal application to the whole of India.

It is also necessary that a representative committee consisting of experts and also women should be appointed. The presence of experts is necessary to see that sound and consistant legislation is recommended. There were several bills introduced by members of legislatures who were not experts. These bills were not properly considered and in some cases led to curious results. In the case of Dr. Deshmukh's bill as regards Hindu Women's Property Act, there was a pact between the mover of the bill and the Law Member and the rights of daughters were jettisoned and dropped altogether from the bill. The language of the bill was faulty. The result was that difficulties arose in the interpretation of the Act necessitating subsequent legislation as the previous Act was likely to result in complications not foreseen by the mover of bill. It is likely that experts may commit mistakes but the chances of error are much minimized by the presence of experts on the committee. The presence of experts on the committee is therefore desirable. The presence of women is also necessary because women have long suffered from man-made laws, and in the present stage of the evolution of Hindu society they should have a right of self-determination. If, however, their demands are extravagant and inconsistent with other tenets of Hindu Law, the aid of the experts on the committee would be useful.

Such committees were appointed in many of Indian States like Baroda, Mysore, Travancore and Cochin and legislation was undertaken in the light of the recommendations of such committees.

The legislatures of Indian States generally take the lead from the legislatures of British India in other matters of legislation. Sometimes Acts in British India are in their entirety made applicable to Indian States. It is a matter of regret though that in the matter of social legislation, the legislatures of Indian States have given a lead in matters of marriage, divorce, guardianship and inheritance, the British Legislatures are lagging behind.

Under the present Government of India Act there is considerable scope for social legislation and it is the duty of the Provincial and other Governments to undertake social legislation at an early date, and not relegate it to a distant date on the ground of other pre-occupations.

Education has advanced considerably in India, and there is a general awakening among women since 1920. The Women's Council in Bombay Presidency and other women's organisations have taken an important part in the past in shaping social legislation. The Sarda Act is an instance in point. Mr. Desai's bill of adoption had to be dropped on account of the opposition led by women. The women of this country must be infused with a conquering spirit to overcome difficulties. They must carry on constant agitation on the question of removal of legal disabilities.

Now many women are members of the local and Central legislatures, and some of them are included in the cabinets of the country. The day is not far distant when women will be entrusted with the portfolio of finance. If women are at present occupying positions of trust and responsibility, the text of Manu and other Smriti texts which are based on the assumption of incompetence of women to take care and manage property are absolutely redundant and meaningless in the present environments of society. Reason, justice and merits are on their side, and if they try to put forward their grievances persistently before the Legislatures, I have no doubt they will succeed at no distant date.

RELIGIOUS ENDOWMENTS IN MYSORE.

(FROM A CORRESPONDENT.)

"The question of making suitable provision out of Chattram Savings Fund for the grant of relief to the needy persons throughout the State has been engaging the attention of Government for some time past. Government consider that this is an object on which the savings might be legitimately used." That is an extract from the Government Order regarding the utilisation of the Chattram Savings Fund for the grant of Doles to the Old and Indigent.

In fact, as early as 1926, Government had sanctioned the abolition of certain Annachattrams in the State and directed that the savings from the Chattrams so abolished might among other objects, be utilised towards the maintenance of homes, or for the relief of the aged and the infirm who have none on whom they can depend for maintenance and support. In giving effect to the above object, the funds have so far been utilised for making grants to organised institutions and homes for the aged and the infirm, and no provision has been made for affording relief to the infirm and indigent.

There is, in Mysore City, the Kangalarakki grant of Rs. 5,000 for giving doles of rice and ragi to the poor. The present intention is to cover the whole State. An examination of the income and expenditure of the Fund shows that the normal receipts of the fund are in excess of the normal expenditures and that there is scope for utilising a part of the income of the fund for this purpose. But it is felt that it is difficult and inconvenient to distribute rice and ragi doles to such persons; each of the grantees is to be paid in cash at the rate of Rs. 3 per mensem, the selection of the persons eligible for the grant of such doles being made in each district by a committee consisting of the Deputy Commissioner of the District, the District Treasury Officer and three non-official members. Cash allowances will be paid to 140 persons each year at the rate of 25 each in the districts of Bangalore and Mysore and 15 in each of the other districts.

The various institutions under the Muzrai Department spend about Rs. 8 lakhs a year. In the name of worship of God, most of it is spend on the poor. Not in the Mysore State alone—even outside, the charity of Mysore has spread. At Tirupathi, nearly half a lakh were fed during last year—while over and above that, another ten thousand got prasad. In the rest house belonging to the State, seven marriages, 236 Upanayanams and 3063 Choulams were performed during the year.

Not Brahmins alone—non-Brahmins are also embraced by the Mysore charity; in Mysore, a special rest house for them being under construction. At Subrahmanya in South Kanara, during Santarpana, nearly 15,000 were fed.

"Sacred Ganga Theertha and Prasada from Tirupathi were sent to the Palace both on the occasion of Mahasivratri and His Highness the Maharaja's birthday. Thirtha and Prasada were brought by the Mysore Agents at Srirangam and Jambukeswara and presented to His Highness the Maharaja on the Birthday occasion."

That simple extract from the report of the Muzrai Department gives a glimpse into the golden band of love and worshipfulness that knits the people of Mysore to its Ruler.

A Hindu State, several Mohammadan institutions are being maintained under Government supervision. There is no communalism here. The Press in Upper India hailed as a phenomenon the unique event of the Muslim Dewan of Mysore being called to lay the foundation stone of a Hindu temple. But Mysore takes it as a normal event. The Prince Gulam Mohammad Charity Fund stipendiaries count 51 Christians aud 21 Hindus, in addition to 101 Muslims.

Here are the items from the administration report of the Department: An approved design for the construction of an ornamental gate-way to the Jumma Masjid in Dodpet, Shimoga, was got prepared by the Consulting Architect to Government and an estimate has been called for from the Executive Engineer.

What are called Puduvat loans are given out of the Department's resources. Several educational institutions are run, as well as hospitals. The Ayurvedic and Unani College and Hospitals, in Mysore, the Sanskrit College, Melkote, Veda Patashala, Vaidiki Dharma Patashalas, Agama classes, are all associated with the urge to help the poor.

ANTI-SEMITISM IN THE U. S. A.

Two American periodicals have called attention to the spread of anti-Semitism in the United States.

The Federal Council Bulletin writes as follows under the heading "Discrimination Against Jews in Employment:"

To what extent are Jews, as Jews, refused employment today? The American Jewish Congress (221 West 57th St., New York, N. Y.) has issued a report entitled "Towards Fair Play for Jewish Workers" by J. X. Cohen, chairman of the Congress' Commission on Economic Problems, which gives many data on this question concerning New York City. The Commission on Economic Policies investgates complaints of discrimination which are reported to it. It finds, in some cases, that these are due to malicious gossip. In cases of valid complaint the investigation sometimes goes far toward changing company policy. Discrimination, Mr. Cohen finds, has increased very greatly since 1928, and particularly, since the Nazi Government came into power in Germany. "There is today a marked tendency to make Jews marginal workers, that is, the very last hired, and the very first fired when entering a period of economic decline." Employment agencies are frequently biased, refusing to refer Jewish applicants for positions even where employers are not prejudiced. Advertisements for "Christian" employees spread anti-Semitism, so that one of the needed tasks in the field is "the moulding of a uniform policy among newspapers respecting unfair ads." While there is no discrimination against Jewish teachers in the New York City public school system it exists to a serious extent in private schools, sometimes even among those serving mainly a Jewish clientele. Relatively little discrimination exists in department stores in New York but the situation is very different in the food and beverage industry, where a "large proportion" are "apparently unfair in their employment policy." The larger steam laundries follow a discriminatory policy but the "wet wash" laundries do not. Opportunities in the lithographic industry are very limited because of apprenticeship regulations. The New York Telephone Company does not "employ an equitable number of Jewish persons," though it denies any discrimination.

On the same subject, Time writes:

Pressed to explain why New York Telephone Co. does not employ an 'equitable number" of Jews, one official replied that Jewish girls, could not operate equipment "because their arms are too short." A restaurateur alibied that Jewish waitressers do not like to serve non-kosher food.

"One of the gravest elements of our very difficult problem is the discriminatory attitude of some Jewish employers toward Jewish employees." A Jewish-owned Miami hotel with over 95% Jewish patronage had only four Jews among 600 employees.

That there is a rising tide of anti-Semitism in the U. S. comparable to Europe's is the contention of many U. S. observers, especially Jews. Last month the American Jewish Congress, an organization to protect Jewish civil and economic rights headed by Manhattan's patriarchal Rabbi Stephen S. Wise, published a survey specifically charting the effects of Depression and world-wide anti-Semitism on Jewish job prospects. Devoted mainly to New York City, which has a population 28% Jewish, the survey showed:

Employment agency advertisements specifying "Christians" (variants: "Gentiles," "Anglo-Saxons") are more frequent than at any time since the War. Rare in the boom years of 1917–18 and 1928, they were more than twice as frequent in the 1932 depression as in the 1921 depression. In 1934, after Hitler's rise, they "occurred at the amazingly high rate of once in every column inch of advertising matter—five times as frequent as in 1932." Until 1934 "one of the great New York papers," the Jewish-controlled Times, banned the specification, but today "Christian" appears once in every 6½ column-inches. "Anglo-Saxon" once every 29. Another paper runs "Christian" once every half column-inch. "Anglo-Saxon" once in 4½.

Discrimination in occupational advertisements is sharpest against Jewish salesmen, white-collar workers, women stenographers. To combat it, many Jewish girls have taken to wearing crosses "as a protective charm."

Of 90 major employment agencies, 35 ask their employer clients for "religious preference."

Although 45% of Jewish children get through high school, compared to 30% of Protestants, unemployment is higher among Jewish youths (31%).

INDIA APPROACHES FEDERATION.*

A few weeks ago, in an address on the pressure of population in India, General Sir John Macgaw drew attention to the fact that over half the Indian people, at least in the rural areas, fall below a minimal standard of nutrition, even on the frugal scale of a warm Oriental country. He showed that, in default of some improvement in economic output, the pressure of population is likely to drive down the average standard of life still further; for the population of some 400 millions is now increasing at the rate of 3½ millions a year. The political leaders of India have themselves been earnestly taking up this problem. Late in December, a so-called Planning Committee organized by the Congress met in Bombay, under the chairmanship of Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru, to consider how India's industries—urban and rural—should be developed with a view to raising the standard of life, combating unemployment, and caring for the rapidly rising numbers of the population. The industrialisation of India has been proceeding apace and is likely to go much further, since in the end it provides the only possible solution of the demographic problem. As Sir Thomas Ainscough, the British Senior Trade Commissioner in India, says in his latest report, published last week :—

During the past ten years scores of new industrial enterprises have been inaugurated in India which are swelling the total and increasing the variety of her production. They are, moreover, displacing imports, which have hitherto been obtained largely from the United Kingdom and which have provided a steady Customs revenue for the Government of India.

Industrialisation has been aided by the cheapness of labour, itself but a reflection of the low standard of living wrested from the land. It is true that the Indian workman is far less efficient than his European competitor, and that in total wage cost per unit of output the latter not infrequently has the advantage. But that does not alter the fact that standards of life in the tenements of India's industrial cities are appallingly low.

Nevertheless, the problems of industrial labour have not yet assumed the first prominence in Indian politics, although it is now nearly two years since popularly-elected Governments assumed office in the provinces. There are many reasons for this. In the first place, the rural and agricultural community greatly outnumbers the urban and Industrial. In the second place the factory workers are very difficult to organise because the majority of them keep one foot, so to speak, in their home villages, whither they return at any sign of serious industrial disturbance and where they can always find a living, either by their own efforts or at their relatives' expense. In the third place, the leadership of the Congress which holds office (with or without allies) in every province but two, is predominantly middle-class in outlook, and is much more closely associated with agrarian agitation than with industrial trade unionism. Finally, the vital economic problems of India, urgent as they are, still remain partially obscured by the politics of nationalism. It is still possible for Mr. Subhas Bose, the current president of the Congress, to perambulate the country declaring that nothing worth while can be done to improve the lot of the poverty stricken Indian until India has obtained her complete constitutional freedom.

In so far as this propaganda has any national grounds at all, it is based on two main allegations: that the British Government has overtaxed the people of India in order to maintain an expensive army for imperial purposes, and that until British power has gone, with its inherent conservatism and covert alliance with the landlords and capitalists of India, no national economic or social reform will be countenanced. Even if we take this claim at face value, the landlords and capitalists will not disappear with the British administration. Many of them are today prominent in the Congress Party. Indeed, to judge from the way matters have gone in the provinces, a second bloodless revolution will be needed if power is to be transferred from the bourgeoisie to the masses and the vested interests of feudalism overthrown. Nevertheless, the movement of economic revolt has undoubtedly been gaining ground, especially in the peasant areas of Bihar, Orissa and the United Provinces, and big inroads have already been made on the privileged position of the Zemindars (landlords). At the centre, great importance attaches to the Income Tax Bill which Sir James Grigg, with immense determination, steered through before the rising of the Assembly last month. For not only is it a vital element in the structure of finance on which the new Constitution will depend ; it is also a critical step in the modernisation of India's fiscal system, by a shifting of some burden from the agricultural to the commercial and industrial classes.

There is not much elasticity in the Indian fiscal system, even in its revised shape. The difficulty of finding money for the purpose of government—expanding purposes, if Indian democracy fulfils its promises of economic and social reform—will be increased by the policies of prohibition, which eats into liquor excise revenue, and of industrial protection, which eats into the yield of Customs. This is one of the main reasons for Indian agitation for control of the Army, the cost of which threatens to increase with mechanisation and improved rates of pay. The Congress is today laying stress upon its policy of a "people's army." This implies not only the elimination of the British Army and the Indianisation of the Officer cadre in the Indian Army, but also the recruitment of troops in proportion to the numbers in different areas and different communities.

This proposal at once raises in an acute form the problem of Hindu-Muslim relations ; for at present the Indian Army is drawn very largely from the Muslims of the Punjab. Hence the agitation has tended to embitter the already strained relations between the Muslim League and the predominantly Hindu Congress. This is one reason for the recent breakdown of attempts to establish a working pact between the two groups. Such a pact would pave the way for Congress leadership under the future federal constitution. At present, the ostensible Congress policy is still one of rigid opposition to a federation imposed from outside and scored with reservations and safeguards designed to inhibit the free working of Indian democracy. Beneath the surface, however, Congress opinion has drifted to a more co-operative attitude. Certain conditions, it is stressed must still be fulfilled, conditions which the more conservative Congressmen are anxious to prove can be satisfied without formal amendment of the Government of India Act. Of these, by far the most important is the stipulation that the system of election to the federal Chambers shall be such as to give the Congress itself a reasonable chance of obtaining—with reliable allies if necessary—a working majority.

This does not seem an extravagant demand on the part of an organisation which has proved its claim to speak for the bulk of Indian electors by forming Governments (in two cases with partners in coalitions) in nine of the eleven provinces of British India. But the Federal Constitution allows the Congress no hope of a majority even in the Lower House of the Federation, so long as the mass of the Muslims are hostile and so long as the States' seats are filled by the Ruler's nominees, who would presumably be anti-Congress. The approach to the Muslims having broken down on the fundamental point of the Congress's refusal to acknowledge the Muslim League as the sole effective representative of the Mussulman community, the Congress leaders have naturally turned their eyes to the seats allotted to the princely States. The agitation for democratic reform in the States is in part a spontaneous movement among the States' subjects themselves, and to outward appearances it is directed primarily to the greater participation of the people in the States' internal government. But it will be misunderstood unless it is seen against the background of the struggle for power in the federal India of the future. For the Congress, the question of democratic election of the States' federal representatives is fundamental, deciding—as it may—whether the federation is to be introduced with the co-operation of the Congress or in the face of a vast civil disobedience movement. It is, of couse, even more fundamental for the Princes themselves. It is also fundamental for the Muslim League, whose only hope of federal power as a distinct organisation lies in the chance of straddling a balance between other groups, and, above all, it is fundamental for the British Government, with whom lies the decision at what moment and on what terms the great step of federation will be taken. This is the gravest of the important issues that will have to be solved in 1939, if federation is to be inaugurated with any chance of success in 1940.

THE VAN ZEELAND REPORT.*

(By Henry Carter.)

The world is likely to hear much in the future of the Report presented to the Governments of British and France by M. Van Zeeland, until recently the Premier of Belgum. Months ago the two Governments ask him to undertake "an inquiry into the possibility of obtaining a general reduction of quotas and of other obstacles to international trade." He and his colleague M. Frere, have conferred with national leaders in America as well as in European capitals. The Report was published on January 1938. Behind its discussion of tariffs, exchange controls and the like, is a vast human concern—peace instead of war, peace which could be won by a collective Economic policy to aid all countries by raising the standard of living of their impoverished multitudes. When in Czechoslovakia and Poland last December with Mr. Lansbury, I heard responsible statesmen in those two countries express their deep conviction that this was the one road which could lead away from the fateful race in armaments. We took every opportunity on that journey to urge that the Van Zeeland Report, when presented, should be studied to discover whether it pointed to peace through economic agreement. Whatever criticism may be directed to this or that detail there can be no doubt that as a whole the Report is a peacemaker's effort, a genuine attempt to restore not only communications but also close relations between countries that have fallen further and further apart. I will try in brief terms to set out its main proposals.

In the first of its three sections the Report gives a general view of the world situation. Diverse conceptions of economic life are at present in conflict. One view regards trade with other nations as a good and desirable thing in itself, because it distributes raw materials, food stuffs or manufactured articles, usually to the mutual advantage of the trading nations. The other view or policy—now known as autarchy—aims at economic independence by supplying the home market with goods produced within the national (or imperial) frontiers. Everybody knows that since the world has rejected freedom in international trade; that Governments have ranged themselves, with differing emphasis on the side of economic nationalism and that we live to-day amidst active hostility with quotas and tariffs and currencies as weapons of offence or defence. M. Van Zeeland clearly recognizes that the sufferers in this conflict are the plain folk of the warring countries, for economic nationalism causes national impoverishment. Yet, though difficulties abound, the grim circumstances of to-day demand a new and a wiser choice. "The economic policy which we now adopt," says the Report, "may, if it is good, mark the beginning of a new era of prosperity in the world; it may also, if it is bad, transform the present hesitations of trade into a new and more serious crisis." The Report declares for international economic collaboration.

The second part of the Report reviews "the principal direct obstacles in the way of international trade and the means for reducing them." I must refer the student to the document, and here name only the outstanding findings.

On the economic side M. Van Zeeland suggests that Governments should undertake (1) not to raise or widen the range of their tariffs; (2) to carry out a general reduction of such duties as are of an exceptional character; (3) to abolish duties and other obstacles limiting the export of raw materials; (4) to negotiate bilateral commercial agreements based on "the most favoured nation" clause; (5) to remove forms of "indirect protection" which hinder international commerce; (6) to appoint arbitral bodies for friendly settlement of differences of an economic character; (7) to suppress industrial quotas; (8) to reduce or end agricultural quotas.

On the financial side the chief obstacles to trade are shown to be sudden and excessive exchange variations and restrictions of commercial payments. A network of suggestions is elaborated, designed to lessen insecurity in international trade, and to promote its development.

The section closes with what is virtually an appeal to the States of the world "to join in a programme of international co-operation." The co-operative States, it is suggested, might establish "a common fund the resources of which might be applied, under appropriate conditions, to facilitate the financing of legitimate trade operations during the period of adjustment." If this includes the provision of capital for industrial and agricultural developments in the poorer and more backward countries, then a long stride would be taken towards advance in the standard of living where destitution now abounds.

If peace on earth is to be reached through good-will and joint action in the economic field, what is the way forward? A notable merit of the Report is that the reader—be he expert or plain citizen—is not left "in the air." In his final section the author, after recalling the fears and suspicions and complexities which make co-operation difficult between Governments, refuses to be turned aside from the work of welfare-building. He proposes a new method of approach, "the object of which will be above all to secure to each participant the tangible advantages of collective action." A pact of International Economic Collaboration is advocated, open to all States: "the aim of the pact would be to raise the standard of living by improving the general well-being." The leading economic Powers are invited to take the first steps.

THE TRADITIONAL HOME OF THE SANDALWOOD TREE.

It is in perfumery that the greater proportion of Sandalwood Oil is employed at the present day and to discriminating buyers, such as perfumers and soap manufacturers must of necessity be, it is hardly necessary to extol the virtues of the East Indian Oil which is without equal, both as a fine perfume base and a fixative for the increasingly popular bouquets of the Oriental type. In addition it is now being used extensively, and with marked success, in the creation of some of the more delicate perfumes in which the Sandalwood odour is not required as a predominant character.

A few trials will convince the perfumer who has not taken full advantage of the odour value of this oil, that is of the greatest use to him, not only for predominant Sandalwood odour where required, but also a modifier and a fixative for other odours. This is true for liquid perfumes, soaps, creams, powders and all other cosmetic preparations. It will be found invaluable to those up-to-date perfumers who pride themselves on their own "creations."

NOTES.

The Testing of Democracy :—A striking feature of Post-Munich politics is the increasing dependence of the democracies of Europe on the United States of America. President Roosevelt has often in recent months made statements which raised Anglo-French hopes of American intervention in the event of trouble. But it has been clear at the same time that American opinion was lagging as much behind now as it was in Wilson's time. A report was published last week that the President had told the Senate Military Committee that the American frontier was on the Rhine. This drew angry protests from Germany and Italy and it had later to be repudiated by the President. The democracies of France and Britain will have to fight their own battles. They might consider themselves more fortunate than Czechoslovakia in as much as they are aware of the position well in advance. Mr. Chamberlain's declaration in Parliament of close collaboration with France might be taken as the first fruits of this realisation. The situation has also led to discussions in the British press on the survival chances of democratic institutions. The New Statesmen discusses in a series of interviews the capacity of democratic States to prepare for defence. It is interesting to note that three leaders of different schools like Mr. Herbert Morrison, Mr. Winston Churchill and Mr. Lloyd George, are agreed that the future of democracy depends on the "right" type of leadership. This seems on the face of it ridiculous. The leader is as much the product of a system as the upholder of it. If Britain finds reason to be dissatisfied with her present leadership, she might well examine the conditions which have given power into the present hands. With the "right" type of leader any system should succeed. We had always understood that the special greatness of the British system lay in the fact that whatever the weaknesses of its leaders it could not be led into totalitarianism. The prevalent belief among the intellectuals that the country is being badly guided by the present Government points to a loss of faith in institutions. This is the first step towards a change in the political system. Another symptom is the news which was widely published this week of countrywide plots to bomb national buildings and institutions and of counte-measures by the British Government and the police to prevent incendiarism. In ordinary circumstances, the unofficial censorship would have worked to keep the news from spreading. The publicity given to the danger can only mean the declaration of a state of emergency in the near future and the assumption of special powers by the Government.

The Palestine Conference :—The Palestine Round Table Conference commenced its session in London. On Tuesday Mr. Neville Chamberlain inaugurated the session twice—once he addressed the Arabs and later he spoke to the Jews. The reason for this procedure was that the Arabs refused to recognise the Jewish Agency and would not sit in the same room with Jewish delegates. The Arabs are divided. But there is a difference between the first Indian Round Table Conference and the present Palestine one. At the first Indian Conference the moderates were represented more than adequately, the extremists were non-co-operating: on the Palestine Conference the threat of non-co-operation from the Mufti Arab delegates has secured the exclusion of the moderates, the Nashashibi group. In the peculiar circumstances in which the Conference has been convened, only Mr. Chamberlain could ask for "peace through understanding." To add to the difficulties of the Conference the Mufti Party in Palestine has recommenced political activities in protest against the invitation of moderate leaders to the Conference. Mr. Chamberlain made a clever speech in which he represented the British official delegation as a third party which sits in judgment over rival claims and announced his intention of hearing both sides before giving an opinion. The Arabs at the Conference have, to our mind, made a grave mistake in their attitude towards the Conference. Their grievance is not so much against the Jews as against the British. At any rate anyone reading the four demands of the Arab Higher Committee, must know that not one of them can be satisfied by the Jews. Those demands are, recognition of the complete independence of Palestine; the replacement of the Mandate by a treaty; revocation of the Balfour Declaration, the immediate cessation of Jewish immigration and land sales. If the delegates are willing to go to London for a Conference conducted by the British Government why should they refuse to meet the Jewish delegates? The Arabs have now composed their differences. The Nashashibi Party will be represented by two delegates at the Conference.

The Muslim League and Palestine:—It is unfortunate that in its anxiety to press forward its own claims for recognition, the Muslim League has adopted a policy on questions relating to other Islamic peoples, which results in weakening Indian support. Both in the memorial meetings following the death of Kemal Ataturk and on the Palestine issue, Indian opinion, regardless of community, was with the Muslims. The League, however, in both cases has thrown its weight into communalising international questions. In the matter of Palestine, Mr. Jinnah, head of the Muslim League, represented to the British Government the need for Indian Muslims to be called in conference along with the Arab delegates. The Government naturally enough refused. Mr. Jinnah in a subsequent representation urged that Indian Muslims had a special interest in the holy places of Palestine and therefore pressed the Government to accede to his request. The Arab delegation have wired to Mr. Jinnah their support of his appeal They apparently look to Indian Muslims to swell the Arab strength and they evidently argue that, if world Jewry can be represented on the Conference, they do not see why Indian Muslims should not be allowed. If the Arabs were dealing with the Jews alone the addition of a couple of Indian Muslims may well be a source of strength to the Arab delegation to the Conference. But the British element has to be reckoned with as well. Politics are a complicated business. It might not inconceivably happen that concessions in India to the Muslim League may change the attitude of the Indian representation on questions relating to Palestine. The League knows very well that for all its interest in the holy places of Palestine the Indian Muslim community is not likely in the near future to attain a voice in matters of administration relating to them. The League leaders cannot have so soon forgotten the experience of the Muslim delegation to the Saudi Conference, in 1926. Capt. H. C. Armstrong's comment in his life of Ibn Saud, on the part played by the Indian representatives is interesting:

> The Indian delegates were at the bottom of most of the trouble. One proposed the Turkish delegate who had come late, as president, when a Hejazi was already in the chair. Another persisted in talking in Urdu or English when the Congress had decided that Arabic should be the only language, and refused to be shouted down. Both criticised the Wahabi practices, the handling of the finances of the pilgrimage, the organization of the Congress, and the suggestions to hold annual meetings. They demanded more votes than Nejd because there were more Muslims in India than in Nejd, and they created a general spirit of ill will.

The Muslims League, we are sure, does not ignore the fact that between Muslim Arab and Muslim Indian there are wide differences in outlook and ambition. The pressure of the League on the India Office is largely the result of a desire to win international recognition for the communal organization, apart from the country in which it has its roots. The attempt has not succeeded but it conveys the wrong impression that sympathy for the Arab cause is strong only among Indian Muslims. The League would be wise to turn its attempts to removing this impression.

A Generous Gesture:—The Educational Minister of Hyderabad in the course of his address at the All Hyderabad Teachers' Conference on the 3rd February, emphasised the importance of discipline in schools. He took the occasion to refer to the recent withdrawal of students from the Osmania University in terms which should remove any lurking misunderstanding and greatly facilitate the ending of this unhappy episode by the return of the students to their alma mater. Nawab Mahdi Yar Jung Bahadur spoke of the high destiny which awaited those who distinguished themselves by hard work in their school and college and went on to observe:

> In this connection I would like to say that we are very anxious for the future of our misguided youths who have left us. The door is always open to them. They will be received with open arms. They were misled and misguided by interested persons. We are anxious for their future. We are anxious that they do not spoil their future careers. The past will be forgotten. I say once again that they will be received with open arms.

From the first it was evident that a small matter was exaggerated into a serious problem and that with more coolness and deliberation than were displayed at the moment, the episode would have passed off without leaving any trace behind. This view is strengthened by the statement of the students published in the Daily News of Nagpur of the 4th February. In it the spokesman of the students, Mr. Narendra Dutt, says: "We declare openly that had our Muslim students asked us directly to refrain from singing the Vande Mataram we would have done so." Obviously the best course would have been to have left the dispute, if there was really one, to be settled by the students among themselves. Mr. Dutt further avers: "We believe that Hyderabad must preserve its integrity as a political and cultural unit within the frame-work of an All India body politic." Clearly these young men are not of the school which would like to see all Indian States abolished. In view of these sentiments and the generous gesture of the Educational Minister, it will be the height of folly if friends and well-wishers do not find a way of bringing about the re-entrance of the students to their own university where they are sure of a cordial welcome.

"Munich Agreement" or Political Blackmail?—The idea of calling upon all Congress Provincial Government to resign because the Thakore of Rajkot has not conformed to his undertaking with Sardar Vallabhbhai or because the authorities at Jaipur do not permit the presence of Mr. Jamnalal Bajaj within their borders, recalls the delightful Elia Essay about the Chinaman who first discovered that pork was a delicacy. Neither of these potentates is under any obligation to acknowledge the excellence of parliamentary government as the panacea for all the ills they and their subjects are suffering from. The Viceroy, no doubt, is anxious to have the Provincial part of the Government of India Act to continue to function under their present Governments as it provides the strongest argument in favour of and the best hope for the acceptance of the Federal part. But there is a limit beyond which he can not go even for this purpose. Otherwise, it would be better to scrap the whole Act and pass another handing over the whole administration, British India and the States, to the Congress hierarchy. The wobbling methods of the Government of India have created confusion all round. They are unfair both to the States and to British India outside the Congress. They are unfair to the Congress also. Though the leaders do not seem to realise it the position of the Congress in the light of the frequent appeals to the Viceroy for intervention is exactly that of Indian States which also look to him for protection. Unless there is a "Munich agreement" between Lord Linlithgow and Gandhiji, these frequent calls upon his powers as Crown representative to intervene at the threat of withdrawing the Congress ministries from eight provinces looks unpleasantly like political blackmail. One disadvantage of Mr. Subhas Bose's taking over the control of the Congress would be to get rid of the camouflage which obscures the real issues of politics at the presentday.

Warning to the Press:—The Bombay Premier has issued a second warning to the Press against writings calculated to inflame communal antagonism. The first was issued soon after he took office. He says that Hindu-Muslim controversy has been a familiar feature of Press writings for several years past but that a new development has taken place during the past few days in the shape of Gujarati-Marathi rivalry. The highest duty of a publicist at the present time in India, whether he is a journalist, politician or minister, is to promote by every means in his power harmonious and friendly relations between castes and communities. Any person who writes or speaks, whether in public or private, offensively of a community or caste as such, commits a capital crime against his country. Writings in the press, however, are not the only or the most dangerous material. Private conversations are far more inflammatory as they can not be exposed or contradicted. Government, too, must in the present state of Indian society be extremely careful to give no room for suspicion of bias in favour of or against a community or caste in the expenditure of public funds and in the formulation of beneficial measures. It is not enough to feel righteous in its own mind. Its measures must show to the man in the street that the Government is even-handed in its dispensation of justice and benevolence. No one doubts the intentions of the Kher Ministry but there is unfortunately a feeling that their intentions are deflected by pressure from party interests. We are told that the new development is of recent birth. It would be correct to say that an old smouldering ember has been recently fanned into flame. Have Government tried to discover if there is any cause or reason behind it or whether it is the wanton mischief of unadulterated perversity? It is extraordinary that the Congress which has for its chief end the creation of a feeling of solidarity between all castes and communities has, judging from events, accentuated old rivalries, and given rise to new ones. The exchanges between it and the Muslim League have not certainly composed Hindu-Muslim differences. The Gujarati-Marathi development can also be traced to the differences arising out of Congress measures. There is one other suggestion. Writings in the popular press take their cue from the conversation of leading partisans. Ministers themselves must set the example of conforming in their private utterances to the admirable sentiment against communalism which they promulgate from public platforms and through press communiques. The Prime Minister himself as everybody knows is totally without blame in this respect.

The Jews and the Christians:—We reprint today an interesting article from the Jewish Tribune on the Crucifixion story and its effect on the position of Jews. It would be thought that the opinion of the Jews has a peculiar value on this question. The Jewish Tribune, however, is very guarded in its comment probably because one of its contributors, "a staunch Christian and a lover of the Jewish people," has "strongly advised" it not to publish anything which will hurt Christian feelings, at this time. The Jewish Tribune nevertheless supports the view that the story of the Crucifixion as narrated in the Gospels has reacted adversely on the Jews. We cannot understand the attitude of the correspondent who would suppress Jewish opinion on a vital matter because it will hurt his feelings. As for the correspondent's rather dogmatic assertions on our note—the bone of contention between him and the Jewish Tribune—we would refer him to the letter of the Secretary to the Canadian Board of Missions which we publish elsewhere. Mr. Armstrong goes even farther than we do. He would deny intelligence to any Christian who does not accept that Christ was crucified for breaking the laws of the Romans.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER
BOMBAY, February 11, 1939.

LATE MAHARAJA SAYAJI RAO GAEKWAR.

The Maharaja Sayaji Rao Gaekwar of Baroda died on Monday night at his Bombay residence in Nepean Sea Road. His Highness had for several years past been in indifferent health which necessitated his spending the greater part of every year in Europe. He returned from Europe in October last in a condition almost of collapse. Careful and expert medical assistance sustained by his own will to live, led to marked improvement in his condition. But he could not be moved from his Bombay home. The end came as a surprise and a shock to the public which had believed that His Highness was well on his way to recovery and that he might be spared to rule over his State and to give the benefit of his ripe experience and wise counsel to the country in the transitional period through which it is passing. His death at this juncture is a very great deprivation to Baroda and to India. The story of his long career as a ruler is well known. But he was first and foremost a social reformer with definite views on the principal changes needed in order to make society progressive and capable of playing its part amidst modern world conditions. The elevation of the position of women and their emancipation from cramping customs like the purdah and infant marriage, the abolition of the present watertight hereditary system of caste, the removal of untouchability and, above, all the banishment of illiteracy, were regarded by him as absolutely essential before India can take upon herself the responsibility of self-government in the full and true sense of the term. He was recognised as an All-India leader in all these matters. His position as the ruler of Baroda enabled him to apply his principles on a large enough scale to be of guidance to the rest of the country. He was fired by the spirit of the pioneer. A fervent believer in the liberating force of education, he introduced free and compulsory education in his State many years before any other State or province in British India thought of it. He appointed committees of enquiry into marriage customs in the State and promoted legislation to reform the more glaring defects in the light of the results of the enquiry. Baroda led the way in the matter of intercaste marriages, and legal reforms relating to women's right of property. The Maharaja was among the first to realise the cruelty and hardship involved in the custom of untouchability. He established schools and boarding houses for the children of untouchables and encouraged their higher education by means of liberal scholarships tenable in India and abroad. Dr. Ambedkar was one of those thus helped.

The Maharaja in his earlier years would seem to have inclined to what is called Rationalism. He spoke on one occasion contemptuously of those who wished to save only their own "dirty souls." The process of saving one's own soul happens to be the process of saving other people's souls also. No one can save his own soul at the expense of another's. When the Maharaja's mind passed this stage, is not known. But certain it is that he realised in these latter days the need for religion and the great worth to humanity of the messages of the World Teachers. To three of these he was most powerfully drawn: Sri Krishna, Buddha and Jesus Christ. In a memorable address to the World Fellowship of Faiths at Chicago in 1933, he said:

> To do a man's work in an unselfish spirit is to find God, says the Gita. It is men of such spirit that have built up "this brave, new world," but through self-will —Trishna or Tanha—we are wrecking it, as the Gita and Buddha insist. The men of science, the doctors, the engineers, the social reformers, the religious seers, these are making all things new—fellow workers with God; but selfishness, race hatred, narrow nationalism and greed have thrown all into chaos. Yet a new cosmos is emerging; God is at work. He is a democratic king and asks our help. He recognises no hierarchy but that of service. He that is greatest, let him be the servant of all. He is greatest who serves most.

The Maharaja digressed a bit to define Democracy and the definition he gave is one which has not grown stale in these six years. "Democracy," he said, "means also the emergence of the common man and his rights, the demand of the backward peoples for a place in the Sun. And alike in East and West, tyranny and humbug are challenged, for they deny these rights." Along with Sri Krishna and Buddha, the Maharaja named Gandhiji as "our great laymen who have given us what you call horse sense, and called us back to reality and to the human values." These, he added, are "the practical idealists of India." In his concluding words at this great Conference the Maharaja struck a lofty note which thrilled the audience to enthusiasm. He said:

> You are wise and farsighted in organising this World Fellowship of Faiths; let each put its own house in order, and let each bring out of its treasury things new and old for the healing of the nations. What better expresses the spirit we need than the saying of the Chinese Mystic twenty-five centuries ago? Activity without Assertiveness; Production without Possessiveness; Direction without Domination. This is very Christian, and we in India claim that we are by nature akin to the Christian ideal; we also acknowledge that Christ has challenged us to make our religion simpler and better.

Baroda when the late Maharaja ascended the gadi was a backward State barely redeemed from chaos by the efforts of a Regency: It has during his reign come to be one of the most advanced and well-administered States. A life of great achievement like the Maharaja's evoked naturally the highest admiration in India and abroad. Its cessation is, therefore, felt as a national loss which is peculiarly deplorable at this juncture when the country is experiencing the travails of a new birth. His Highness' grandson has succeeded to the gadi. His education and upbringing, engaged the special and personal care of the late Maharaja. It will be the earnest prayer of the public in Baroda and in India that His Highness Pratap Singh's reign may be as long and as prosperous and progressive as that of his illustrious grandfather.

INDIAN STATES.

Lord Dalhousie thought that it would be for the good of their people if Indian States were annexed to British India. Satara was admittedly a well-governed State. But when the ruler died, Lord Dalhousie refused to recognise his adopted son, and annexed the State. He wrote in his despatch to the Directors of the East India Company :

> In my conscience, I believe we should ensure the population of the state a perpetuity of that just and mild government which they have lately enjoyed, but which they will hold by a poor and uncertain tenure, indeed, if we resolve now to continue the Raj, and to deliver it over to the government of a boy brought up in obscurity, selected for adoption almost by chance, and of whose character and qualities nothing whatever was known to the Raja who adopted him : nothing whatever is known to us.

As a matter of fact, the Governor-General was acting on the orders of the Chairman of the Court of Directors. His task was to urge some plausible reason. He could not in the face of unimpeachable testimony allege that there was mis-government in Satara. He was obliged to admit that the Raja's government was good and mild. His argument was that, under the rule of the adopted son, there was no chance of the excellence of that rule being continued. He was convinced that only under British rule was there a guarantee of the continuance of the late Raja's benevolent and popular administration. The Raja of Satara was not a limited monarch in the present day sense of the term. Yet his rule, according to the testimony of the then Governor of Bombay, Sir George Clerk, who pleaded for its continuance, was a happy and prosperous one and his government was "just and praiseworthy." As for its popularity, it is enough to quote the opinion of Major J. D. Basu that its annexation was the cause of the Indian Mutiny. He says :

> The annexation of Satara is an important landmark in the history of British India, for it can be safely asserted that the policy which led to the absorption of this native state was the principal cause of the Indian Mutiny. This non-recognition of the adopted son as heir to the Satara principality gave rise to the controversy, the echo of which is audible even to our own day.

Major Basu's book was published in 1922.

As a result of the Mutiny, the British policy towards Indian States was completely changed. The Queen's Proclamation guaranteed to the Princes their rights and dignities. In the new conditions, great Indian statesmen arose and flourished. Sir Salar Jung, Rajah Sir T. Madhav Rao, Sir Dinkar Rao, Dewan Rangacharlu, Sir Sesaya Shastry and Sir Seshadri Aiyar established a high reputation for constructive Indian statesmanship. The deposition of Malharrao Gaikwar in the eighteen seventies was resented by Indian opinion as an unjust and unconstitutional act of the Government of India. The proclamation of the Queen as Empress of India was in part intended to regularise such proceedings in future. The Rendition of Mysore a few years later was hailed by the Indian public as an act of just and generous statesmanship. Indian States were regarded by the Indian people and their leaders as the inheritors and preservers of Indian culture and tradition and as such were cherished by the whole country. Ranade declared that the heart of India beat in the Indian States and watched with solicitude every sign of social and moral progress in them. Dadabhai Naoroji championed their rights against encroachment by the Government of India. The Rulers reciprocated this goodwill and the relations between the States and British India developed on happy and harmonious lines. Some of them, however, had not made the best use of their opportunities. In the beginning of this century, Lord Curzon, as a part of his centralization scheme, initiated a policy of associating the Princes whom he called partners and colleagues, closely with the defence of the Empire. He insisted on the rulers attending to their administration as arduously as he himself did. He set his face against their going abroad for pleasure and spending much of their time on social and sporting functions. He admonished them severely for neglect of the interests of their people. In his famous Gwalior speech, Lord Curzon laid down his policy towards the Princes. The passage is worth quoting :

> The Native Chief becomes by our policy an integral factor in the Imperial organisation of India. He is concerned not less than the Viceroy or the Lieutenant-Governor in the administration of the country. I claim him as my colleague and partner. He can not remain vis-a-vis of the Empire a loyal subject of Her Majesty the Queen Empress, and vis-a-vis of his own people a frivolous and irresponsible despot. He must justify and not abuse the authority committed to him; he must be the servant as well as the master of his people. He must learn that his revenues are not secured to him for his selfish gratification, but for the good of his subjects; that his internal administration is only exempt from correction in proportion as it is honest, and that his gadi is not intended to be the divan of indulgence, but the stern seat of duty. His figure should not merely be known on the polo-ground, or on the race course, or in the European hotel. These may be his relaxations and I do not say they are not legitimate relaxations : but his real work, his princely duty, lies among his own people. By this standard shall I, at any rate, judge him. By this test will he, in the long run, as a political institution, perish or survive.

Indian opinion welcomed this plain-speaking as called for by certain tendencies which were becoming noticeable among some Princes. But the Princes themselves regarded it as an insolent invasion of their rights. This feeling was accentuated by Lord Curzon's action in securing the perpetual lease of Berar from the late Nizam, which, by the way, had been p oposed by Dalhousie and rejected by his predecessor fifty years before. All India felt that the Viceroy had taken undue advantage of the loyalty and keen sense of honour of His late Highness. Lord Curzon also incurred unpopularity in British India on account of his Universities Act and the Partition of Bengal. The discontent of the Princes swelled the volume of his unpopularity. His successor, Lord Minto, as a measure of appeasement, relaxed the control of the Government of India over the States. The War came and the Princes' help in money and troops were highly serviceable to the British Government. This emancipated them completely from the control of the Government of India, which had to be asserted subsequently in some cases of grave misgovernment by drastic action. As a general proposition it must be acknowledged that the standard of administration in all but a few States underwent marked deterioration during the period of the War and the years following it.

The grievances of the people, especially of several States in Northern India, increased in number and gravity. The Chamber of Princes, while keen on asserting the rights of their order, totally ignored the claims of their duties so well enunciated by Lord Curzon. The States People's Conference for many years asked only for the redress of grievances. Several responsible British Indians associated themselves with it, men like the late Dewan Bahadur Ramachandra Rao and Mr. C. Y. Chintamani. But, owing to want of response from the States and the Government of India, the movement fell into extremist hands. The leaders of the National Congress did not for many years interest themselves in the States' People's movement. The Congress observed towards the States the principle of non-intervention from its very inception. The most thoughful and responsible Congress leaders were of opinion that the States must develop th ir own polity and should not be forced into the mould of British Indian politics. Within the last twelve months however this wise policy has been abandoned and Congress leaders are actively promoting a movement for the immediate transformation of the Governments of the States into parliamentary and responsible governments.

SALE OF GIRLS.

RAMSARAN SINGH writes to the Patna Searchlight:

The abolition of the dowry system is good, but those who advocate it should also pay their attention to the worse practice of selling girls which prevails in this province. The most corrupt practice of sale of girls for marriage should be checked before the system of dowry is abolished by legislation.

The Brahmins of Tirhut sell their girls for marriage like domestic beasts in Sabha which is held in Tirhut annually without taking any care for their future well-being. Even the Maharajadhiraj of Darbhangah is unable to check it and the Sabha is held annually for this very purpose.

REFLECTIONS ON CONGRESS PRESIDENT'S ELECTION.

A noteworthy feature of the short but sharp interlude which followed the announcement of the election of Mr. Subhas Bose to preside at the forthcoming session of the Indian National Congress, is that the principals in the contest have either been silent or very sparing in their comments on the event. Moulana Abdul Kalam Azad has not spoken at all. Yet it was his last minute withdrawal that brought about what may develop, if it has not already done so, in to a crisis in the Congress. The Maulana's attitude, indeed, is not easily explained. For over a month he let the apparently authentic forecast about his being the next President, go uncorrected. He might have privately conveyed to Gandhiji his difficulties in the way of accepting the Congress crown. If so, Gandhiji did not consider them adequate and the Maulana was persuaded to agree to shoulder the distinction. He comes to Bombay from Bardoli and issues a statement to the Press stating that, owing to the strain on his health caused by his duties as a member of the Parliamentary Sub-Committee, he could not accept the Presidentship, and commends the candidature of Dr. Pattabhi Sitarammayya. Dr. Pattabhi has told the public that he had already sent out an announcement to the Press withdrawing his candidature and it was under the Maulana's pressing request that he withdrew his withdrawal. Was the strain on his health the only reason of the Maulana or were there other reasons behind it? Gandhiji, though careless of his own health, is exceedingly considerate to that of his co-workers. He is not the man to drive a willing horse to death. If he had found that the Maulana's health would not be equal to the strain of the Presidentship—Gandhiji, it must be remembered, is a health expert—he would certainly not have pressed the office upon him. One is driven, therefore, to conclude that there were other reasons which weighed heavily with the Maulana. There is one which springs to one's mind. As president of the Congress the Maulana will be the head and spokesman of the Congress whose relations with the Muslim League border on open hostility. There have been personal recriminations between the Maulana and Mr. Jinnah. If the negotiations are to be re-opened, it was desirable that some one who was less involved in the controversy should speak for the Congress. If the Maulana, overlooking this difficulty, took over the negotiations as President of the Congress, would the rank and file of the Congress give him complete support and confidence? These are weighty reasons and, if the Maulana had pleaded these publicly, he would have added greatly to the high esteem in which he is held by all parties. Needless reticence on the part of leaders in matters of this nature, deprives the public of the educative value of the process by which they reach decisions on matters of moment.

Dr. Pattabhi Sitaramayya, the other principal in this affair, has preferred to let the election figures speak for themselves. But Gandhiji thought that something more was needed to convey the significance of the figures. Avowing himself to be responsible for Dr. Pattabhi Sitaramayya's candidature—as if the actual candidate did not matter—he declared Dr. Pattabhi's defeat was a repudiation of his principles and policy by the majority of delegates and advised the minority, which is assumed to accept all of his views, to accord or not their cooperation to the re-elected President as their conscience bade them. Evidently, Congress discipline which has been rigorously enforced in other cases, has ceased to matter because Mr. Subhas Bose not Gandhiji's candidate has received a majority votes. Gandhiji's statement, issued on the morrow of the election, lacks generosity and is not to Mr. Subhas Bose. Gandhiji says that he was the first opposed to Mr. Bose's re-election but he not give his reasons. We, too, thought that Mr. Bose was not the most suitable President for Congress at this juncture and gave our reasons, ely, his oft-repeated thesis that Britain's difficul- were India's opportunities, and his intense ncialism which is calculated to lead to the ests of the whole country being subordinated to narrow exigencies of Bengal politics. In both ects he is a contrast to Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru world view may sometimes take on a tint of ism but is most often associated with goodwill magnanimity towards those whom circumstances e made him look on as his political opponents. other words, the Pandit is a party poli- by necessity not by choice. With Subhas Bose it is rather the other way. But that he has been elected for a second time sident of the Congress, we have every hope that will, as so many others have done, develop a der outlook and a more generous spirit towards with whom he has to contend. Since writing lines, we have seen Mr. Subhas Bose's short and fied statement. He is not intimidated by dhiji's disapproval of his election and does not to throw up the sponge on that account. hopes by his activities to convert Gandhiji his side as he attaches more importance to good opinion than to that of all the rest his friends. He has consulted with Pandit awaharlal Nehru at Santiniketan. The Pandit, whatever his views, is unlikely to support Mr. Subhas Bose in the face of Gandhiji's disapproval. Mr. Bose knows this. The Poet, Tagore, is reported to have taken upon himself to bring about an understanding between Gandhiji and Mr. Bose. We trust he may succeed but the result of the Poet's intervention in political matters have not been always very happy. The accession of Mr. S. Srinivasa Ayyangar to Mr. Bose's side is likely to prove a turning-point in the career of the Congress in the Madras Presidency. In fact, his influence was largely responsible for the majority which voted for Mr. Bose among the delegates from the Tamil Nad.

There is another reflection which forces itself on the mind on the perusal of the statements and counter-statements which have been issued in connection with Mr. Subhas Bose's election. It is plainly avowed those opposed to Mr. Subhas Bose that the practice hitherto has been invariably for the candidate for the Presidentship to be nominated by Gandhiji and that the subsequent elaborate election procedure was a mere formality. When Mr. Bose insisted that the delegates were free to elect whom they liked and that the manifesto issued by seven or eight members of the Working Committee on the eve of the election, was an interference with the delegates' freedom of choice, he was plainly told that his own election last year was made at the instance and suggestion of the High Command and that it is not for him, therefore, to raise his voice against the established convention. That may be a good retort to Mr. Bose but it raises an issue which must be very embarrassing to those who have accepted Truth as the creed of the Congress. Is it Truth to pretend that a candidate who was imposed on the Congress by Mr. Gandhi and the Working Committee, owes his position to the free choice of the delegates as has been the case all these years and which would have been the case this year also but for the intramigence of Mr. Subhas Bose? Gandhiji has been off and on raising the cry of corruption in the Congress. How can he expect purity when the very foundation rests upon a palpable fiction? There is another question which is raised by this episode. The Congress stands for responsible Government in British India and the States. One expects that it will set the example and model of it in its own constitution. Would the reproduction in the Government and the States, of the Congress constitution such as it has been shown to be in the Nariman and Khare episodes, and has now been authoritatively expounded in connection with election of Mr. Subhas Bose, be accepted by Gandhiji and the rest of the hierarchy as a sufficient and satisfactory form of responsible Government? What is the principle running right through the organisation? It is the vesting of power in a person or set of persons carefully denuded of responsibility which is thrown upon another set who have to be guided by Party heads in the exercise of the power which they nominally possess. Here again there is departure from Truth, the fertile soil of corruption. Corruption can not be eradicated by purges at intervals. It must be prevented from growing by ensuring that the soil of public life is sweet and free from the fungus of make-believe.

BOMBAY UNIVERSITY.—I.

(By Professor P. A. Wadia.)

In every country in the world, the Universities, whether run by the State or endowed by private munificence, play a vital part as institutions for the promotion and prosperity of the national life. In India as much as any other part of the world, they serve the national life as centres of research and seats of culture, as the disseminators of learning amongst the masses, and as the training ground for the future leaders as well as legislators for developing the democratic institutions of the country. It would be a sad day when the public resources of the provinces are withdrawn from the support of these seats of learning and nurseries of citizenship, merely. in the interests of an effective support of primary education.

Universities have recently come in for a considerable amount of criticism. Some of them, like the Bombay University, have had traditions that go back more than seventy years. Some of the more recently founded Universities are suggested to be worthy as models to be profitably copied by the older Univsreities which have been charged as being conservative, reluctant to move with the times, and predominantly concerned with the humane sciences and culture. In this way, the Bombay University has been having its share of criticism; and it is high time for us that we should make a survey of the working of our University with a view to examine its strength and its weakness.

Let us preface our remarks by stating that a University is an institution which seeks to be instrumental for the promotion of definite purposes, and for the fostering of a particular way of living. Thus the success of any such institution must ultimately depend upon those who work it. As it is, the main work of our University, as such an institution in our Province, is carried on by the constituent Colleges and schools affiliated to it. For, apart from the special Departments of teaching and research that it directly controls, the main functions of our University are confined to the work of laying down courses of study and conducting examinations.

This work is done by a machinery known as the University Act. In examining the merits and demerits of the work of the Bombay University we have, then, to take into account the nature of the machinery, as also the human material concerned with the working of that machinery. These two factors must be accepted as so intimately interdependent that it is difficult to separate the working of both in this brief review of ours.

The Bombay University Act directs that all the elections to the Senate, as also to all other statutory bodies of the University, shall be conducted on the principle of proportional representation in terms of the single transferable vote. Now, in the first instance, it is difficult to understand why the principle of proportional representation, intended as it is to give protection to minorities, should be introduced in elections to an educational corporation, like the University. In the domain of education where we are concerned with the things of the spirit, there should be no barrier of race or creed or colour. But, even if one admits the need for proportional representation, in order that such a system of representation is effectively worked, it is necessary that all the constituent members of the several bodies should be elected at a time, and that also through constituencies that are plural, and not single-member constituencies. In both these respects the Act under which the Bombay University is working calls for immediate revision. For example, the Senate has on it twenty-five members elected by the Registered Graduates: but all these twenty-five members are not elected once every five years; they are broken into groups of five, and spread over five years, five members being elected every year. But a still more serious disaster has overtaken this system of representation by the ruling of an ex-Chancellor; whenever a vacancy occurs due to the death or transfer of an elected member outside the Province or for some other cause, it is ordained by this ruling that the incumbents of such casual vacancies should hold office not during the remainder of the period which the original incumbent would have filled, but for a new period of five years; in view of this, plural-member constituencies have been tending to become single-member constituencies. Moreover, as the constituency of Registered Graduates is, for the purposes of election, to be regarded as a single whole extending from Kanara at the one end to Sind at the other, and as the number of electors now includes more than fifteen thousand votes, the object of proportional representation which was originally meant to secure the protection of minorities is defeated by the ruling of the Chancellor referred to above.

Similarly in another constituency, namely that of University and College Teachers, we find the same anomalies. Here also single-member constituencies are being gradually created with the lapse of time. In both these electorates communal prejudice can be traced behind the elections; but, what is worse, regional prejudices can also be seen working, as, for instance, between Gujarat and Maharashtra; and, Sind and Kanara are pushed into the background. If these defects were the end of it all, there might be some comfort for some of us. But unfortunately, in the elections from the Teachers' Constituency worse features of human frailties have been coming to our notice; thus principals of Colleges, in spite of the fact that they have their separate constituencies, offer themselves for election also from the Teachers' Constituency; there can be nothing so undesirable as this ranking together of the principals and professors of Colleges in the same constituency, as it tends to make the principals hunt for the votes of their own staff. Moreover, there are Colleges where, on account of the formation of cliques, the Principals insist that the voting-papers of members of their Staff should be submitted blank to these Principals, for the Principals' use as occasion requires. It used also to be a practice a few years ago on the eve of elections, for scores, if not hundreds, of graduates being registered through a single channel with a joint cheque which was presented at the office of the Registrar to cover the registration fees; luckily, such practices cannot now be profitably pursued, in view of a recent amendment of the Rules for Registration by which everyone who graduates is antomatically placed on the list of voters.

The causes of such electioneering practices as we have noticed above, can be traced not merely to human weaknesses arising from motives of ambition. There are other causes that seem to be at work, though these are not directly connected with the method and machinery of elections. In some of the constituent Colleges the low salaries paid to the members of the staff leave much room for them to desire a supplement to their earnings by such opportunities as the election to the Senate offers. A large number of these Colleges lie at some distance from the centre of the University. Membership of a Senate is a stepping-stone to membership of other Statutory Bodies like the Boards of Studies, the Faculties, the Academic Council, and others. Moreover, the mere fact that an applicant for examinership is a member of the Senate enhances the chances of his appointment as an examiner. Then there were occasions when gentle reminders had to be communicated by the Registrar's office to Boards of Studies about the undesirability of too frequent meetings. Similarly, the faculties have sometimes created work by the appointments of all kind of joint-conferences between a number of Boards or between other university bodies. In this way, one has reluctantly to admit, the machinery of elections has been and is being utilized not for the purpose of making the best talents availabe for University work, but for increasing the voting strength of cliques and for making the utmost possible use of the opportunities for such supplementary income as such memberships offer.

If it were asked what would be the possible methods of putting an end to some of the anomalies we have noticed above, it would be difficult to give any precise answer. But it is clear enough that, if proportional representation is to be retained, there should be simultaneous elections every five years from the different constituencies to the Senate; and, these elections should be up to the full strength of the number of members to be elected by these constituencies. It is also desirable that the Act should be so revised that the member who is elected to fill any casual vacancy from any constituency should hold office only for such limited period as the original incumbent would have filled before the next General Election of the constituency in question takes place. Further, the principals of all the Colleges should be ex-officio members of the Senate; this will save them from the degradation of vote-hunting amongst the subordinate members of the staff. But, above all, every election must take place by ballot, not through the post, but recorded in person by the voters concerned at polling booths. The objection against organising such polling booths on account of cost and trouble should not come in the way of this most desirable change; it is because of the voting by post that the pernicious practice of collection of votes by persons in authority goes on as an open secret, defeating thereby the fundamental object of the ballot. Therefore, this reform must be introduced immediately. Let us, however, remember that the mere revision of the Act in these directions will not bring the millenium. The machinary of the League of Nations could not be prevented from becoming a holding corporation of the victors in the last war. The best machinery for election in the Bombay University Act will not prevent it from being mis-handled by cliques. "Except ye be born again" needs to be remembered as much in the domain of University Education as in the salvation of the individual and of the corporate life on the larger scale.

FRANCE AFTER MUNICH.*

(By George Fielding Eliot)

The chief military aim of France is security. Security for its territorial frontiers in Europe and its colonial empire. Since the World War, France has sought to achieve security against a possible German war of revenge by trying to surround Germany with a cordon sanitaire of military alliances, developing close relations with Britain, and maintaining armaments at a high level.

The basic cause of French anxiety regarding Germany is man power. France has a population of 42,000,000, which has changed but little for three-quarters of a century. The French birth-rate is steadily declining. In contrast Germany, before the Anschluss, had a population of 68,000,000, with an increasing birth-rate. To these numbers have been added 10,000,000 Austrians and Sudeten Germans, giving a total population almost twice that of France.

In order to counterbalance German man power, France has drawn on its colonies for military strength and there are at present some 50,000 colonial native troops stationed in France. But France also depended to a large extent on its allies.

French strategy was based, first of all, on an impassable frontier barrier, which would assure France against sudden invasions like those of 1879 or 1914, and give time to cover the mobilization of its reserves (say four to eight days), the transportation of troops from North Africa (about two weeks), and the arrival of British forces. This barrier now exists in the Maginot Line, a series of fortified positions covering the whole German frontier and parts of the Belgian and Swiss borders. The garrisons of these fortifications consist of 50,000 specially trained troops, drawing 250,000 reserves from near-by areas.

Behind this barrier France can mobilize immediately the 27 divisions of its first-line army, with five cavalry divisions and auxiliary formation. Of these, the cavalry divisions and ten specially organized, fully motorized infantry divisions from the Troupes de couverture, which will move swiftly up in support of the Maginot Line, dealing with any possible break-through, or concentrating toward a threatened flank. The bulk of France's army, however, now consists of reserved divisions of which there are 42. The demands of the fortress troops, the air force, the tanks and other new formations coupled with the fact that the classes now serving are those of the "war-baby" years of low birth rates, have compelled France to reduce the number of its first-line divisions, of which there were 44 in 1914, but only 27 (of which 6 are colonial) today. The reserve divisions, regarded as distinctly inferior in 1914, are today France's mainstay. They have been brought to a high degree of perfection in training and equipment, and have excellent officer personnel.

If France is at war with both Germany and Italy, it is very likely that it will continue to use a defensive strategy toward Germany, while assuming the offensive toward Italy. The French do not think highly of the Italian army, and the configuration of the Alpine passes, converging from France toward Italy, favours the offensive in this direction. One school of military thought in France favoured an offensive striking from the Rhine crossing towards the Upper Danube between Ulm and Ratisbon; this calculation, however, was based on the assumption that the Czech army—34 divisions all told—would be engaging part of the German forces.

After Munich, France is isolated—save for Britain—and its strategy must be revised. It becomes more necessary than ever that the lines of communication between France and its North African empire should remain open. Maintenance of these lines is the primary task of the French navy.

From Sardinia and Sicily the Italian fleet could seriously interfere with the main line Algiers-Marseilles, but not at all with the exterior line Bordeaux-Casablanca. An Italian foothold in Spain, however, would alter this situation. Possession of the Balearic Islands would enable Italian air power to operate effectively against French transports on the Algiers-Marseilles route. Spain's Atlantic ports make it possible for Italy to operate beyond the Straits of Gibraltar. Moreover, Spanish Morocco gives Italy a pied a terre in the very heart of Morocco itself. It is these considerations, rather than serious worry over the Pyrrenean frontier which disturb French strategists when they examine the present situation in Spain.

In order to assure its vital communications with Africa, France must maintain its alliance with Britain, while rapidly building up its own fleet. The French fleet, with eight battleships, is at present superior to that of Italy and Germany combined who have four battleships. Considering ships under construction, it may not remain so in three years' time when France will have ten battleships, Germany five, and Italy eight.

It is, however, in the air that French military preparations have lagged most seriously. In 1933 France possessed the most powerful air fleet in Europe; today it occupies fifth place. It must always be borne in mind that the air weapon is an offensive weapon. It cannot easily assume, or efficiently discharge, the defensive role. This is because there is no possibility of setting up impassable barriers in the air: there are no points of support, such as rivers, mountains and fortifications may afford on the ground; there is no means of canalizing the enemy advance into defiles. The possibilities of evasion are enormous when war is fought in three dimensions. But air power cannot hold territory, nor is it capable of continuous effort because of limitations of carrying power and time of flight. It cannot, by reason of its limitations, prove decisive by itself.

Air power does not defend well against air power; the best defence against the bomber is the anti-aircraft gun and its appurtenances, the civilian defense measures lumped under the heading of "air raid precautions," and the dispersion of targets—of munition factories, railway centres, and the like. That—and one's own bombers used remorselessly in reprisal.

It is here that the French air force was found wanting. In September 1938 the German air force represented a grave threat to France, the French air force, a much less formidable threat to Germany. French inferiority in the air was due to internal political, social and financial causes, and to bureaucratic inefficiency.

French military policy after Munich, to sum up, may be expected to turn to the following objectives:

(1) Increase of the rate of airplane production.

*Foreign Policy Report.

(2) Abatement of the Spanish threat, to remove fears of Italian or German strategic footholds in Spain or its possessions.

(3) Closer relations with Britain, France's one remaining ally.

(4) Increase of the navy.

(5) Improvement and extension of the fortified lines on the east and north.

France stands all but alone today, certainly alone on the Continent. It still has the most formidable and best army in Europe, an army which derives much of its strength from the fact that, for sixty years, it has annually added a class of conscripts from whom have been selected officer-candidates, non-commissioned officer-candidates, and the personnel of the permanent specialist cadres, year after year, also, a fresh class of cadets has entered the military schools from which half of France's officers are drawn, the other half coming from the ranks. This process still continues. While France possesses such an army, whether isolated or not, its word will have weight in the military councils of Europe.

THE CRIMINAL TRIBES ACT.

Of all the galling instruments used to curtail the civil liberties of the Indian people, the Criminal Tribes Act has been the worst. The indignities to which the Act puts all those who are so unfortunate as to come under its clutches, amount to their virtual enslavement. In Madras, for example, all the thousands of people belonging to some particular tribes have indiscriminately registered as Criminals who have not only to render forced labour to the meanest official, but have to take out passes to go out of their villages even to earn their livelihood. The conditions imposed on them by the Act have been making a hell of the lives, all the more because the public have not been aware of the harm that the operation of the Act has caused. These, however, have now come to light, so much so, that the Act has earned a severe condemnation by every influential opinion and high judicial authority, with the result that the National Congress at its Faizpur session, declared in favour of repeal of the Act as it is "A menace to peaceful citizens," and further, this Act as well as the Foreigners Act are applied to political prisoners.

We are now informed that the Madras Government has decided to repeal the Act as such, only retaining powers to deal with the wandering groups and habitual offenders of dangerous character by enacting two separate laws for the purpose. The Premier of Sindh, in reply to a motion in the local Assembly last year for repeal of the Act, promised to do the needful. Informal assurances to the same effect have been received so far from some other Provincial Premiers and native States. To-day, there seems to be a general recognition that the Act, which has been rightly characterised by Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru as 'monstrous,' should not be allowed to disgrace the Statute Book any longer.

It does not, however, appear to have been sufficiently realised in Bengal, that the Act in this place has often been used against political workers, though it is never meant for them. This has been possible because, use of the Act is, under the provisions of the law, a matter of executive discretion, against which no appeal to the judiciary lies. It was similarly misused in the province of Bihar, until the Congress Government took steps to remedy the wrong. In the province of Bengal a large number of Congress and peasant workers, even men of education and culture, have been penalised under the Act. It has been applied even against a member of the Legislative Assembly. It is high time that opinion against this state of things should be mobilized and even expressions at the All-India Criminal Tribes Conference which is proposed to be held at Tripuri at the time of ensuing Congress session.

We, therefore, earnestly appeal to the public to realise the urgent importance of the matter, help us with their suggestions and information about the persons victimized under the Act, and render all possible assistance to launch an organised movement for the purpose. MUSLIM WOMEN'S MARRIAGE DISSOLUTION BILL.

The Report of the select committee on the Muslim Women's Marriage Dissolution Bill was submitted to the Central Legislative Assembly.

Among the changes made by the committee, Clause II of the amended bill replaces Clauses 2, 3, and 4 of the bill referred to the committee. The opening words apply the clause to any woman married under Muslim law, even though she may not herself profess Islam. The references to the various schools of law have been omitted and the grounds made general in the belief that they will prove acceptable to all. The grounds set out in the bill referred to the committee have been thoroughly overhauled and recast in the interests of greater precision, and certain contingent provisions have been added by way of provisos.

Notes have been appended by Dr. G. V. Deshmukh, Mr. Asaf Ali and Bhai Parmanand.

Mr. Asaf Ali, in his note, expresses satisfaction at the form in which the bill has been amended and supports the bill as it has emerged from the select committee. His main objection was that, although a Muslim woman's conversion to another faith shall not by itself be a ground for dissolution of marriage, the reconversion of a wife to her original faith shall by itself operate as an automatic dissolution of marriage. This objection has been met with in the amended bill as it has emerged from the select committee.

Dr. G. V. Deshmukh, in his note, congratulates the Muslim members of the select committee on bringing forward 'a liberal and just piece of legislation' and supports the bill as it has emerged from the select committee.

Bhai Parmanand, in his note of dissent, says:—

'In my opinion Clause 4 of the bill, which in a modified form is the original Clause 5, is altogether redundant and no longer required. It cannot be denied that the renunciation of Islam by a married Muslim women and her conversion to a faith other than Islam was so far the only legal remedy left to her to get a dissolution of marriage. This remedy has been sanctified by long usage and accepted by the various High Courts of India.....

'I think, however, that Muslim legislators are perfectly entitled to reform and make a change in their religious rites and customs, but they should clearly assert it and have substantial grounds for such a change and at the same time they should not upset the old foundations altogether. My view therefore, is that while abolishing apostasy as the only cause of dissolution of marriage, they should at least put apostasy as one of the main grounds of getting divorce along with the 19 fresh grounds as given in Clause II.

'I wish to add one more point. During the debates on the bill it was urged that the renunciation of Islam was in most cases not genuine and that it was only a device adopted by Muslim women to get rid of undesirable husbands, and that therefore the object of the original clause 5 was to put an end to this evil practice. Accepting this view to be correct, it gives us a sufficient ground to believe that genuine abjuration of Islam cannot but be followed by the dissolution of marriage and this, I think, is a very substantial reason for either o nitting Clause 4 from the bill altogether or at least putting apostasy as the main ground for getting divorce.'

CHRISTIANITY AND ANTI-SEMITISM.*

In the January issue of the Jewish Tribune, we lifted an editorial under the above caption from the Indian Social Reformer wherein it was stated that one of the main reasons for hatred to Jews is due to the fact that "every Christain child is taught from its infancy to hate the Jew as belonging to the race which killed Jesus Christ."

We have received a letter from a correspondent who describes himself as a "staunch Christian and a lover of the Jewish people" advising us against publishing any thing that is likely to hurt the religious feelings of others, especially at a time when world Jewry is meeting with so much persecution. Our correspondent believes that by publishing anything of this nature, we are likely to disturb the feelings of our Christian neighbours. We feel that our correspondent errs in this respect as nothing could tend towards a better understanding than a frank and hearty discussion that is not tinted with any malice or does not lead towards bad feeling.

Jews more than anybody else are in a position to state the repercussions that are brought about as a result of the Bible narrative regarding the crucifixion of Christ.

Replying to one of the letters that appeared in the 21st January issue of the Indian Social Reformer, the editor of the Reformer states that "there has grown up a considerable volume of opinion in favour of the belief that Jews was crucified not for his heresy from orthodox Judaism but for sedition against the Roman power." We would like to assure Mr. Harry W. Tilsanka, the author of one of the letters to the Reformer, that Jews have the highest opinion of Christ.

Alas, the Christian—Jewish tragedy is one of the crying disgraces of our times! It has been truly said that more blood has been shed in the name of religion. Provided there is tolerance and broadmindedness, Jews can live in perfect harmony and on the best of terms with their Christian neighbours. This has been proved time and again. One of the causes of anti-Semitism can be traced to the fact that Jews have been accused from time immemorial of having crucified Christ. This teaching has created a deep hatred which shows itself from time to time. The following extract from the Preface to his new book, "The Christian—Jewish Tragedy," by Conrad Henry Moehlman, Ph. D., D. D., will be found of unusual interest: "Critical methods demonstrated beyond all contradiction that our gospels are ancient historical documents containing all the faults of such docu ments. The synoptic accounts of the trial and crucifixion of Jesus do not agree the one with the other. No one can bridge the chasm between the differing synoptic narratives on the one hand and the Johannine portrait on the other. All of the New Testament descriptions of the tragedy of Passion have undergone serious modification and expansion. Our Christian text books do not tell what happened in Jerusalem nineteen centuries ago. The Jews still possessed the right to try and execute persons transgressing their religious laws. The Jews did not crucify, they stoned or decapitated for blasphemy. The Roman procurator Pontius Pilate because of popular tumult and revolutionary tendencies among the followers of Jews (sic) interested (sic) and condemned Jesus on the charge of sedition. For decades after Calvary, Jerusalem Jews and Christians got along rather well together."

Husband, in his Persecution of the Jews, concludes that, "Jewish courts did not possess jurisdiction in criminal cases after Judea became a Roman Province."

The Indian Christian Weekly, the Guardian of Madras appeals to the World Missionary Conference to bring about a change in presenting the crucifixion story.

THE JEWS AND JESUS

The Editor,
The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

I read with interest the Indian Social Reformer but I am surprised at the statement in the December 17th issue, page 243 ".....every Christian child is taught from its infancy to hate the Jews as belonging to the race which killed Jesus Christ....."

Of course, this is grossly untrue as you must know. One is inclined to think that it crept into the article (entitled "A suggestion for the World Missionary Conference") by some strange slip of the pen. The fact is that Christian children almost universally are taught that Jews are God's Chosen people. It is unfortunately the case that many who call themselves Christians do not have that love for the Jews that should characterize followers of Jews who was himself a Jew. In the congregation in this city of which I am a member, we recently had an address by Rabbi Eisendrath who is very highly esteemed in this country. His congregation had recently built a fine temple in our neighbourhood and the Official Board of our congregation had sent them a message of warm welcome to the community on the occasion of their opening service. In his lecture to us the Rabbi expressed the great delight of his people having received greetings from us and other bodies in our party of the city.

You mention "Jesus was crucified by the order of the Roman Governor." Every intelligent person knows this; no Christian that I have ever met thinks of the Jews as having tried or condemned Jesus to death, even though certain of their leaders were quite willing that he should be found guilty and crucified.

Toronto,
January 19, 1939.

Yours, etc.
A. E. ARMSTRONG.

[We have answered this objection more than once. The Bible story of the Crucifixion fastens the guilt upon the Jews. This, every Christian child reads, and the early impression produced in many cases, is not wiped out, by sermons from Sunday pulpits. Otherwise why is there so much anti-semitism in almost all Christian countries, which is totally absent in non-Christian lands where Jews have been settled for centuries?—Ed., I. S. R.]

TANGANYIKA.*

An important conference of the area representatives of the Tanganyika League was held in Nairobi. It was attended by people from neighbouring territories and is reported to be the largest interterritorial gathering ever held in East Africa. The Conference was called for the purpose of deciding on the future policy of the League and to set up a strong and representative Central Council to carry on the League's work. The opportunity was taken to present to the Conference the report of the activities of the League by Major Cavendish-Bentinck, the chief organiser and the real force behind the League.

The Conference discussed the future policy of the League behind closed doors and hence unless a communique is issued it is difficult to say what that policy is. In any case there could be no fear about the principle of opposition to the cession of Tanganyika to Germany. Indian representatives were present at this conference, but their number was very small and we think large number of Indian representation is necessary. The League organisers may well arrange such representation next time if they did not want to create an impression abroad that after the first purpose was served they did not need Indians any further. On their part Indians must also join the League in large numbers and take active interest in its work. We do not know what discussions took place in the Conference or what decisions were taken but we hope the organisers will see that the League does not indulge into activities beyond the main object for which it is formed. Any effort to deal with such questions as future constitutional relations between Tanganyika and Kenya and Uganda will lead to immediate disruption of the League. Its main objective is to secure Tanganyika for Britain and once that aim is achieved it should be dissolved.

There is already a strongly organised Indian opinion definitely and unanimously opposed to any return of Tanganyika to Germany. What Sardar's visit will do is to cement it still further and remove for ever any doubt which some of us may have about it. Therefore, if one takes a narrow view of the visit one may say that sacrifice of time by so important a man as Sardar Patel is not worth the work he may do here. But that is not so. The visit must be looked upon from the viewpoint of the personal knowledge which such a man will have of the position of Tanganyika in East Africa and the conditions in which his fellow-countrymen are living here.

RAJAGRIHA FINDS.

A Monograph on "Rajagriha in Ancient Literature" is issued by the Archaeological Survey of India, based upon a critical study of various ancient texts. The author is Dr. B. C. Law.

One of the most wonderful cities of ancient India, which goes back to the days of the Buddha and continues to be a place of pilgrimage and a health resort even to the present day, the indentification of Rajagriha, still known as Rajgir, is rendered easy by the configuration of the hills by which it is surrounded, the other name of the town being Girivraja, or mountain fastness. The Mahabharata mentions Rajagrih as the capital of King Jarasandha, and as the place was hallowed by the presence of the Great Master, it is frequently mentioned in Buddhist literature. Modern excavations have been particularly fruitful at Rajgir and there is, it is said, ample scope for research at this most ancient historical city.

Details are given in the publication of the various names by which the ancient city of Rajagriha was known and their significance as also of the topography of the various sites in and around the city and of the hot springs, the bamboo forest, the mango grove of Jivaka, the Sattapanni cave and other places associated with incidents in the life of the Buddha and the history of Buddhism. The importance of Rajagraha in the religious and cultural history of India is brought out and in particular it is shown how from the earliest times Rajagriha was a notable centre of Naga worship—a conclusion confirmed by the recent discoveries of the Archaeological Department.

The identification of the five hills that enclose the city has always been a matter of some difficulty and confusion owing to the contradictory writings in different periods. A satisfactory solution is now given of the problem in the Monograph.

DR. TAGORE ON SANTINIKETAN.

Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru performed the opening ceremony of Hindi Bhawan before a large and distinguished gathering last week. After a reception in the traditional Indian style, Dr. Tagore spoke a few words welcoming Pandit Nehru and other invited guests. He said: "It had been my earnest desire to have in this Ashrama a sort of confluence where streams of different cultures could meet together. Apathy of the rich people of our country and our own poverty has so long been preventing us from achieving that wish. It is therefore my very great pleasure to welcome those friends whose munificence had been instrumental in establishing this shrine of learning dedicated to the culture of one of the greatest languages of our land. I am sure that the beginning of Hindi Bhawan, however humble it be, will presage a growth which will be rich and fruitful."

NOTES.

Anglo-Indians' Future :—Sir George Anderson, a late Commissioner of Education with the Government of India, wisely declared at the outset of the paper which he read before a joint meeting of the East India Association and the Overseas League, London, that it was beyond his scope that day to speak about the Anglo-Indian community. But the Archbishop of Canterbury who presided, was not equally circumspect. His Grace prefaced his introductory observations with a hasty sketch of the history and antecedents of the community which brought out the imperialistic Christianity of which he has given many indications in the recent crises in world affairs. Recounting the early services of Anglo-Indians, the Archbishop said that they were foremost in fighting under Clive and that "they gave a signal instance of their loyalty to the British Crown when the great Mahratta conspiracy broke out at the end of the eighteenth century." He mentioned the part they played in the great "Mutiny" in the middle of the nineteenth century, and that practically every available man of them entered in the service of the Empire in the days of the Great War. Clive's armies were largely composed of Indians and "the black commandant" often led European troops in the battlefied. There was no discrimination against colour in the days when the British were struggling to get a foothold in the country. Why does the Archbishop refer to the Mahratta opposition to the British in the end of the eighteenth century as a "conspiracy?" The Mahrattas were the rulers of the country and they had every right to fight the alien power which sought to deprive them of their sovreignty. If the Archbishop is in touch with recent events in India, he would have realised the unwisdom of making even a passing reference to the "Mutiny." The British Government banned the production of a film depicting an episode of the Mutiny as likely to revive memories which were better effaced. The Indian Legislative Assembly at last session adopted without division a motion for adjournment as a protest against a reference to those who fought against Government as "mutineers." Indian speakers claimed it was a national revolt the leaders of which were national heroes in the same sense as Bruce and Wallace in the Archbishop's native Scotland. The Archbishop did no service to Anglo-Indians by his ill-informed excursions into Indian history. Especially inopportune are the Archbishop's references when thoughtful Anglo-Indian leaders are impressing on their community its duty to think in terms of Indian nationalism. Sir Henry Gidney himself has often done this of late years. But he is not the man to let the Englishman dodge his responsibilities towards his people. He demanded at the meeting that the British Government should endow the Anglo-Indian community to make up for the loss of Government patronage in India consequent on the introduction of provincial autonomy. Lord Hailey who made the best speech of the evening, bluntly told Sir Henry Gidney that the British Parliament was unlikely to comply with his demand. He advised Anglo-Indians to stand on their own feet and to adapt themselves to the new conditions in this country. If they played their part manfully he saw no reason why they should not fare as well as the other inhabitants of this country under a national regime. He regarded the preference shown to Anglo-Indians in the past as a disservice done to them because they prevented them from working for their own uplift.

The Right Policy :—It is curious as showing the continuity of thought which has made the Indian Civil Service "the steel frame," as Mr. Lloyd George called it, of the Indian administration that Lord Hailey's observations were almost a paraphrase of those written by Sir Thomas Munro more than a century ago on the right policy to be followed for the benefit of the then young Anglo-Indian community. Munro wrote in a despatch to the Court of Directors who had proposed to give bonuses to the wives and children of Englishmen who married and settled in the country :

> It is easy to appeal to humanity; but it is often the harsh duty of Government to resist its call, and never was it more so than on the present occasion. If we leave the half-caste people to themselves, they will go on as they have done for the last forty years, increasing slowly, according to their means of subsistence. They will seek employment as servants, mechanics, shop-keepers, and merchants in the towns and villages on the sea-coast. When there is no longer room for them there, succeeding generations will be forced to look for a subsistence as bullock-men, peons, labourers, and ryots. This is what has happened to the descendants of the Portuguese on the west coast, and there is no reason why the same thing should not happen to the descendants of English soldiers, if it be not prevented by imprudent interference.

Mr. Littlehailes, who succeeded Sir George Anderson as Education Commissioner with the Government of India, advised Anglo-Indians to give up thinking that there was any humiliation in learning the Indian languages, and to send their children to the schools and colleges open to all classes. Collecting a few thousand pounds for the upkeep of special schools for Anglo-Indians, is, as Sir Henry Gidney said, merely a speck as compared to the resources needed to cope with the entire problem. What chance is there of larger sums being raised? The Archbishop himself feels that the refugees problem in Europe has greater claims on the British people and that their needs are very large and pressing. If the British took their responsibilities to Anglo-Indians seriously, it is the easiest thing for them to take the lakh and a half of them into Britain or the Dominions. The Rev. A. E. Scipio, Headmaster of an Anglo-Indian High School in Bangalore, mentioned some cases in which his boys with the help of scholarships from a fund which he has raised by contributions from the teachers and old boys, were able to continue their studies in England where they settled down in good positions. He said that there were many statements in the paper read and the speeches made at the meeting which he could "draw swords against." He pleaded for funds to establish and maintain more orphanages with "ever-open door, where the children who have been bereaved of their parents or have been cruelly treated by their parent and are in a state of starvation, are able to be accepted instead of meeting the reply we so often meet, 'There is no room. The orphanages are full'." These orphanages, he added, are needed to receive and rescue children from a life of shame and degradation. Cedric Dover in his "Half Caste" drew a harrowing picture of treatment meted out to the off spring of mixed unions by the White races and sought to rally them all to the slogan "Half castes of the World, unite." It was a desperate cry wrung out of a bitter heart. Whatever might have been the case in the past, there is no prejudice against Anglo-Indians in India. Young Anglo-Indians are taking their place in national movements and the situation is altogether more hopeful for them than some of the speakers for propaganda purpose represented it to be.

The Rajkot Imbroglio :—The public have now before it the correspondence in the shortlived Rajkot revolution between the Thakore and Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel, between Mr. Patel and Sir P. Cadell, Gandhiji's statement thereon and the Government of India's communique dealing with Gandhiji's demand that the Government should interfere and call upon the Thakore to carry out his undertaking to Sardar Patel. It will be difficult for the impartial historian perusing these documents, say, fifty years hence, to conclude that the Sardar or Gandhiji comes out best in this controversy. It will be equally difficult for him to avoid concluding that Sir Patrick Cadell is the one party in the correspondence who has acted with perfect candour and loyalty to the Thakore Sahib who engaged him as Chief Minister. The Thakore Sahib avows that his object in taking on Sir Patrick was that he should put down the agitation of his subjects. Sir Patrick Cadell when he came into office and looked into the grievances of the people, found that there were just causes for them and that the Thakore Sahib, his master, has been very neglectful in the discharge of his duties as ruler of the State. He told the Thakore Sahib this and exhorted him to devote more attention to the affairs of the State and be more accessible to his subjects. The Thakore did not like this plain speaking. He, in fact, resented it and dispensed with the Dewan's services on the plea that so long as he was in Rajkot the people will look up to him and not to himself, their ruler, as the fountain of power. The Resident had to intervene at this stage and to remind the Thakore that the Government of India had approved of the appointment of Sir Patrick on the distinct understanding that it will last for a term of not less than six months. The Thakore, thereupon, withdrew his order. At the same time he opened negotiations with Sardar Patel and he reached an agreement with him apparently without the knowledge and certainly without the consent of his responsible Minister. This agreement enabled him to oust Sir Patrick from his office and to bring back the old Dewan. The Thakore rejected some of the Sardar's nominees to the Committee on constitutional reform and appointed others on the ground that minority rights were ignored by the Sardar. Gandhiji at this stage came out with his call on the Government of India to compel the Thakore to accept the Sardar's nominees. That Government, to be fair, has shown itself willing to help him whenever it can as in the Orissa Governorship. But it has to maintain appearances at least in its dealings with States. The call made upon it to overrule the Thakore, argued Gandhiji, was not a call for intervention. We do not know what else it is. The Government has in a closely reasoned statement shown that it cannot possibly comply with Gandhiji's invitation, much as it would have been happy to do so could it have done so. We must record our emphatic protest against the venerable and venerated person of face the fact that its day of absolute power is over. If it cannot reconcile itself to sharing its control with the Leftists, it will have to bring about a trial of strength before the Tripuri Congress meets next month. Gandhiji has emerged out of his position as adviser to the Congress in general to lead the right wing of the party. What he says in a statement he has now issued, is in effect that, unless Mr. Bose continues the policies initiated by Gandhiji, the right wing will find it impossible to co-operate with the President. Mr. Kripalani, General Secretary of the Congress, goes a step farther. He calls on Mr. Bose to form an all Left Working Committee and carry out his own programme. Mr. Bose has won the presidential contest but that is not even half the battle. From the provincial committees to the provincial ministries the Congress right wing is in complete control. In the Indian States, the leadership of political agitation is in their hands. It will take more than a year to shake them from the controlling position and Mr. Bose's second term is a brief twelve months. We may look for a greater representation on the Working Committee of the radical Socialist party after Tripuri. Mr. Bose's supporters will demand it of him. But he can be compelled by the power of the right wing to keep that representation below an absolute majority. In view of these facts, there can be only three possible reasons for the right wing attitude towards a radical who is Congress President not on their sufferance but on the votes of the party. It might be actuated by a desire to intimidate Mr. Bose into submission. This would be the attempt of a caucus to dictate to an elected leader and only Mr. Bose can deal with it. The man who successfully challenged the prerogative of the right wing heirarchy to nominate the President, can only submit now by destroying his own following and setting back the cause of the radicals in the Congress. There is also the personal element. Mr. Bose knows, from the example of Dr. Khare, the Congress punishment meted out to those who weaken after a first defiance. In as much as he was one of the instruments of the heirarchy, Mr. Bose knows this from the inside. Gandhiji's retreat might be perhaps the result of pique at Mr. Bose's successful exposure of the right wing control of the Presidentship and of the President. On the other hand, it might be a strategic retreat designed to rally the elements which dread Socialism like a plague. The right wing leaders know only too well, none better, the wide gap that exists between promise and performance. But it suits them now to take Mr. Bose at his word and isolate him. Whichever of the three explanations one accepts, it is clear that Mr. Bose cannot except loyalty from orthodox Congress leaders. The supremacy of the Right has been broken by the success of Mr. Bose. Neither the country nor the Left wing itself is ready for a supremacy of the Left. Mr. Bose faces a difficult situation. Under his second Presidentship the Congress enters on a new political phase, the most important of which is the secularization of politics. Mr. Bose has a definite policy in economics, in politics and in international relations. And on none of them can he claim, nor to do him justice does he claim, the moral and religious support of Gandhiji's prestige. Whatever the fate of the Congress under Mr. Bose's guidance, the country has gained in so far as questions of policy will be judged on their merits alone free from the fog of political and economic mysticism. That is a great service which the Congress President has incidentally rendered to India.

PROFESSORS ON FEDERATION.

The views of politicians and political parties on Federation have been widely advertised. Not so those of men whose interest in the question is wholly or predominantly intellectual. We have had three pronouncements recently of this type. Sir S. Radhakrishnan contributed to the Indian World of Bombay an article in which he touched on Federation. After pointing out that the Federal part of the new constitution suffers from some grave defects such as the association of the States with provinces, safeguards to protect British interests, and the reservation of army and external affairs, Sir Sarvapalli briefly indicated the different attitudes of Indian public men towards it. One section would trust the Princes who, after all, were also Indians, not to obstruct the political progress of the country by mis-using their representation in the Federal Legislature; as regards safeguards, an assurance might be got that they would not be used in regard to the constitutional activities of the Federal Ministers. The reservation of subjects might be eliminated by steady pressure being applied to the British Government. These may be described as the optimists. Another section felt that already the power of the popular representatives has got reduced and if they compromised on Federation they would be strengthening the hands of British Imperialism. It was high time that they severed their connection with Britain and set up a social democracy. In between, Sir Sarvapalli added, stood, Gandhiji who declared in February 1937 that if Dominion Status according to the Statute of Westminister were offered him, he would wholeheartedly accept it. "There is no reason to think," Sir Sarvapalli added, "that he has changed his opinion. Whether the section represented by Gandhiji would win or others would, depended not on Indians but entirely on the British." Sir Sarvapalli told the British publicists whom he met during his stay in Oxford last year:

> Today in India there is at the head of the movement a leader and a saint, and he demands only Dominion Status—the substance of Independence. It is just; it is expedient. It is inevitable sooner or later. It is bound to come. History is for it and the forces of the world are with it. A European crisis will precipitate it.

The first section, those who would work the Federation trusting to the Indian patriotism of the Princes, has had two influential supporters in Mr. S. P. Rajagopala Charya, lately first member of the Mysore Government, and Mr. C. R. Reddy, Vice-Chancellor of Andhra University, who, some years ago also held the high office of Director of Education in Mysore. Both of them speak with inner knowledge of the motive forces in the important Indian States. Their confidence is shared by many who have had occasion to speak on the subject to Princes and Ministers in some other States. There are, to be sure, States which fall far short of the standards of Mysore and other progressive States. But what has been possible in these States is possible in other states as well. In contact with the progressive States the less progressive ones are bound to accelerate their pace. In fact, the bigger progressive States on whose assistance the smaller ones are beginning to rely, can bring pressure to bring on them or, if they are recalcitrant, refuse to co-operate with them. The lumping together of all States as feudal is unfair and it is resented. Some of them are administered with as much regard to constitutional proprieties as the British Indian provinces. And it is pointed out that to allay the fears and suspicions of British India, the States will adopt a convention that their representatives will not participate in discussions on purely British Indian questions and will not take part in the voting on them. It is further pointed out that the Federal subjects on the whole are such that the interests of the States in them are identical with those of British India. It is further urged that Federation offers the only means whereby States having armies of their own can be brought in accord with the general plan of Indian Defence. The Independence school does not try to meet any of these arguments. It brushes them aside impatiently with the vague assurance that they will all be settled after the attainment of Independence. Czechislovokia thought likewise but it was not able to maintain its independence for twenty years though its problems were much less in magnitude and complexity than ours. The Independence school also requires the sacrifice immediately of civil freedom as the price of future and problematic political independence.

Sir Sarvapalli describes Gandhiji's position as being in between these two sections. He cites an assurance given two years ago by Gandhiji that he would be satisfied with Dominion Status under the Westminister statute. Sir Sarvapalli thinks that he has no reason to believe that Gandhiji has changed his opinion during the last two years. His attitude towards the States has certainly changed in this period. Probably he has realised that Dominion Status can not be claimed by British India alone and that the States must, therefore, be brought into the picture along with British India. This may account, for, what otherwise is unaccountable, his sudden resolve to support movements for full responsible government not only in the advanced States but also in the medieval States of Kathiawar and Rajputana. He wants them in the Federation but first they must assume the habiliments of representative responsible government.

Dr. Ambedkar delivered a three hour address at the Servants of India Society at Poona last week on Federation. He is more an intellectual than a politician. At any rate his political views are illuminated by intellectual insight and in this he stands out of the common run of present-day Indian politicians. Dr. Ambedkar devoted a part of his address to showing that the term "Federation" can not be properly applied to the loose combination of autonomous provinces and autocratic States. He thought that the more proper term would be "Confederacy." Even Confederacy implies a similarity of constitutions among the confederates. We think that the old word "Empire" exactly suits our case and might be retained with advantage. It is a term which is well understood by the Indian masses. As Professor Radha Kumud Mukherji observed in his address at Andhra University on "Ancient Hindu Imperialism" (Reformer, January 21) it was felt from ancient times that a multitude of kings was not conducive to a stable political equilibrium and that what was required for the stability of the political system was a kind of united domination. Imperialism in our day has acquired an opprobrious significance which does not belong to it. What is now condemned as Imperialism is more properly "Colonialism" having for its main object economic exploitation. Under the aegis of an Empire there is room for a great variety of social and political organisations. The Imperialism of India stood for religious toleration and racial integrity. In view of the difficulties of bringing the great variety of Indian States into a Federation, we had suggested the Federation immediately of British provinces. We should have preferred that the provincial autonomy part of the Government of India Act should have been held in abeyance pending Federation. But as it has been introduced the next best thing is to reunite British India in the only way now possible. We are glad that Dr. Ambedkar also favours the idea. He threw out the suggestion that the smaller States which can not be converted into economically self-sufficient units should be thrown together and created into provinces, their rulers being pensioned off. This may be the ultimate destiny of these States but it must be left to be achieved by the march of events. If, as we suggest, the name of Empire is retained this is not a matter of urgency. As regards the larger States, a closer economic union between them and the provinces and also a more compact system of defence can be devised without infringing on their independence and integrity. There is no need to go in search of an Emperor as we have already one in the person of the British sovereign who is also king of each of the Dominions which will at no distant date adopt for themselves the name of Kingdoms.

KASHMIR AND TAMIL SAIVISM.

The Adyar Library has brought out an excellent edition of the handbook of Kashmir Saivism, entitled Pratyabhijnyanahridayam, the Secret of Recognition, with the Sanskrit text and an authorised English translation by Dr. Kurt F. Leidecker, based upon the German translation of the work by Dr. Emil Baer. In his introduction the learned editor points out that this work is one of two compendiums which are used to this day as religious text-books and catechisms among believers in Kashmir. He adds, as testifying to the esteem in which the book is held among Southern Saivites, that two editions of it were published in Madras, one with a Tamil and the other with a Telugu translation. The work consists of 20 sutras into which are condensed much abtruse philosophy. The author is Rajanaka Kshemaraja, pupil of Abhinavagupta who flourished in the second half of the ninth century, known as the founder of Kashmir Saivism. The other great school of Saivism developed in the extreme south, in the Tamil country, and came to be known as Saiva Siddhanta. In a learned and interesting note prefixed to this edition of the Pratyabhijnyanahridayam, Mr. S. S. Suryanarayana Sastri, compares and contrasts the Kashmir and the Tamil schools of Saivism. "Between the idealist non-dualist school Saivism developed in Kashmir," he writes, "and the realist pluralist Saiva doctrine that has grown in South India, there is considerable agreement in externals, but differences in fundamentals." The differences are doctrinal and abstruse and do not interest the layman. Both the schools are based on the Agamas. The question of interest to the historian of Indian thought, is, where were these Agamas originally composed and what is the relation between the two schools at either extreme end of the country. Western scholars wedded to the idea that Indian culture and civilisation went from the north to the south —this itself is the corollary to their inveterate belief that culture and civilisation was imported into India through the north-western passes—have inclined to the view that South Indian Saivism was influenced by Kashmir Saivism, though they have not been able to trace the channel by which it was conducted to the South. Macnicol in his "Indian Theism" quotes Dr. L. D. Barnett's theory that the theological ideas of the north "following the natural geographical route, filtered down southwards." Macnicol also quotes the same authority as stating that the teaching of Abhinavagupta was "in all essentials identical with the orthodox siddhanta of the Dravidian south." This identity rather suggests that if there was interchange of ideas between Kashmir and Dravida, it was from the south to the north. A reference to dates makes this clear. Abhinavagupta's date is fixed as the second half of the ninth century by the nearly contemporary testimony of Kalhana in "Rajatarangini." Southern Saivism was developed, if not finally settled, in the sixth century, according to the testimony of inscriptions found in Conjeevaram. The Ceylon Christian Tamil scholar, Mr. Isaac Tambiah, in his extremely interesting and learned introduction to his English translation of the Psalms of the Saiva saint, Thayumanavar, deals with this point in a convincing manner. He writes:

> Saivism, whether of Kashmir or of South India, is built upon the books known as Agamas. This is an admitted fact. Now, the earliest Tamil religious writer who mentions the Agamas is Tirumular and Tirumular's age is certainly prior to the ninth Christian century. How long prior to the ninth century? This can not be answered with much sureness of conviction, but it may be noted that he has been placed in the first century after Christ. Greater sureness attaches to the statement that Tiru Gnana Sambhandar who flourished after Tirumular belongs to the sixth Christian century. The Agamas, and Saivism based on the Agamas, did not orginate with Tirumular; their existence is anterior to Tirumular's time, anterior to the sixth century A. D. at the least. Indeed, it is no exaggeration to say that Agamic beliefs may be ascribed to the periods of the Brahmanas. The evidence of inscriptions establishes the fact that Saivism was flourishing in Conjeevaram in the sixth century, and that there were men proficient in the system of the Saiva Siddhanta.

Mr. Tambiah is strongly of opinion that Southern Saivism is of purely Tamil inspiration and origin. If Abhinavagupta's Saivism is identical with Dravidian Saivism, it follows that either Abhinavagupta was a Dravidian who had migrated to Kashmir or a Kashmiri who had studied Saivism in the South, presumably Conjeevaram which was a great centre of religious culture from ancient times. Or he must have studied under some great teacher from the South who visited Kashmir. All these are probabilities. There was more cultural intercourse and understanding between different parts of the country in the old days than now. We can go from one place to another more quickly by the railway, the motor-car or air-craft but the very speed of locomotion militates against any but a superficial knowledge of the people of the places we visit. The old slow means of travel enforced on the traveller as a necessity the study of the manners and customs of the districts through which he passed. Scholars and pilgrims were constantly journeying between North and South. The movement of thought during the Christian era has been from south to north rather than the other way. The great Sankaracharya sojourned for a time in Kashmir. The close affinity between his Monism and Saiva Siddhanta might have influenced the shape which Kashmir Saivism took in the hands of Abhinavagupta. The decline of Hinduism in Kashmir has been attributed to the Mahomedan conquest of the country. But military conquest has never yet killed a religion unless it had already become corrupt and decrepit and only awaited some accident to give the final blow. Saivism grew and flourished in the South because of the great number of saints and poets who rallied to its banner. "No cult in the world," says Dr. Barnett, "has produced a richer devotional literature, or one more instinct with brilliance of imagination, fervour of feeling and grace of expression." There was no similar outcrop of religious genius to uphold the cause of religion in Kashmir.

THE RAMAKRISHNA MISSION IN THE U. S. A.

(By Swami Vishwananda.)

Four of my brother Swamis and a few American friends were anxiously waiting for me at the Pier at New York on April 29. Customs formalities over, a number of press men beseiged me. One of them began to admire my teeth and another my English.

We have a flourishing Vedanta Centre at New York. The Editor of Asia Magazine and the author of the book "Hinduism Invades America," were present at my reception, when I spoke on "The Cultural Heritage of India." I spent a week in New York. To visit New York and not to go to the uppermost point of the Empire State Building is to play Hamlet without the part of the Prince of Denmark. I did go to the highest point and looked around the world below. No wonder the New York cockney feels that he is the topmost man in the world.

From New York I came to Providence. Providence is only forty miles from Boston. Our Boston Centre is situated on the bank of the River Charles and on the other side is the world-famous Harvard University. Harvard is legitimately proud of William James, Royce and Landman, the great Orientalist. I am sure very many Hindus have been nourished on the writings of these three great Americans.

Providence is a nice, small town and our Centre there has been spreading the message of Universal Vedanta for the last decade. The grandson of Sir Lalubhai Samaldas came to visit me at the Providence Centre. I could not help recalling the tall, dignified figure of Sir Lalubhai, who was not only a prominent figure in the business world of India, but also a devout Hindu and a Sanskrit scholar. Men of his type are becoming rare. It gave me great joy to meet the lad, Joyendra, in the New World.

I arrived here in Chicago on the 10th of May. Spring was nearing its end and Summer was starting in. I began my Sunday lectures at the Masonic Temple, but had to close by the middle of June. The universities were all going to be closed for the Summer vacation.

I called on Dr. Hayden, Professor of Comparative Religions of the University of Chicago, and Mr. Woodward, the acting President. Both of them were extremely nice to me. Mr. Woodward, who had seen me in Bombay dressed as a Hindu sannyasin, recognized me at once in my new garb and made many inquiries about the social and educational problems of India.

I spent the Summer in the midst of the woods of Wisconsin. Wisconsin has, I am told, ten thousand lakes. Mrs. Fannie Jones, my hostess, was one of the pioneers of female education in this country. She and her daughters are deeply interested in Oriental philosophy. Her son was a distinguished lawyer of Washington. Her daughter-in-law, grandson and grand-daughter came to spend the Summer, so I had intimate contact with a middle-class, truly cultured American family. Mrs. Jones used to regale me with stories of American life 75 years back. The education of girls was not encouraged much by the elders. People were driven away from the churches before sunset, and the place where we have the fine buildings of the University of Chicago was all wilderness. She was telling me what a commotion it created when her father brought a kerosene lamp for the house.

While I was there I used to ramble alone in the forests and often remembered the lines of Byron, "There is a pleasure in the pathless woods." It was in their forest homes that our forefathers, the builders of Indo-Aryan civilization, the great seers of the Vedic age, turned the searchlight within and discovered the laws of the inner world which are attracting the attention of the savants of the Western hemisphere. A distinguished professor of science told me, "It is the spirit of tolerance of your religion and culture which appeals to me most." I was often reminded of the Himalayas and I wish I could get mountains and snow in Wisconsin to complete the picture.

I returned to Chicago in September and resumed my activities. I sent your letter of introduction to Dr. Braden of North-Western University. He invited me to lunch in the University Club and introduced me to Professor Schaub, head of the Department of Philosophy, and Mr. McGovern author of the book, "To Lhasa in Disguise." He took me round the library. What a joy it was to see the Bombay Chronicle and The Indian Social Reformer on the table!

I visited Dr. Braden twice, sitting in his private room overlooking Lake Michigan, where we discussed the great problems which every thinking man and woman has to confront today. Dr. Braden appreciates very much the universal spirit of Vedanta. Dr. and Mrs. Braden, Professor and Mrs. Schaub, and Mr. and Mrs. McGovern all came to my place for a Hindu dinner. Some of the students of this Vedanta Centre have mastered the art of Hindu cooking and the table was verily "a feast of reason and a flow of soul."

Professor Schaub is a friend of Mr. Das-Gupta, Professor of Philosophy of Calcutta, and has visited India. He has a vital interest in Indian culture and philosophy. He is a strongly built man with a powerful voice, and he is, perhaps, the most interseting of the three—he is a Professor of Political Science and the author of the book, "Mahayanna Buddhism." He is so vital: He told me, "You and I have many things in common. We shall see more of each other." Dr. Braden was telling me about Mrs. Reddy of Madras, Mr. Parekh of Bombay and Mr. Prasad of the Arya Samaj. He has been lately reading the life of Mr. Ranade and has become a great admirer of Mahadev Govind Ranade.

Dr. Alfred Emerson is the head of the Department of Zoology. His sister Gertrude was the Editor of Asia Magazine and has married Mr. Sen of Calcutta. Mr. Sen was a pupil of Sir J. C. Bhose. Lady Bose loved Sen like her own son. It is Mrs. Sen who introduced me to Mr. Somerset Maugham.

Professor Emerson invited me twice to his house to dinner. He is a very loveable gentleman. I particularly admire his sparkling wit. He described the life of the American husband to me in this way, "For the first six years the husband asserts superiority over his wife, for the next six years he tries to have equality, and for the next six years it is a struggle for existence." He has not much attraction for metaphysics and theology and he told me that the theist is like a blind man searching for a black cat in a dark night in a blind alley. He is going to invite shortly Professor Compton, the Nobel Prize winner, and me to his home. His aged father, who is just past 80, is a great scholar and was Professor of Greek and Latin in several universities and knew President Wilson at Princeton. When Professor Emerson, the senior, called on President Wilson at White House, the Professor-President recalled the days when they were freshmen in the University and almost shed tears because his ideals could not be realized.

I have lately become very intimate with Mr. Morris, Professor of Philosophy, at the University of Chicago. He invited me to lunch in the University Club and introduced me to several professors; Dr. McKeon, Dean of the Department of Humanities, and Professor Faris, head of the Department of Sociology, became interested in me. Years back Professor Morris met Tagore in Chicago and was struck by the personality of the poet. He was even planning to join Tagore's University. He is a great admirer of Hindu philosophy, especially of the school of New Logic of Bengal. He is dreaming of visiting India one day.

I was invited to speak to a large audience at International House on "Gandhi, the Saint." The students of the University of Chicago were interested in my lecture on "The Spirit of Hinduism" which I gave at Dean Gilkey's house. There were about a hundred boys and girls and they assailed me with questions.

I had a little Christian influence during the formative period of my life and had my education in a Presbyterian College and spent four years in a hostel where every morning I had to attend Christian prayer. As I take a retrospective view I feel I have gained thereby. It is time we tried to discover the points of excellence in our neighbour's faith instead of asserting the superiority of our own religion. Spirituality and arrogance go ill together. Mrs. Gilkey admired Mr. K. Natarajan's depth of devotion for Christ. Evidently the lecture created a good impression. As a sequel I was invited for a dinner and lecture in the First Presbyterian Church of the city. It was an experience for me to have dinner with four hundred Presbyterians.

The other day I attended one of the sessions of the Oriental Students' Conference at Brent House. There were Chinese, Japanese, Koreans and Hindu students rubbing shoulders and a number of American professors and students too. I met Einstein's niece there, Professor S. L. Joshi, who has been in this country for the past twenty-five years, is very popular among the students and professors. We retired to a corner of the room and discussed many problems of India and America. He was insisting on Mr. Jayakar's coming to this country once. I agreed entirely with him and on going shortly to write to Mr. Jayakar. I am told Dr. Barrows, President of the World's Parliament of Religions, in 1893, was pastor of the Presbyterian Church where I lectured.

This is my first Christmas in Christendom. I am smelling for the last month the fragrance of the Nativity of Christ in every way. The stores and streets are beautifully decorated, crowds of men and women in a mood of festivity go about and exchange greetings. Behind all the merriment and festivity one feels the spirit of Christ. It is the Son of the carpenter, who was born in one corner of a shed in Nazareth, who is dominating the mind of Europe and America. One cannot help recalling the immortal words of Napoleon, "Alexander and Caesar and myself built empires only to have them crumble to dust, but the empire which the Son of the carpenter has built is extending as time is rolling on. Today on the throne of France, tomorrow to be food for worms—such is the man whom the world calls Napoleon the Great."

COMMUNAL MAJORITY AND PARLIAMENTARY MAJORITY.

To the Editor,
The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

I have been trying without effect to get Hindu friends who perceive the truth to speak or write about the enormous political harm that is happening on account of the confusion which has arisen in India between the quite separable ideas of a parliamentary majority and a communal majority. Thanks to the Communal Award, followed by the Harijan fast, both Hindus and Moslems in India have come to imagine that a communal majority has the rights of a Parliamentary majority—forgetting that it is only the right of conquest that could give any vestige of rights to a communal or racial majority—a right which does not exist at present in India either for Hindus or Moslems, and that the whole foundation of parliamentary government is that a minority might become a majority at a future election through the mistakes of the majority, through propaganda, etc.,—which is not the case with a communal majority. The only result of this confusion is resentment and perhaps later on it might lead to civil war.

Theoretically all students admit the difference but, in practice, it is forgotten.

The leader of the local National Congress, (not State Congress), said recently in a speech at this place that because the majority of people in Travancore are Hindus, therefore, when responsible government is established it must be a Hindu government, and that the Christians and Moslems need not fear such a government as their culture would be protected. The same kind of elementary mistake is made in British India, although not so clearly. The Dewan of Travancore knows political science too well to subscribe to this rank heresy—but the result of his notion that the Maharajah is a trustee of the Hindu God is the same. Because I happened to prove in your paper—I think conclusively—that Christians in Travancore have identically the same kind of political rights as the Hindus, in a memorial to the Maharajah signed by over a lakh of Nairs it is alleged that I am one of the Christians trying 'to fix their claws deeper into the devasoms.'

The attempts at mass conversion of Harijans and the counter attempts to prevent it, are admitted even in a leading article in the Hindu to be directly due to the desire to increase voting strength presuming that voting should be largely communal and not based on political convictions. If the ideas advocated by me ten years ago and recently by you——viz., that on account of strong communal prejudices in India, parliamentary majority government is unsuited, and other forms must be adopted,—had prevealed, or if, on the other hand, Mr. S. Sreenivasa Iyengar's notion of completely secularising politics is adopted, these confusions and troubles would tend to disappear. The Moslems will never agree to be treated as a political minority to be protected and safeguarded, simply because they happen to be a communal minority. They have to be treated as equal with rights to decide about the form in which they and Hindus should be governed.

The Bande Mataram controversy is another illustration of this confusion. If Bande Mataram is adopted by a parliamentary majority, like the National Anthem, any minority which objects would nevertheless have to conform. But a majority community has no right to insist that minority communities should conform, whether in assemblies or meetings, or in students' hostels. I am glad that you pointed out the danger to University discipline on account of students dismissed from one University being admitted with open arms by another University; but the above confusion seems unwittingly to have crept into your leader on Bombay Government and Muslim Interest (Reformer January 21). In any public meeting, surely the feelings of minorities should be respected, so long as the song is not a national song—i. e., is not accepted as such by the Parliamentary majority government or any other kind of government. In other cases, even though publicists might not accept St. Paul's advice about not offending the weaker brother in matters not affecting vital principles, they should, I think, look at the future consequences, and advocate any system which would lead to least unpleasantness—because the song is what the majority community approves of and not the parliamentary majority or the government.

It seems to me that Gandhiji and other Hindu leaders misled these Hyderabad students, and have done a lot of needless harm, resulting subsequently in assaults and even deaths. The correct prescription undoubtedly would have been to sing the song when only Hindu students were in attendance, and avoid it when Moslem students objected — whether rationally or irrationally. The reason for the objection is irrelevant.

The same confusion, I fear, is likely to hold up Federation. Hyderabad, for instance, will not agree to parliamentary majority government, which, until ideas clarify or change towards socialism, must be a a predominantly Hindu government. Some other form will have to be devised.

A communal majority government, when it becomes effective, is likely to be even more tyrannous than autocracies, as the autocrat would at least consider his own safety. And besides, as I have repeatedly said, a Hindu or a Moslem sovereign in India is not Defender of the Hindu or Moslem faith as Sir C. P. Ramaswami has very unwisely been stating, but is the supporter of Dharma. I find that this view is completely validated by a scholar of the eminence of Dr. R. K. Mukerjee, "The ruling sovereign in Indian polity was not the King in flesh and blood, the real ideal sovereign was Dharma." (page 332, Reformer 21 st January).

I have already given several illustrations of this truth. A lovely instance came to my notice recently. A Karanavan of a Nambudri Tarawad in the Cochin State recently became a convert to Christianity; and as a convert, had to build a house for his own use. As he and the Maharajah are both what I may call pure Hindus, uncontaminated by later wrong accretions, he went to his King for help and the Maharajah was pleased to grant him a generous timber concession.

"CHRISTIAN" UNTOUCHABLES.

The Editor,
The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

In your issue of the 14th January, 1939 you have commented on the resolution of the Indian Christians Conference relating to the uplift of village Christians. I hope in your usual kindness and courtesy you will give space to a few words I wish to say regarding the important question of principle which you have raised.

I think all Indian Christian leaders know and many non-christian Indians admit with gratification that conversion to Christianity has meant a general all-round raising of status to very large numbers. The representation to the World Missionary Conference in so far as it is genuine, must be regarded as an exceptional case. None will contend that the Church has done all it could, or all that was expected, to those depressed classes who have sought its shelter. During my thirty years association in Christian work I do not know of a single Missionary—Indian or Foreign—who would not put the spiritual and moral redemption in Christ as the primary motive and economic or educational advancement as only incidental. Of course, in the minds of men who have been variously oppressed for centuries the desire for a more comfortable life must be naturally very strong. Every one should have the fullest sympathy with such desire.

Depression is of various kinds—moral and spiritual, social and economic, civic and political. Conversion to Christianity may not, and often does not, lead to the disappearance of all these disabilities. If large numbers of depressed Indians are induced only by material hopes to adopt another religion, it would be good in the interests of all concerned—of peace and good will—if such conversions could be stopped by constitutional means without restricting anyone's free will. Why Christian Indians, who have economic or civic or political disabilities, should not be given the same help by Government to which scheduled castes are entitled passes my understanding. Hindu depressed classes are not specially taken care of because they are Hindu but because they are depressed. There may be, and there are, such backward classes among Christians and Moslems. Conversion to Christianity or Islam has generally given to the depressed classes equality, brotherhood, and opportunity to rise within its own borders. But it cannot compel other communities to recognise them socially or religiously, to whom they remain as untouchable as ever. But as subjects and citizens of the State they are entitled to all civic and political amenities and rights equally with others.

MR. BOSE AND THE CONGRESS.

The Editor,
The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

The fear you expressed in your issue of 17th September 1938 writing about "Mr. Bose explains" has come too true and we have the unedifying spectacle of the Patel-Bose controversy about the Presidential Election.

I wonder, sir, why so much ink has been wasted over so simple a matter. Mr. Bose has clarified the issue in an unimpeachable and unanswerable manner. He is right in demanding an election of the president, pure and unadulterated, in preference to the farce thereof which the Working Committee junta has been enacting with the approval and possibly guidance of Gandhiji.

If I were a Congressman I do not think I should vote for Mr. Bose's re-election. But every one has a right to demand that the President shall be truly and freely elected by the votes of his electorate uninfluenced by any ordinances issued from anywhere with or without Mahatmic guidance or acquiescence. Let there be no mockery of democracy. True democracy is broad-based upon the free exercise by the demos of the birthright to decide who shall manage their affairs by a free and unfettered vote. In so far as this elementary right is denied to the delegates by the uncalled for issue of the Bardoli fatwa, the Congress Junta is in the wrong and as you, in the remarks referred to above, feared Mr. Bose has been "painfully reminded of his condemnation of Dr. Khare."

Khar, 28th Jan., 39. } Yours etc., VEERBAL H. MEHTA.

The Reformer wrote in the article referred to by our correspondent, "A breach between the President and his Congress Cabinet is not inconceivable. We only hope that, if it occurs, President Bose will not be painfully reminded of his condemnation of Dr. Khare as an incompetent man who should never have been premier."—Ed., I. S. R.

A CONFERENCE ABOUT TANGANYIKA.*

The Tanganyika League is holding a conference in Nairobi as we go to press. The proceedings which began yesterday are scheduled to conclude today. Representatives from various parts of East Africa are attending the conference. It is interesting to note that the great bulk of the delegates are Europeans, but that there is a sprinkling of Indians, chief among them being the recently elected President of the E. A. Indian Congress and his secretary, together with two others. The fifth Indian delegate is from Dar-e-salaam ; we understand that he does not bring with him his community's credentials. No Indian centre in East Africa has officially nominated a delegate to the Conference, not even Nairobi where the conference is being held. Out of the five Indian delegates, three are from Nairobi representing the Congress and nominated as liason members before the last session of the Congress, one from Dar-e-salaam and one from Mombasa. We lay great stress on the Indian representation at the Conference because it is essential that the non-Indian public and the authorities should be under no misapprehension about Indian participation in the affairs of the Tanganyika League.

The European representation at the Conference is larger numerically, but not as much East African as it might have been. Rhodesia, which is said to have over 4,000 members of the League, has sent no delegate, neither has Zanzibar nor Nyasaland. Uganda sends only one European delegate.

The conference is essentially European in representation and ideals and is the logical outcome of a series of attempts during a generation to bring East Africa under one control. But it must not be understood that it reflects the views or the wishes of the peoples of East Africa. And among the peoples of these territorries there is that huge native population which has no say in its own destinies. Nor does the conference command the unqualified support of the bulk of the Indian community whose name has unwittingly been mixed up through the rash and impolitic co-operation of a few persons who unfortunately for the community are at present in charge of the Congress.

At the recent session of the Congress the main resolution on Tanganyika purported to support the principle of self-determination for the peoples of East Africa. That was a repetition of the message which the President of the Indian National Congress sent to the distressed Indians in Tanganyika who had appealed to him for help during the weeks following the Munich agreement. The obvious inference which one has to draw from the participation in the Conference of the President of the local Congress and some of his officials is that the Indian community is ever ready to apply the great principles of self-determination for immigrant races, but not to those whose land and resources are under exploitation by those races !

The situation has been complicated, much capital being made out of it by the Europeans, by the report that Sardar Valabhbhai Patel has been induced by Mahatma Gandhi to come to East Africa in order to organise a campaign among Indians against the return of Tanganyika to Germany. We are not sure about the authenticity of the report, but we will not be wrong in our surmise, if the report be correct that the Aga Khan's recently reported visit to Mahatma has, something to do with the Sardar's visit.

The Aga Khan has shown a keen interest in the future of Tanganyika. He has a large spiritual following among Indians in that country and the surrounding territories. His first response to the appeal addressed to him by Tanganyika Indians was that they should seek the assistance of India, not to prevent the return of Tanganyika to Germany, but to ensure that Indians in that territory would get adequate compensation for their landed and other interests in the event of its Geman re-occupation. He appeared at the time to accept the inevitable, for it then seemed inevitable, that Tanganyika should change ownership, after the German triumph in Eastern Europe. But the tide of international events since then changed against Germany, and so did His Highness' appreciation of the actual facts. Soon after his arrival in Bombay a few weeks ago, the Aga Khan expressed himself as opposed to the return of the territory to Germany. His reported visit to the Mahatma followed next.

And now we have the report that a prominent Congressman and leader in India is to come out to East Africa to organise Indians against the return of Tanganyika. As our readers will have known, responsible opinion in India has been reluctant, like Indian opinion here, to express itself against the German claim, and it was not long ago that the President of the Indian National Congress refused to be drawn in the controversy. The Sardar is said to be the virtual dictator of the Congress, but it is difficult to understand how his visit to this country could be undertaken unless the Congress headquarters at Wardha have sanctioned the step over which there must be considerable difference of opinion in non-Congress and even the Congress, circles. The remarkable circumstance connected with the report is that the local Congress headquarters were in the dark about the proposed visit, and that neither the Congress in India nor the Aga Khan have had any exchange of views with the local Congress on an issue of such great importance to Indians in Eeast Africa.

It is yet too early to comment on this further complication created by the Sardar's proposed visit, but it ought to be clear to Congressmen in India that local opinion has settled itself to one clear issue, namely the retention of Tanganyika within the British fold. Indian opinion could not go further than that and if the Sardar's aim is to get Indians in East Africa to agree to that principle, he might spare himself the trouble and the time which the visit will necessitate.

Having made the Indian position on the future of Tanganyika and on the Tanganyika League clear, we await further developments in the matter. One good point about the Conference is that it has an item on its agenda proposing that Colonial Territories and Mandates should be internationalised. It is the one subject on which Indians at the Conference might express themselves dispassionately, for there is an increasing concensus of opinion in India and in Britain that something substantial should be contributed to make peace a live reality. Under a scheme of this kind, India can have a fair share in the distribution of responsibility for East African affairs and a correspondingly greater right to interfere in the interests of its sons settled in these territories.

SYDNEY UNIVERSITY.

The Vice-Chancellor of the Sydney University, Australia, (Mr. T. S. Wallace) in a letter to the Vice-Chancellor of the Patna University, clarifies misunderstanding arising out of a press report in India stating that the Sydney University was prepared to accept students from India and remit the payment of fees. He adds that the announcement was in general terms and was followed by a great many applications from Indian students of all grades for admission into the Sydney University. Since it would not be possible to deal adequately with these personal applications, Mr. Wallace has written to the Vice-Chancellors of the Indian universities setting out the position and seeking their assistance and co-operation in the matter.

Mr. Wallace says :—'The University of Sydney thinking that it can contribute in a small way towards promoting cordial relations between India and Australia, is prepared to grant exemption from fees to three students in any one year from Indian universities who wish to pursue post-graduate study. It is not considered advisable to accept under-graduate students. The departments which in our opinion, offer the best opportunities for Indian students are those of agriculture, economics, veterinary science, tropical medicine, zoology and physics. We should be glad if the students were selected by the universities of India acting either singly or together, preferably together; or perhaps, it would be advantageous if the universities sent forward the names of six candidates from whom we could select three, having in view when we make the final selection here, the subjects which they wish to study and the facilities available.'

While the Sydney University, adds the letter, would be prepared to remit all fees of the students

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

so selected, the students would have to find the cost of their passage to and from Australia and their living expenses during the period of residence.

Proceeding Mr. Wallace says that he has discussed these matters with Dr. Kunzru of the Servants of India Society and a member of the Council of the Allahabad University when he visited Australia recently. Mr. Wallace suggests the formation of a central committee in connexion with the universities of India which might be able to take the matter in hand and arrange matters so that the first three students arrive in Sydney towards the end of February, 1940.

TEMPLES AND HARIJANS.

Last year, the Bombay Legislature passed the Bombay Harijan Temple Worship (Removal of Disabilities) Act which enabled the Trustees of Hindu temples in the Province to decide in favour of allowing Harijans to enter into temples. Enquiries show that as a result of this legislation, more than 33 temples have been thrown open to Harijans in 14 districts of the Province. Information as to the number of temples thrown open all over the Province is being collected and would be published in the next issue.

In this connection it is not out of place to emphasise the fact that a stronger public opinion in favour of Harijans entering temples will hasten the throwing open of more temples for the Harijans.—Public Information.

HARIJANS AND HOTELS.

It might be recalled that the Government of Bombay framed a rule to the effect that no person keeping a place of public entertainment under a license shall refuse admission to such place to any member of the Harijan class, or Scheduled Castes on the Ground of his being a member of such class or castes. In this connection enquiries made show that there are in all 3,586 licensed Hindu hotels in the Province. The number of licenses surrendered to avoid compliance with the new rule about admitting Harijans were 269, no less than 67 of them coming from Bombay Suburban District alone. The number of licenses cancelled for non-compliance with the new rule were 29, 11 of them being from Surat alone. None surrendered their licenses either in Bombay, Ahmedabad or Poona. The number of hotels in these three places alone is above 2,000. 14 of those who either surrendered their licenses or whose licenses were cancelled applied again for grant of licenses under the same rule. Thus it will be seen that the new rule is being complied with, and Harijans are getting admittance to licensed Hindu hotels.—Public Information.

WOMEN AND THE POPULATION PROBLEM.

The population-problem, as a whole, is outside the scope of the Open Door International.

But it is possible that the wishes for an increasing birth-rate in many countries can be a new weapon with which to attack the freedom of women. When the suggestion is that the decrease of population is due to the emancipation of women and particularly their economic freedom, and that the remedy therefore is the impracticable parrot-cry "woman must return to the home," then women are threatened by new attacks on their rights and opportunities of earning a living.

And, too, when other false remedies are found in order to "protect mothers," i. e. by prohibiting them to work for pay before or after childbirth, or by shifting on to the employers heavy burdens—the prohibition of dismissing a woman worker for a certain time before and after childbirth, the ordering of compulsory rest-periods for nursing, etc.—when the population-problem is used to accelerate and widen the false protection of women, and to extend it to women in all sorts of employment—then this population-problem can become a very real danger to women's freedom.

However, in this problem, too, there are bright spots.

In certain countries governmental committees have been established concerning the population problem, and some of these committees have delivered reports, giving very useful argumentations and suggestions.

The Swedish Committee condemned, from the point of view of the declining birth-rate, the policy pursued by certain provincial and communal authorities and by certain large companies, which dismiss their women employees on marriage or on pregnancy. The report from the Danish Committee argues on the same lines. A recently issued supplementary Swedish Report proposes a Bill prohibiting dismissal of employees (men and women) on the ground of marriage and childbirth.

There are new dangers, and we still have to combat this misuse in thought and action of the word "protection." Someone makes a proposal to restrict women's work and calls it "protection." And this proposal becomes a fetish. No intelligent questions are raised, no real investigations are made as to whether the proposal will really be a protection to women workers, but everbody falls down and worships blindly the fetish. Everybody exoept those who have by thought and study come to the policy of the O.D.I. And they, like that child in the fairy tale of Hans Andersen, say "The Emperor has no clothes on."

Yet there is some improvement in the position. a little hint of understanding, here and there, that the problems of the men and women workers are one problem, not two problems: a little hint of understanding that there can be no real progress for the man worker unless there is equality and justice and therefore real progress for the woman worker. It is our task to widen this understanding and to bring home to the men and women of every nation—to Governments, to the I. L. O., the Trade Union movement and the great mass of women workers—industrial, commercial and professional—the value to all men and women and to the whole of the social and economic life of the world of that programme of liberty, equality and justice upon which is founded the Open Door International.

THE TRADITIONAL HOME OF THE SANDALWOOD TREE.

It is in perfumery that the greater proportion of Sandalwood Oil is employed at the present day and to discriminating buyers, such as perfumers and soap manufacturers must of necessity be, it is hardly necessary to extol the virtues of the East Indian Oil which is without equal, both as a fine perfume base and a fixative for the increasingly popular bouquets of the Oriental type. In addition it is now being used extensively, and with marked success, in the creation of some of the more delicate perfumes in which the Sandalwood odour is not required as a predominant character.

A few trials will convince the perfumer who has not taken full advantage of the odour-value of this oil, that is of the greatest use to him, not only for predominant Sandalwood odour where required, but also a modifier and a fixative for other odours. This is true for liquid perfumes, soaps, creams, powders and all other cosmetic preparations. It will be found invaluable to those up-to-date perfumers who pride themselves on their own "creations."

NOTES.

War in Spain :—Barcelona, the stronghold of Republican Spain, has fallen to General Franco's forces. On Thursday, the Spanish Nationalists entered the city and were welcomed by the people of Barcelona with Nationalist flags and songs. The destitution to which the city had been reduced in the past few months was so great that the end of the conflict was in itself a great event. Earlier messages reported the flight of Republican militiamen into France. Hundreds of refugees, women and children, had been sent off across the border. Only those must have stayed behind who felt they could make their peace with the new regime. The fall of Barcelona carries a peculiar lesson. We had all thought that the conflict of ideas was so great between Republican and Nationalist that the two were irreconcilable. Yet the actual change of control in a key city like Barcelona has taken place with, having regard to the conditions, as much order as a parliamentary change of government. The Chinese destroy their cities to prevent the enemy forces from occupying them. The Spaniards seem to hand over their towns whole and intact. And a civil war is always more bitterly fought out and more destructively than a war against foreign aggression. The only inference is that to the Spanish people it does not really matter who rules the State. The contest between Left and Right is over-present in Spain and no war has finally settled the struggle for supremacy. With the fall of Barcelona, the position of Government in Spain becomes decidedly weaker and it will be a question of weeks rather than months before the war ends in a Franco victory. Already the main point of discussion in democratic Europe seems to be whether a win for General Franco will mean the reduction of all Spain to a state of dependency on Italy and Germany or whether the Spaniards will join in a notionalist drive to rebuild the life of the country. Both Herr Hitler and Signor Mussolini have repeatedly repudiated any imperialist ambitions in Spain. As a matter of fact the political history of that country is itself sufficient guarantee that no outsider would willingly undertake the work of administering it. Even Spaniards seem to have had little success in governing the country peacefully. But apart from the academic satisfaction of seeing Spain preserved to the Spaniards, the democratic States of Europe have little reason to be pleased with another Fascist gain. For while it is difficult to say exactly how much the Fascist-Nazi allies of General Franco will get out of his victory, it is obvious that for some time General Franco will have to lean heavily on them. France which will be in the peculiarly unhappy position of encirclement by Fascist States, is directly affected and realising this Signor Mussolini has his Italians ready to counter any last minute intervention from France. In the circumstances, there is much less likelihood now of the democracies entering on a war in defence of democracy, than there was before General Franco grew to strength and before Czechoslovakia was handed to the Nazis.

War for Democracy :—"The line between cleverness and silliness is sometimes vague," remarks Mr. Calvin B. Hoover in 'Germany enters the Third Reich.' The Times of India in its leading article on Wednesday advises Indians to accept Federation (Hoare model) even though they do not like it, because of external dangers. The Times of India which has not only been commending Mr. Chamberlain's tactics at Munich and after to Indian readers as concessions to the realities of the situation, but often has rebuked Indian writers for advocating from the "security of distance" a stronger British support to democracy, now conjures up the bogey of war to frighten Indians in to Federation :

> India cannot regard herself today apart from world affairs.....If war comes, the democracies of the world may find themselves fighting for their very life against the most powerful combination of aggressive nations the world has ever seen.....Nothing which happens in this country escapes the eagle eyes of aggressive totalitarian states. A weak India is an encouragement to them.....

Seeing that the Hoare Federation breaks up a unified India and then seeks to federate the broken bits with some more pieces thrown in, this is about the worst possible argument to support the scheme. The Times of India must be touching new high points of political simplicity if it believes either that the retreating democracies will suddenly make a stand in Europe now that they are less favourably placed for resistance, or that the Federation scheme will solve Indian differences along with the satisfaction it will give Britain. On the whole, Lord Linlithgow's own thesis that he is determined to bring in Federation early and so the various parties, groups and interests had better reconcile themselves to it, is by for the most logical attitude. If and when Federation comes, it will come not so much because Indians have been converted, but because the Viceroy was enthusiastic about it. How it will work is a different question altogether.

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Rajkot Again :—Commenting on the arrangement come to by Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel with the Thakore of Rajkot, we observed that it did not advance by a single inch the cause of constitutional reform in Indian States including Rajkot itself. Little prescience was needed to reach that conclusion. The game of Power is an ancient one. Under different names it has been and is going on around us every day. A revolution is followed by a counter-revolution as surely as the night the day. And this was a wonderful evolution! The Thakore was converted overnight from a believer in his right to rule autocratically to a seemingly fervent devotee of responsible government with his powers strictly limited. It would have been nothing short of a miracle if this had endured. It has not. As the public clamour against the Thakore's administration grew, the Indian Dewan Viravala, was dismissed and an English retired officer appointed in his place. The new Dewan's advice, however, was not palatable to the Thakore. He dismissed the English Dewan and the Sardar, if we remember, expressed himself disapprovingly of his action in trying to get rid of so experienced an administrator. Mr. Viravala had to leave Rajkot at short notice. The Thakore then agreed to Sardar's terms and got his help in clearing the English Dewan out and in getting back the man whom he had to dismiss in compliance with popular pressure. Now, the Thakore has resumed his authority and upset the arrangement with Sardar Patel who is an amateur in the game as compared with the Thakore Sahib. The Sardar has threatened to revive satyagraha but Mr. Viravala is not Cadell and the Government of India is not likely to supersede him now by an English Dewan. The local leaders are nonplussed, they have sought the advice of the Sardar who himself seems to be taken aback by the sudden turn events have taken in Rajkot, which he thought he had finally and permanently placed on a constitutional footing.

Wanted a States Purge:—Mr. H. V. Hodson, the editor of the Round Table who recently visited India, in an article relating his impressions in the Illustrated Weekly Times of India, urges, as we have done, the necessity of the well-governed States dissociating themselves from States which have only a travesty of Government, as the surest way of averting attacks on their interests. He notes the existence in this country of several symptoms of political abnormability. One of them is the situation in respect of the States. He writes :

> The second symptom is the disguise that is being cast over the agitation in the States. A debauched prince in a petty State is a good stalking horse for a political campaign in major States where government may be as good as in the British Indian provinces or even better. No doubt both the Paramount Power and the more enlightened Princes themselves are to blame for a state of affairs in which all the principalities and their rulers can be plausibly lumped together as a single bloc of anachronism; for neither has repudiated with sufficient vigour the backward or oppressive monarchs. But one certainly receives the impression that in the larger and better States the main purpose of the agitation is not so much to improve the local lot of the States' subjects themselves, by ridding them of autocracy, as to improve the opportunities of democratic parties in the future federal India, by insisting that the States' representatives shall be popularly elected. It is not the existence of this situation but the thin disguise under which it is cloaked that is abnormal.

We do not think that there is any disguise, as Mr. Hodson thinks, about the immediate purpose of the Congress fostering the agitation for responsible Government in the States. If, as we have suggested, the Federation, so far as it relates to States, is abandoned, and confined, for the time being at least, to British India, the tension will be greatly relieved.

University Amenities :—Pending the issue of an authoritative statement from the Nagpur University of the circumstances in which it has arranged to admit several hundreds of Hindu students who were rusticated by Osmania University, we pointed out the danger of a spirit of non-co-operation spreading among universities by one of them opening wide its doors to students who have been expelled from another for violating its rules. The Vice-Chancellor of Nagpur University has since given an explanation which is not satisfactory. His position appears to be that the ban on Bande Mataram for disregarding which the Hyderabad University has expelled the students, does not exist in Nagpur, the singing of Bande Mataram is quite in order in the capital of the Central Provinces and, therefore, these students have not committed any breach of discipline which calls for notice in Nagpur University. The objection to which the admission of these students, is open does not arise from the nature of the particular rule for which they were expelled from their own University. It must be assumed that the authorities of Osmania University had good reasons for framing the rule against Bande Mataram. The authorities of Nagpur University will be otherwise assuming that the authorities of Osmania University were inspired by improper motives to pass this rule. That is to say, they will be sitting in judgment on the action of another University. If this practice is generally adopted, there will obviously be an end to co-operation between universities. We have seen it stated that a compromise was reached and that the students were about to reopen their University when the offer of Nagpur University made them change their minds. What Nagpur should have done was to get into touch with the Osmania University authorities and in consultation with them, adopt a course which, while preventing injury to the students' future, would have conserved the authority of the University. Such a course could have been easily devised. The Osmania authorities are not likely to have been vindictive. If they could not think of a way of taking back the students without injury to discipline and with due regard to their legitimate sentiments, they would have themselves welcomed the offer of Nagpur to relieve them of a great responsibility.

Dominion or Kingdom?:—In the Reformer of January 7, we pointed out that the great expansion which has taken place in the status of the Dominions as a result of the Westminister Statute and happenings since it was passed, made the term 'Dominion' inapplicable, and should be replaced by an etymologically more appropriate designation. A Reuter's message from Ottawa reports that a resolution in the House of Commons introduced by Mr. Lacroix (Quebec, Liberal) proposes that Canada's name should be changed from Dominion to Kingdom of Canada and the Governor-General's title should be changed to Viceroy and that the Viceroy should be Canadian-born and legislation should be adopted to provide a Royal Great Seal for the Kingdom of Canada and the Royal Signet be vested in the custody of the Prime Minister.

Ainscough Economics:—Sir Thomas Ainscough seems to have forgotten his duties in reporting on the trade of the United Kingdom with India for 1937–38. As Senior Trade Commissioner for India and Ceylon one should have thought that his work lay more in telling British exporters what the possibilities are of trading with this country than in advising Indian Governments in economic matters. Sir Thomas, however, has other ideas of his responsibilities. He remarks,

> While Indian public men, both politicians and industrialists, favoured this extension of domestic production, no doubts were being expressed as to how such a policy could be carried out simultaneously with the maintenance of considerable excess of export of agricultural produce on which the whole economic system of India is based. The policy of maximum industrialism, if followed to lengths contemplated by the present Congress authorities and Provincial Governments, must inevitably lead, firstly, to serious clash of interest with the agricultural element, which constitutes nearly seventy per cent of the population, secondly, to a crisis in India's finances as the Government of India rely upon customs receipts for some sixty per cent of the revenue and lastly, to a collapse of the financial and economic fabric of the Government of India, which is dependent upon the excess balance of exports in order to meet India's financial commitments in London and maintain the exchange.

This is more a canvasser's ruse to secure business for his own firm than the serious survey of trade prospects which a commissioner's report is expected to be. It is not, therefore, surprising that the press in Britain has taken Sir Thomas' observations solely as a warning to British exporters, in the words of the London Times, to "adjust their perspective to the situation Sir Thomas expounds in the light of his long experience of the Indian market." The happy picture which Sir Thomas Ainscough has conjured up of an India producing everything in such abundance that she has nothing to take in from foreign countries and no considerable supply of raw materials to send out abroad, is no more than an Ainscough vision and we are not aware of any Congress Government which expects to achieve this in a future near enough to dislocate Indian finance. Sir Thomas Ainscough's unorthodox excursions into economics have produced a novel theory: That the economic development of a country must be for ever dependent on her customs receipts and her foreign trade. As for financial commitments abroad and the difficulties of meeting them as well as of maintaining intact the economic and financial fabric of the country, need we remind Sir Thomas, with examples from recent history that, whenever a nation has found it impossible to meet her liabilities abroad without destroying the economic structure of society, it has not been the "economic and financial fabric" which collapsed? The naivete of Sir Thomas' economics almost makes one think that they are specially designed for export to India.

A Socialist View of the World:—Mr N. B. Kudalkar's article on "The Destruction of Civilization" is an interesting exercise in Socialist theorising. He has tried to link up the fear of war as a threat to civilization which is being propagandised in democracies with the slogan "Democracy is in danger," into a deliberate policy to hoodwink the masses to continue subservient to capitalists and the ruling class. Unfortunately the two catchwords are used by different political parties. Where the two are united, as it was in the Munich crisis, among French and British Socialists, the fear of war has overcome the passion for democracy. Mr. Kudalkar's article does not account for the attitude of Socialist parties in Europe—in Germany during the Nazi rise to power, and in Britain and France today. We have always been perplexed to see the Communist (or for that matter, the Nazi and the Fascist) admirer look with great leniency on atrocities committed by his party heroes. To the victim it should matter little whether his mouth is gagged by Communist or by Nazi. Mr. Kudalkar condemns the democracies for not stopping the "inhuman massacres" in Abyssinia, China and in Spain. Perhaps their reasons were not very different from that of Russia which in one case at any rate was nearer to the scene of trouble for effective intervention.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER
BOMBAY, January 28, 1939.

CONGRESS PRESIDENTSHIP.

The Presidentship of the Indian National Congress is primarily the concern of the Congress Party. In view, however, of the position which the Party has come to occupy as controlling the Governments of seven provinces, and which assures it of an influential voice in the Federal Government whenever it begins to function, the election of the next President is also of interest to the general public. The usual practice from the beginning of the movement has been for the leaders to nominate a candidate who was elected by general acclamation at the opening session of the Congress. The first and most sensational departure from this practice was enacted at Surat in 1907 when Lokamanya Tilak opposed in open Congress the election of Dr. Rash Bihari Ghose to the Presidentship. The split was patched up but the Liberals never recovered the position then lost. Dr. Besant started her Home Rule movement which detached many of the younger men and some of the old veterans from the Liberal Party. There was an excited controversy over her election to the Presidentship of the Calcutta Congress in 1917 and it was not unanimous. In 1920 Congress passed under the control of Gandhiji and Congress Presidents were practically nominated by him though there was the formality of a unanimous election. Last year, Mr. Subhas Bose was elected to the Presidentship on Gandhiji's suggestion. Mr. C. Rajagopalachari stood out in order to make his election uncontested.

From the first, there was not much warmth in the loyalty with which his colleagues accepted his presidentship. There were temperamental differences. The Tamils, the Mahrattas and the Bengalis, do not fit in to a ready-made organisation with the same facility as the Andhras, the Gujaratis and Hindustanis. They have rough edges which need a lot of smoothing before they can be made to serve an end which they do not clearly understand. This accounts for the progressive decline of their influence in the councils of the National Congress since it adopted non-co-operation. The suggestion that Mr. Subhas Bose should be elected President for a second term came from Tamil Nad and Maharashtra. Till last week it seemed to encounter no opposition. The precedent created by Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru's second term, it seemed, would be automatically followed in the case of Mr. Bose. Dr. Pattabhi Sittaramayya's name was not mentioned in connection with the election until a very few days ago. The Andhra monthly, Triveni, indeed, after emphasising his claims had taken it for granted that he would not be elected to the Presidentship. A month ago it was the common talk in informed circles that Mr. Subhas Bose would be elected if Maulana Abul Kalam Azad whose election was considered particularly opportune at this juncture, was not available. When the Working Committee of the Congress dispersed at the end of its meeting a few days ago at Bardoli, Mr. Bose, Maulana Azad, and Dr. Pattabhi Sittaramayya, all members of the Committee and present at the meeting, were officially declared to be the candidates nominated by the provincial electorates. The Maulana then comes to Bombay and announces that, owing to the strain on his health occasioned by his duties as a member of the Parliamentary Board during the last twelve months, he can not undertake the burden of the Presidentship. He does not stop there. He commends the candidature of Dr. Pattabhi Sittaramayya who was on the point of withdrawing from the contest. This came on Mr. Bose as a complete surprise. He issues a statement declaring that as a matter of principle and in loyalty to the provincial committees which have nominated him without his solicitation as candidate for the Presidentship, he could not withdraw from the contest. He gives some reasons bearing on the international situation and the impending Federation, as special grounds for his re-election to the Presidentship. This brings forth a counter-statement from eight members of the Working Committee dismissing Mr. Bose's reasons as irrelevant and declaring that the President is merely a figure-head—euphemistically called constitutional monarch—and by implication that Dr. Pattabhi Sittaramyya could play the role as well as Mr. Subhas Bose. They suggest that there were special circumstances which necessitated the election of Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru the second time which do not exist now. As they do not mention what these were, the public can not judge whether they existed then and have disappeared now. This has stung Mr. Bose into retorting that he is being kept out because of his Leftist opinions and he calls upon all Leftists to rally to his support. He calls Dr. Pattabhi Sitaramayya a Rightist and accuses the Working Committee of preferring him as more likely to be pliant in coming to terms about Federation. We do not know what the reasons are which have induced the eight members of the working Committee thus publicly to throw Mr. Subhas Bose overboard. If we knew we would probably not approve of them. But we feel all the same that the election of Mr. Subhas Bose to a second term would have conveyed to the world at large a totally wrong impression about the temper of the prople of India. Mr. Bose has been repeatedly saying that the difficulties of the British Empire which are accumulating are the opportunities of the Indian people. This doctrine is totally repugnant to the genius of India and it has jarred upon sensitive minds every time the Congress President gave expression to it. The second reason why Mr. Bose's re-election would not be in the best interests of the country was suggested in an editorial note in The Reformer of December 3. He is too intensely provincial to be able to see all India questions in their right perspective At the same time, we cannot help feeling that he has been treated with scant consideration. Dr. Pattabhai Sitaramayya's position is not an enviable one. If he is elected, it will be to a Presidentship denuded of much of its glamour. If he is defeated and Mr. Bose is elected, it will be a slap in the face of the Working Committee.

BRAHMINS AND NON-BRAHMINS IN TAMIL LAND.

In his presidental address to the fourth Madras Provincial Tamilians Conference, which was read by Sir A. T. Pannirselvam who deputised for him, Mr. Ramaswamy Naicker, who is undergoing imprisonment for his anti-Hindi activities, defined a Tamilian thus: "He alone is a Tamilian whose mother tongue has been Tamil for all time and through all generations. No outsider, however learned or proficient in Tamil, can be called a Tamilian." He would not regard Brahmins as Tamilians because, he said, although they settled in the Tamil country and adopted Tamil as their home language centuries ago, they have done so only as a matter of convenience and not because of any love or natural inclination for the laguage. Other reasons why Brahmins should not be regarded as Tamilians, according to Mr. Naicker, are, that they have all through these long ages kept themselves apart and separate from the rest of the people and have given themselves a place of superiority. They look upon Sanskrit as their mother tongue, as a language superior in every way to Tamil, claiming for it even a divine origin and putting it forward as the one language suited for their prayers and for divine worship. No further arguments, Mr. Naicker added, were needed to show that Brahmins have no valid claim to be called Tamilians. Mr. Naicker did not stop here. He went on to declare that Tamils were not Indians. The name "India" was used by Greek historians to denote the country round about the Indus and has become unwarrantably, in Mr. Naicker's opinion, extended to the whole of the country south of the Himalayas. Declared Mr. Naicker, "We differ from them (North Indians) in the language we speak, the dress we wear, and the food we eat. Racially and culturally we are as far away from the North Indian Aryans as from their European kinsmen." Mr. Naicker is wrong in nearly all of his postulates, Brahmins in Tamil land speak Tamil as their mother tongue. Many of them do not know Sanskrit. Even the purohits who officiate at marriage and funeral ceremonies do not know the meaning of the mantras which they intone. Sanskrit was not a spoken language anywhere in historical times. It is the language of ritual and scholarship like Latin and Greek. Brahmins love the Tamil language as much as non-Brahmins. Even in our own time, Brahmin scholars have done as much for the promotion of Tamil learning as non-Brahmins. Tamil is the second sacred language of the Sri Vaishnava sect to which the Madras Prime Minister belongs.

Fifty years ago not much was known about the history of South India and its people were assumed to be a primitive race without culture or civilisation. This view, which is contradicted by the evidence available even in the Ramayana, has, during the last twenty-five years, been shown to be untenable by scholars who have devoted themselves to the unravelling of South Indian history. The artistic genius of the South is attested to by great monuments of architecture and painting. South India as the home of dancing and music has gained recognition within recent years.* The Tamil language and literature have been studied more by French than by English savants though, among the latter, Dr. G. U. Pope's contribution stands pre-eminent. They are unanimous in praise of the power and beauty of the Tamil language. In his preface to his Tamil-English dictionary, Winslow writes: "It is not extravagant to say that in its poetic form the Tamil is more polished and exact than the Greek and more copious than the Latin. In its fulness and power it more resembles English and German than any other living languages." Taylor speaks of Tamil as "one of the most copious, refined and polished languages spoken by man." The crowning achievement of Tamil culture is the Saiva Siddhanta which is enshrined in masterpieces of Tamil sacred literature. The important point to bear in mind, which Mr. Naicker and his friends do not seem to have realised, is that all these great achievements are the product of a synthesis, a wonderfully harmonious synthesis, of the Vedic and the specifically Tamil culture which is often referred to as Agamic in the Tamil classics. "The Vedas are the road, the Agamas are the steeds," is a verse of the saint, Tayumanavar. The Tamil language itself was, according to universally accepted tradition, perfected by the sage, Agastya. Tiruvalluvar, author of the Kural, 2nd Century A. D., revered as the Tamil Veda, was not a sectarian but his precepts bear the impress of Sanskrit culture. He speaks with reverence of the Vedas and Brahmins, and accepts the fourfold division of functional castes, although he himself was born a Pariah. The later saints avow their allegiance to the Vedas and establish the identity between the Vedic and Agamic lore. Brahmins are not and were never regarded as foreigners in the Tamil country. They were there perhaps long before Ramaswami Naicker's ancestors, as his name and caste designation clearly prove. His views are absolutely opposed to history and tradition. His ethnology is equally faked. Reference is made in the Rajatarangini to a pre-historic colony of Dravidians in Kashmir. The Brahuis in Baluchistan speak an agglutinative language allied to the Dravidian group. The Rev Father Heras' researches point to Mohenjo Daro having been the home of a people whose language and ideas had strong affinities to Tamil speech and thought-forms. The cultured Tamil lady who presided at one of the anti-Hindi demonstrations, was better informed than Mr. Naicker when she said that Tamil was once the language of the whole of India, but that it had now become confined to ten districts in the extreme South.

The sociology of the Naicker school is as much fanciful as his history, ethnology and philology. The Brahmins, it was asserted in the Tamil organ of the school, Vuduthalai, used Nair women as their mistresses in Kerala. A more stupid and ignorant calumny it is impossible to imagine. It is a worse calumny on Nair women than on the Nambudri Brahmins. What are the facts? The sambandam was the immemorial form of conjugal union in Malabar not only between Brahmins and Nair girls but also between Nair men and Nair girls. Under the matriarchal system the position of the husband became what the position of the wife has become under the patriarchal. Only the role is reversed: that of the giver instead of the bearer of children. The Brahmins had emerged to the patriarchal stage while the Nairs were still in the matriarchal as they are even today to a large extent. Following the principle of respecting local customs inherent in Hindu legal instincts, and desirous at the same time of establishing kinship with the local inhabitants, the Nambudiris followed the local custom, imposing on themselves the restriction which is now causing grievous hardship to their own daughters, that only the eldest son of a Nambudiri can contract a marriage in his own group. Sociology ceases to be a science when it accepts an explanation tracing the origin of institutions to the depravity of particular groups. Ideas have radically changed and the old custom has become offensive to present-day sentiment. The Nambudiris themselves have awakened to the need of reform and have taken the initiative in introducing them. Another accusation of a similar kind relates to the institution of devadasis. It is the fact that Brahmin girls are not dedicated to temples. On this single ground the Naicker school denounces the Brahmins as inventors of this custom for the degradation of non-Brahmin girls. In the first place, there is no single community known as non-Brahmins. It is a political expression including innumerable Hindu groups with great differences among themselves, and also, lat erly Mahomedans like Sir Oosman and Catholic Christians like Sir Pannirselvam. Not all these groups observe the custom of dedication to temples. Only one or two special groups observe it. In its origin, as the name denotes, the institution of devadasi was the Indian parallel to the vestal virgins of ancient Greece and Rome and the dedication of nuns among Buddhists and Christians, among the latter as the brides of God. This admirable custom has certainly degenerated into a sort of licensed prostitution and the Reformer was the first to start the movement for the abolition of the devadasi system more than forty years ago, in a leading article headed, "Is she not a woman and a sister?" Public opinion has since greatly advanced.

In progressive Indian States the custom has been abolished. In British India dedication of minor girls has been made a penal offence. Many Brahmins have given their support to this movement. In fact, the leaders in this and other social reforms have been mostly Brahmins. It is a malicious myth to allege that the Brahmins founded and maintained this evil custom for their own selfish and sensual satisfaction. As if non-Brahmins have never taken advantage of the devadasi! We have from the first been opposed to the introduction of compulsory Hindi in Madras schools. We are of the same opinion still. Our objection is not to the subject but to the method. Mr. Rajagopalacharya is a fervent believer in Tamil culture and civilisation and it is absurd to impute to him the object of destroying it. The imputation that a Brahmin Ministry is introducing Hindi with a view to corrupt the morals of Tamil girls is the outcome of a depraved imagination. It is so self-revealing that Government might well have abstained from paying the Viduthalai the compliment of prosecuting it. No less fanciful than the imaginary distinction of race and language between Brahmin and non-Brahmin, is the fictitious antagonism between North and South India. The unique feature of Indian culture is the close and incessant interaction between North and South, East and West. Reference has been made above to the pre-historic Dravidian colony in Kashmir. Though Buddhism and Jainism arise in Bihar they were both well-established in the South, before the beginning of the Christian era. The oldest Tamil classics were the work of Jain authors. By the fifth century after Christ, Kanchi, the modern Conjeevaram, had become an important centre of Buddhism. The first Indian Buddhist evangelist to China went from Kanchi. Hiouen Tsiang, the Chinese pilgrim, travelled to Kanchi on purpose to meet the master of his master under whom he had studied for several years at Nalanda University. Sankara and Ramanuja who between them created the philosophic background of post Buddhist Hinduism were southerners. Numerous other instances can be cited to show that the cultural unity of India transcends the division of North and South.

HINDU WOMEN'S RIGHT TO DIVORCE.

(By K. Ramamurti, Aska.)

Dr. Deshmukh's Bill on this subject in the Central Legislative Assembly was circulated for opinion this month to the Bar Associations of Orissa. About two months ago they had the opportunity of expressing their opinion on the two Bills for restraining polygamy introduced in the Council of State by the Hon'ble G. S. Motilal and S. K. Roy Choudhari (Vide Reformer 19th November and 10th December 1938). Mrs. Radhabai Subbarayan's Bill reported to be pending in the Central Legislative Assembly with suggested provisions for the restraint of polygamous marriages as well as for the grant of divorce to both sexes equally in proper cases, has yet to be received in this Province. Meanwhile, the Bar Association of Aska (Ganjam Dt.) has given its support to Dr. Deshmukh's Bill so far as it goes, but has also reiterated its previous opinion that a Joint Committee of both Houses should consider all these Bills together and bring out a comprehensive and adequate measure to amend the Hindu Law of marriage equitably for the benefit of both the sexes.

Dr. Deshmukh's Bill, however, was conceived independently of the other Bills and deserves to be passed, with necessary amplifications, even on its own merits. Unlike the other Bills it avoids interfering with the powerful 'vested' interests and privileges of the Hindu male. The highly irresponsible power of desertion and unrestricted power of polygamy which Hindu Law permits to him whether he avails himself of it or not, and which hangs like a sword of Damocles on the head of every good wife however kindly treated for the time being, is left untouched as sacrosanct. The Bill seeks only to give a very bare minimum of relief to the Hindu wife after the worst has happened to ruin her happiness and turn her married life into a ghastly farce. This Bill should, therefore, commend itself even to those who may feel inclined to oppose the other Bills.

The Association agrees with Dr. Deshmukh that it is high time to make the present-day Hindu Law recognise "that a Hindu wife has a human personality" and that "cases are occurring frequently in India in which a married Hindu women's life is made unbearable under circumstances brought about by her husband." Even if the cases that are daily occuring may not seem frequent enough to rouse the pity of fastidious minds grown happily accustomed to the woes of their womenkind, the law should not be allowed to remain equally callous to the silent sufferings of the Hindu female, leaving the male absolutely free to neglect or abandon her and marry again without any excuse.

Dr. Deshmukh's Bill, however, does not provide a remedy for all cases of marital hardship. It fastens itself upon an irreducible minimum of four which render married life absolutely impossible and make the continuance of the marriage tie palpably meaningless and cruel. Impotency of the husband or a wilful desertion by him in some form or other involving the deprivation to the wife of his companionship and personal protection, inflicts upon her a dreary life of unloved and uncared for slavery which the law should not hesitate to remedy, in the interests of humanity and commonsense.

To avoid undue haste, however, the Bill provides that in the case of a husband's impotency, it should have been found incurable before it could be made a ground for divorce. Even then the wife is placed under no legal obligation by this Bill to leave her husband as some imagine. She remains quite free still to abide by her marriage bond for ever and devote her whole life to his service, if her platonic love for him, or a wise consideration of the balance of convenience and comfort to herself, so dictates. It is only when she feels bitterly that she has been cruelly entrapped and consigned to a living death in the name of marriage, and voluntarily applies for relief, that the proposed measure will come to her rescue and set her free as a human being with as much right as any Hindu male to have a full married life or single-blessedness at her choice. If orthodox Hindu gentlemen view with disfavour the taking of such freedom by any wedded female of their caste, they remain of course at liberty to excommunicate her and also the man who may in spite of their displeasure, venture to marry her. But since the present judicial system has blocked the natural expansion of Hindu Law by denying to the people concerned their ancient right of initiating new customs to meet the needs of new times and conditions, the Legislature owes it to them and to itself to step in with ameliorative measures to safeguard the human rights of individuals and of protestant groups of varying cultures and tastes newly forming within the Hindu fold.

There is one point, however, in Dr. Deshmukh's provision in this regard which calls for comment. Besides requiring that it should have been found incurable, he restricts the impotency clause further by limiting it to "impotency acquired after marriage." It is difficult to understand why a distressed wife should be denied any relief if she had been hoodwinked into marrying a man who was impotent even from before marriage and could not discover the misfortune till later. Since the parties to a Hindu marriage are never medically examined and certified for physical fitness prior to the marriage ceremony, undisclosed impotency on the husband's part should rather be deemed a proper ground for declaring the marriage null and void ab initio. At any rate, it should not be placed in a more favoured position than impotency unfortunately acquired later, as the desolating effect upon the wife's happiness is the same in both the cases.

With a view again to give the parties ample opportunity and a fair chance of mutual reconciliation, the Bill qualifies 'desertion' also by providing that it shall be a ground for divorce only when it had continued without break for a period of three years. It is reported that Mrs. Subbarayan's Bill stipulates a continuous period of five years in this connection. But the Aska Bar Association agrees with Dr. Deshmukh in thinking that three long years of resolute abandonment by the husband should be quite sufficient to convince any one that he cares for his wife no longer and that he has found a way of making himself comfortable without her. Three years is also the period fixed under the 'desertion' clause in the Baroda Hindu Divorce Act of 1931. The deserted wife may, of course, wait for any number of years in the hope of winning back her husband if she deems it worth while, even after acquiring the right of divorce under the law at the end of three years.

No time is needed, however, to get convinced of the utter untenability of a woman's position in her husband's household when he estranges himself irrevocably and makes himself practically inaccessible to her either by embracing a different religion and passing thus into an alien community where she cannot happily and safely join him, or by wedding a more favoured woman to supersede her as his wife. Hence, change of religion and remarriage are put down, each by itself, as a sufficiently intolerable and unmistakeable act of desertion to justify immediate divorce by the injured wife if she so chooses.

As observed by the Hindu Law Reform Committee of Mysore in its report dated 1st September 1930,

"The law as administered does not take sufficient account of human nature or of the sensitive feelings of womanhood when it treats the taking of a second wife by the husband, even in the utter absence of a justifying cause, as not entitling the first wife to leave his home. For it regards such a step on his part callously as 'one of the incidents of Hindu married life' even though other systems treat bigamy as culpable."

This law has obviously become a cruel anachronism and can no longer be tolerated. The displaced wife should be free to claim either divorce or only separate maintenance without divorce at her own choice without any time limit.

There is not the least doubt that Dr. Deshmukh's Bill is good and necessary so far as it goes. But it must be clearly understood and recognised that the four grounds for divorce which he advances are too meagre and inadequate fully to meet the needs of this complex human problem, even if the legislature gives up as hopeless the attempt to curtail the unfettered legal power enjoyed by the male to make his wife miserable as he pleases. There may be no open desertion or change of religion or remarriage on the husband's part. But the result is the same to the wife if he wanders off into lands on the pretence of business and makes a home for himself abroad for decades together with the help of women there whom he does not lawfully marry. Or he may renounce the world and become a religious celibate leaving his wife to her fate but kept tied to him nevertheless for life by the legal bond of marriage. There are again physical conditions worse than impotency which have to be taken into account. Insanity, leprosy, venereal disease, tuberculosis, and other contagious or otherwise communicable diseases may render the husband uncompanionable except at the wife's peril and may easily make wedded life horrible and loathsome to her. Then again there are cases where the husband, though he is healthy and does not drive her out of his house, may treat her with unspeakable brutality by physical maltreatment, injuring or causing danger to life, limb or health, or by calculated disregard of her existence in his home except as a drudge and slave, while he disports himself with other women unmarried to him, or even keeps a permanent concubine. To quote the Mysore Hindu Law Reform Committee again: "There is a cruelty of treatment which may be far more galling to a sensitive spirit than physical violence but which the prevailing law omits to take into account. A man may treat his wife with such utter lack, not merely of affection but of ordinary consideration, as to embitter their mutual relations and to make life a burden to the woman; and yet she has no alternative (where she can resist the temptation to suicide) between a prolonged existence of dependent misery and the being turned out of home with destitution and ignominy."

A strictly moderate demand on the legislature, be-speaking its favour to the barest minimum of needs in just a few cases, may no doubt have its own tactical advantages. But it is to be feared that the line has been drawn too narrowly by Dr. Deshmukh in this instance. The question of divorce under the Hindu Law has to be boldly faced and fought out in all its bearings with firm faith in its justice and inevitable victory, without minimising the necessary demands too much for fear of wearying or alarming the legislature and provoking their wholesale rejection.

There is another serious defect in the Bill which Dr. Deshmukh could not have failed to notice. The Bill simply declares the Hindu wife's right to divorce under certain circumstances but does not indicate by what procedural law and through what tribunal she has to work out her right. In the opinion of the Association the procedure also should be prescribed in this very Bill, and the lowest civil court of original jurisdiction should be the form to deal with such rights, subject however to appeal. The custody and the maintenance of the children, if any, and the expense of the divorce proceedings and the maintenance of the divorcing wife until she remarries and thereby secures a new protector, are also to be provided for on lines similar to these approved for custody and alimony in the Indian Divorce Act.

Lastly, the term Hindu is to be defined as including Arya Samajists, Budhists, Jains and Sikhs; and the Bill must be made applicable to all Hindus within British India and to every Hindu of British India domicile residing outside and even beyond it; and its enactment shall come into force immediately on its receiving the assent of the Governor-General.

DR. DESHMUKH'S HINDU WOMEN'S DIVORCE BILL.

(By V. Jagannathadoss, Pleader, Aska.)

The Bill as it stands does not at all improve the position of women, although it seeks to help them.

The Act must be so framed as to prevent the necessity of seeking the aid of courts for the purpose of getting divorce. It is the common experience of every one that it is impossible to get satisfactory evidence in a court of law. The standard of evidence required for a court will not be forthcoming in most cases. Even respectable people are slow to depose in a matter concerning husband and wife.

In nine cases out of ten the wife goes without getting the necessary relief. Whereas the husband can do things with impunity without seeking the aid of the court, the wife is to go from court to court to get redress for her legitimate grievance. No amount of legislation can give adequate relief to a dis-satisfied wife unless the remedy can be had without attending a court of law.

I would, therefore, suggest that the Act may be so framed as to enable the wife or the husband to dissolve their marriage whenever they find that they cannot live together amicably.

This can be done by either party—husband or wife—by sending registered notice by post, or registering her or his intention before a sub-Registrar to divorce the other.

At all cost the courts should be avoided if women are to be given adequate relief.

SCHWEITZER IN AFRICA.

Dr. Albert Schweitzer's slender volume, "From my African Notebook*" is a disconnected collection of anecdotes round the medical mission run by him at Lambarene. Dr. Schweitzer's hospital is on the hill where Trader Horn once resided, and a chapter from the "Notebook" deals with Aloysius Horn and his times. Dr. Schweitzer tells us that Horn's reminiscences are a compound of remarkable accuracy—Trader Horn wrote down his experiences years after they had occurred—and of romantic imaginings. We are further given a picture of Trader Horn as the people who met him in Africa remember him, irritable, very young and with a liking for rum and brandy. It might be the picture of any trader or it might be recollections of Horn himself. But it is not in his chapter on Aloysius Horn that Dr. Schweitzer is most interesting. The Doctor in his medical work has often to interpret the ways of Europe to the sons of Africa. In his writings he reverses the process. As dual ambassador, Dr. Schweitzer is interesting mainly because he is a little ahead of his listeners and readers.

The "Notebook" deals with hospital experiences, the superstitions of African peoples and their taboos, and social customs. Every patient will sympathise with the one in this story—

> After a difficult operation, much anxiety was felt about the patient's condition. Dr. Holm, who had performed the operation, crept to her bed three times during the night and lifted the mosquito-net to feel her pulse and listen to her breathing. And three times came the nurse likewise. In the morning when sympathetic inquiry was made as to how the patient was feeling, she answered crossly, "I should have slept well all night, if I had been left in peace."

There are some experiences that are unique. All of us, for example, are familiar with our own faces. On your own shaving table, at the barber's, in the lift, in the wayside pan-shop, the ubiquitous mirror has brought on us full consciousness of what we look like. There might be one or two individuals who, like Mr. Bernard Shaw, have so rarely looked into mirror that they are at first startled to see "a rascal glaring at them." After the first moment they too recognise their image. But Dr. Schweitzer has a story of the woman whose taboo was that she must never see her reflection. It was left to the Director of a Protestant Mission plantation to exorcise the influence of her faith in taboos by his religious faith. When she took a mirror in her hand and looked for a long time into it after prayer, "she raised her eyes and said, 'And to think I never knew how beautiful I am.'" Even Mr. Bernard Shaw might well envy the woman her great discovery.

Dr. Schweitzer's description of matriarchal society in Africa is interesting. There a man has to buy himself a wife. And often as he cannot pay the full price demanded at once, he buys her on the instalment system. "From the side of the wife's family there begins a process of squeezing which goes on for years. The father of the young woman and his relatives have not the chief say in this affair. The girl belongs to her mother, and her mother's brothers. It is these that get the greater part of the money." If the husband is not able to meet an instalment when it is demanded of him, his wife is kidnapped and until he pays she is kept away from him. "If there are children, they are carried off with the woman.....But a man knows where to look for his wife. Sooner or later he quits his work, and with the necessary cash undertakes the journey to her village." The wife makes no resistance to the abduction even if she has grown to care for her husband. It is not strictly correct to speak of her being taken away by her family as abduction. Dr. Schweitzer's observation that the Africans looked on the procedure less tragically than she did, confirms this. Dr. Schweitzer remarks that the wife's family have the right to receive her back if she is badly treated by her husband and to keep her till her husband renders account. "Although the wife is sold to her husband .....she never ceases to be under the protection of her family." The term "sold" again has no application from the context, to the pecuniary side of tribal marriage. The justification for its use in this case is convenience. In books like Dr. Schweitzer's there are glimpses of African life which have more values in them than the ordinary resident can give us. But a real understanding can best come from books written by African intellectuals themselves.

THE "DESTRUCTION" OF CIVILIZATION.

(By N. B. Kudalkar, Bandra.)

Not seldom does one hear that if a second world war were to break out it will end civilization itself. Different categories of people feel differently nervous about the cataclysm of a world war, and prognosticate the same fate. Democratic statesmen, working-class leaders, millionaires, scholars and evangelists, profiting by the experiences of the last Great War, are horrified at the very contemplation of a catastrophe which hangs over the peoples of the most advanced nations of the earth. It is interesting to analyse this anxiety for the destruction of civilization.

The subjective attitude to the present state of the world plays a predominant part in the expression of this fear. The representative spokesmen of the democracies probably mean that a war would be an end of all the ideals that the democratic life stands for, namely freedom of opinion, of speech and of association, and an extinction of individualism and all that it entails in the field of human activity. The leaders of the masses probably mean that untold sufferings would ensue from the devastation and brutalities involved in a great modern war. The evangelists stand aghast at the spectacle of warfare itself vainly believing that a utopia of brotherhood of their imagination will be attained by somehow muddling through the peace that they observe; and by peace they mean simply absence of a state of war.

Different people will, therefore, argue from their different points of view. What constitutes, then, modern civilization, this twentieth century article? A French writer on political economy, Prof. Gide, gives the definition of civilization as the increase in human wants. The more civilized a nation is, then, the more enlarged is the sphere of its standards of living. The Westerner can congratulate himself that his researches in scientific investigation have contributed, to a degree unknown in centuries gone by, to the comforts and the material well-being of humanity at large. Scientific achievements in the domain of electrical energy, heat, gas and minerals are responsible for all the amenities we have become accustomed to in large cities, for example, transport, building, lighting, the telegraph, and the telephone. The list would be inexhaustible when all the branches of human activity are taken into account: these are daily accelerated and widened as a direct consequence of the progress in applied sciences in all their ramifications. If all this is to be reckoned as civilization, is that all going to disappear when the Fascist Powers come into a deadly grip with the great democracies of Britain, France and America, or begin their onslaught on the Soviet Socialist Republics of Russia?

It is curious to observe that anxiety for the so called civilization finds expression mainly outside of both the Fascist Powers of Italy and Germany, and of Russia where a Communist state exists. That is a very noteworthy point to remember.

Barring the territories of Russian soviets, the rest of the world is governed by capitalistic organistation of society, and is dominated by the Imperialist democracies of Britain, France and America, and the Fascist and Nazi Empires of Italy and Germany. The smaller nations are either subject nations, or dependencies of nations whose political form varies between the democratic and autocratic. The Fascist and the Communist have been shouting the slogan of the destruction of civilization. The former with his counterpart, the Nazi, is a confirmed beliver in the expansionist role of capitalist imperialism, which it is impossible to play without armaments and a war to break the power of the victims, the present as well as the future victims, of such imperialism; he sees in the socialism of the Russian Soviets an antithesis and an enemy of the capitalist society handed down to his times through centuries of exploitation, and looks askance at the democratic principles of equality, fraternity and liberty, and at the very form of parliamentary democratic government which he has crushed within his own nation and which he will not tolerate elsewhere (e.g. in Spain). The Communist in Russia is on the defensive, and elsewhere in the democracies he firmly believes with all left-wing socialists that the capitalist dispensation has outworn its utility, that the tentacles of its policy of exploitation on which alone it thrives, have spread misery, starvation, unemployment and unhappiness among millions in the democratic countries themselves, in spite of the achievements of science and industry, and that its end ought to be facilitated. The great awakening in the proletariat and the peasant masses in capitalist democracies and in the exploited dependencies and small nations is a danger signal for those who have hitherto flourished on a capitalistic organisation of society, and who mean so to flourish in future. These latter people or classes are the governing classes in the imperialist democracies of Britain, France, and the United States, three of the most powerful and prominent democracies of the world.

The governments of France, Britain and the United States of America are the mouthpiece of the ruling classes, who are none other than the great Banking Combines, the Trusts or Cartels in industry, transport and commerce who dictate the imperialist policies of exploitation of these empires. These classes are overwhelmed, on the one hand, by the threats of imperialist ambitions of Fascist Italy and Nazi Germany which the latter have determined to achieve at no distant date, and for the sake of which some partition of the existing territories within the empire of Britain and France would become inevitable; on the other hand, these same classes dread the successful reorganisation of society on communist lines in the Soviet Socialist Republics of Russia, and see in it the threatened termination of capitalistic-dispensation, when the proletariat and the peasant of their own countries will be aroused by the policy of conscription for military service in a dreadful war to be waged for keeping the capitalist classes in power in their respective countries.

When the spokesmen in the imperialist democracies strike the note of warning that the ruin of the twentieth century civilization is apprehended, they never mean that the world would pass back into a labyrinth of barbarism. They believe by civilization a capitalistic organisation of society in the same sense as the Fascist and the Nazi believe. They do not hate the Italian and German dictatorships on account of the brute force on which they are based and which alone they know in their hearts, rules in maintaining capitalism in all countries; but what they really despise in those dictatorships is the threatened division of the spoils of the globe so long enjoyed by them. The talk of democracy in danger is only a sop for the unwary masses, since the power which the ruling classes exercise is nothing but the power of wealth derived solely through exploitation, which society based on capitalistic organisation enables them to enjoy. The wealthy classes and their governmental spokesmen voice the aspirations not of the real democracy, that is of the masses, but their own class-aspiration to derive ever-increasing wealth based on the ownership of the means of production of wealth, namely land and capital, and the consequent power over the distribution of national wealth. Parliamentary form in the imperialist democracies is not civilization itself, since these democracies have not made it possible to dispel poverty, starvation and unemployment, nor to raise the standard of living of a majority of the populace living therein; nor have those democracies enable the dependencies to stand on their own legs, nor have they succeeded in stopping the inhuman massacres in Abyssinia, China and Spain.

Boiled down, the spectre of the destruction of civilization raised has a magnanimous hypocrisy about it. It is meant to gain intellectual submission from the exploited proletariat and peasant to the present capitalistic organisation of society, and to delay the socialistic ordination of human society. Civilization is merely the degree of progress and development of humanity; the capitalistic phase will give place to the socialistic phase that is all. Civilization will neither decay nor stop nor vanish. Mankind will not cease to march on the road of civilization—a continuous process and, in the last degree, the objective conditions of life in human society.

LIMITS OF SERVICE.

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

It is well-known that inferior village servants like Mahars, were put to great harassment as their duties were nowhere definitely stated. They were often made to render personal services to the Inamdars, Patels, Kulkarnies, Talathis, and other Government officers. The long-standing grievance of these servants that they did not know exactly what was required of them has been now removed and the Hon. Mr. Morarji Desai, the Revenue Minister, Bombay, must be congratulated for defining in clear terms the duties of inferior village servants useful to Government such as Mahars, Ramoshies, chaugalas, Jagyas and Kolies.

In view of their economic bondage, lack of education and low social status it would be appropriate for the Minister to issue an order prohibiting Government servants from employing women of the depressed classes for carrying out any of the duties required to be performed by inferior village servants.

The duties of Mahars who form the most important class of village servants, are described in G. R. R. D. 7420/33 of 13-9-1938 as under:—

(1) To carry Gevernment remittances to the sub-treasury.

(2) To call the villagers at the chavdi to pay Government dues.

(3) To carry the village daftar to and from the Taluka Kacheri.

(4) To keep a watch on Government money and office records at the village and on property attached for recovery of Government dues.

(5) To take Government tapal to and from the taluka office and to take Government post of officers on tour, where there are no facilities for transport.

(6) To accompany village officers and touring officers at the time of crop and boundary mark inspection, and to show roads to officers and other travellers.

(7) To take news of births and deaths to village officers.

(8) To carry distrained moveable property to the village chavedi.

(9) To summon persons on whom notices, etc., are to be served and assist the police patil in serving summonses issued by Magistrates, police etc.

(10) To carry chains and cross-staff, place table and other instruments of the measures to the field for Government work.

(11) To accompany the police patil and police at the time of the night round where there are no Jaglyas appointed to do the work.

(12) To publish Government orders in the village by beat of drum.

(13) To take impounded cattle to the kacheri for auction when necessary.

(14) To assist the vaccinator in collecting children for vaccination.

(15) To help in the disposal of unclaimed bodies found in a village and to help the police in the removal of dead bodies for post-mortem examination whenever called upon by the police to do so.

(16) To help the police patil in case of accidental deaths and fires and outbreaks of epidemics and episodes.

(17) To keep guard over prisoners in the police patil's custody.

(18) To report movements of members of criminal tribes and criminals and assist the police in investigation of the prevention of the commission of crimes.

(19) To set up camp offices in the village.

MY POLITICAL FAITH.*

(BY J. H. HOFMEYER.)

I have been trying to formulate in specific terms the things for which I more especially stand in political life. That is something which every politician should do from time to time. And he should not evade the issue by pointing to the programme or principles of the party to which he belongs. After all, rightly conceived, one's party is merely the particular instrument which one finds best fitted for the attainment of one's individual political ideals.

Among those political ideals I would put first the desire that the time may come as speedily as possible when the terms 'Afrikaans-speaking' and 'English-speaking' will very largely have lost their meaning in the political life of South Africa. To-day we still tend to divide South Africans into two classes on the basis of the language which they speak. The very fact that in ever-increasing numbers they are able to speak both languages deprives that classification of most of its value.

But there is something more important than being able to speak both languages, and that is the attitude of mind which makes us regard both languages as our languages because they are the languages of South Africa.

General Hertzog once spoke of Afrikaans as his language by birth and English as his language by right. The implication was that they were both his languages. That is the true spirit of South Africanism. When that spirit prevails throughout South Africa, we shall no longer need talk of the ideal of national unity, because essential unity will in fact have been realised.

If national unity is my first ideal, tolerance is the second. The two things are inter-connected. National unity implies tolerance as between the two main sections of our European people in South Africa today—but tolerance must also prevail in the relations between those two major elements regarded as a unit and the minority and unprivileged elements in the community.

I think first in that connection of the reproach of anti-Semitism. Anti-Semitism is to-day stronger in South Africa than in any part of the British Commonwealth. It has been wafted by evil winds from across the seas like the seeds of some poisonous plant but it has taken deeper lodgment in the soil of our popular mentality than, having regard to our national antecedents, one would ever have believed possible.

It is a danger to South Africa—if only because all too often in other countries anti-Semitism has been used to prepare the ground for dictatorship—it is also a reproach, a derogation from our worthiness as a free nation. We must use every effort to ensure that South Africa does not relapse into the new barbarism of anti-Semitic persecution. We must keep the banner of our national honour unsullied by that blot.

But there is also the question of our attitude to the non-European peoples of this land. It is that which presents to our South African nation its supreme, its most crucial test. It is by our response to that test, more than by anything else we shall be judged before the bar of history.

We are told sometimes that it must be the aim of our policy to save European civilisation in South Africa. It is natural that we should wish to do so. But to preserve European civilisation is not the same as to preserve the privileged position of the European living in South Africa. If we seek to do the latter on some basis other than that of merit and desert, if we deny essential human rights to unprivileged elements in our population, then the structure which we are erecting will be found to have the seeds of decay at its base. It is a poor sort of European civilisation which you protect at the cost of the essential principles of justice and tolerance and fair play, which alone can make that civilisation worth while.

The adoption by South Africa of the concept of trusteeship in native policy is a recognition of these facts. But we must be on our guard against the use of the term trusteeship as a conscience-stifling mumbo-jumbo. We must not allow trusteeship to become simply an excuse for keeping the native in his place—a place of inferiority and subjection. The guardian must envisage the day when his ward will grow up, and be able to look after his own affairs. Trusteeship cannot be permanent. We must face fearlessly the implications of that fact.

I think next of my position in regard to social and economic policy. In the sphere of economics our policy has of late been almost entirely the resultant of forces exercised by various pressure-groups. In the conditions, which have prevailed in the world, that has perhaps been unavoidable, but we shall gradually have to build up a freer and more natural economic system.

In the sphere of social welfare there is great work still to be done. There are far too many people in South Africa who have not attained even the meanest standards of health and civilised living. We must work to enable them to attain adequate standards, and that, in as many cases as possible, not by charity or patronage but by right and from the working of a sound economic system. Above all we must reject, and reject decisively, the doctrine that we cannot spend more on social services for non-Europeans than the amount they produce in taxation. No nation applies that principle to the poorest classes of its population.

Finally, there are the questions which arise with reference to South Africa's position in relation to the world outside. I start with the realisation that the barriers of South Africa's isolation have broken down. We cannot, if we would, live unto ourselves alone. That also is a fact which we should be ready to face boldly and without fear.

There is our position in Africa. Ours is the one settled and firmly established European civilisation south of the Sahara. Surely it is not without a purpose that we are here. Surely we are called increasingly to leadership, at least in the southern half of the continent, and that not in any spirit of aggression, nor with any desire to extend our borders, but simply in readiness to lend our aid to other African communities with whom we are united by common interests in a common task.

There is our position in the British Commonwealth of Nations. That I regard as a settled fact, by virtue of the acceptance of the concept of free association. For all practical purposes today there are no legal bonds of Empire. Such as still exist we are in fact free to break at any moment, if we were foolish enough to do so. The real bonds uniting the Commonwealth are freedom, friendship and faith. These we should do all in our power to maintain and strengthen.

There remains our position in the world. Whether we like it or not, we live in a world where there is a conflict of ideologies—a struggle between democracy and dictatorship. Of course we all desire earnestly that the conflict shall not be resolved by war; it is none the less an issue which constantly presents itself to each one of us, one on which we can not evade the necessity of assuming position. And when we have regard to the democratic, liberty-loving traditions of the peoples from which most of us are descended, we can only take a firm stand on the side of democracy. South Africa can have no truck with dictatorship, nor with the ideals of dictatorship.

There then, compressed within necessarily brief limits, are the political ideals for which I stand. I could sum it all up in a few words: National unity, tolerance, freedom, these three—and the greatest of these is freedom.

UNTOUCHABILITY IN BIHAR.

The Muzaffarpur correspondent of the Hindustan Standard, Calcutta, sent under date January 15 the following statement which Mr. Vindeshwari Prasad Varma, M.L.A. Provincial Secretary of the Harijan Sewak Sangh, Bihar, has issued to the press:

"We in Bihar have always imagined that the problem of untouchability is not so serious as in the Madras and Bombay Presidencies. In the days of Mahatma Gandhi's epic fast, there were so many meetings and demonstrations and so many temples were freely thrown open to the Harijans that we began to believe that untouchability had really vanished from the land. But as the time passes we come across instances after instances in which the Harijans are treated no better than beasts. And in the matter of access to public wells the position remains almost the same. The Government and the workers are forced to relieve their distress by providing them with wells. This removes their difficulty but does not remove untouchability. The question of entry into temples is still more difficult. Even in the temples thrown open to all during the days of Mahatma Gandhi's fast, difficulties are being raised and Harijans are denied entry. The fact is that the Harijans very seldom aspire to visit a temple and a very few leaders or workers attempt to take Harijans with them into any temple, and consequently the problem is never forced on public attention.

"Recently at Bargoan, an Inspector of Harijan Sevak Sangh, who was leading a party of Harijans into the temple was assaulted by the 'Pandas.' In this case, the attitude of the temple authorities was all the more inexcusable because they had got it repaired with funds received from Seth Jugal Kishore Birla on the express condition that all Hindus, Harijans and Non-Harijans would have free access thereto, I believe our workers will meet the same fate if they would try to repeat the experiment in other temples. The mentality of the 'Pandas' and 'Pujaris' and also many other caste Hindus is still of the old order. But surely such a great social and religious iniquity cannot be allowed to continue any further. All public places must remain open to all. All public temples can be visited by all the adherents of the faith to which the temple belongs. These rights have to be guarded by all Governments and our present Congress government in Bihar cannot shake off this responsibility. If the present provisions of law are, in any sense, considered insufficient or ineffective, proper legislation should be made to enforce these rights."

RIGHTS OF WOMEN WORKERS *

(By Anna Westergard.)

The Object of the Open Door International is :—

"To secure that a woman shall be free to work and protected as a worker on the same terms as a man, and that legislation and regulation dealing with conditions and hours, payment, entry and training shall be based upon the nature of the work and not upon the sex of the worker.

And to secure for a woman irrespective of marriage or childbirth, the right at all times to decide whether or not she shall engage in paid work, and to ensure that no legislation or regulations shall deprive her of this right."

In 1929—nine years ago—the Open Door International was founded in Berlin.

Three years have passed since we last held a Conference, in Copenhagen in 1935.

In the intervening time there have been many developments in our field of work—the economic emancipation of the woman worker.

When a world-wide economic depression set in, the O. D. I. immediately pointed out to those who in many countries, sought to make a new economic reconstruction, that this was a unique opportunity for building up a new and better economic system in which an integral factor must be equality and justice for women.

Our appeal was unheeded. Instead of being able to co-operate in the building of that new and better system, the Open Door International had to fight not only the old resistance to women's right to work and the spreading of restrictive legislation for women by Conventions of the International Labour Organisation, it had also to fight the tendency to use the economic depression as a new pretext for depriving women of their right to work for pay.

How well we remember all the attacks on the right of the married woman to engage in paid work in many countries—France, Great Britain, Canada, Germany, Sweden, U. S. A., Australia, Norway and South Africa : and the morally wrong and economically puerile suggestion that prohibiting the work of women would provide more employment for men.

We remember, too, the proposal of the Committee on Industrial Hygiene of the I L. O.—in a report which treated the woman worker not as a human being but as a pathological specimen—that a list of occupations to be prohibited to women of child-bearing age should be drawn up.

We still have to watch and combat the new practice of delegating to a Minister or official the power to prohibit or restrict women's employment, which is, in fact, to put women outside the rule of law, leaving them at the mercy of an arbitrary power—a most dangerous and unjustifiable practice.

During these years, too, the white pages of conventions have been falling from the I. L. O. like sand in a storm over the desert—prohibiting paid night work, dangerous work, paid work before and after childbirth—questionnaires on insurance, suggesting that lower benefits should be paid to women, and Invalidity and Old-Age Insurance-Convention, containing provisions expressy suggesting unequal treatment of men and women.

In these rather sinister circumstance the task of the O. D. I. has been difficult and complicated.

Now what of the new and serious problems which are facing us today?

I chose two as being of great importance :—

(1) The proposed reorganisation of domestic service.

(2) The population problem.

In connection with each of these it is possible, even probable that new dangers for women may arise.

It is without doubt desirable that courses in domestic economy should be widely available for women and for men as well, and that the whole subject of domestic economy should be given the place of importance which it deserves.

NOTES.

Britain in Europe:—Once more British statesmen have proved their weakness in negotiating with foreign leaders on foreign soil. The Chamberlain-Halifax visit to Rome is described as a success. But what has been achieved by the two statesmen is not so clear. In view of an earlier message to the effect that the talks had ended abruptly and from the fact that the visit was a remarkably short one, one might fairly infer that the Rome talks were passed off as a success because Britain did not care to admit they were a failure. Britain's path, however, seems to us to be clear now. Nobody wants war. Even from the point of view of self-preservation, the time to resist German-Italian advance in Europe is past, after Czechoslovakia. To the heavy toll which a modern war will take of young, old and middle-aged lives, there must be added the further consideration that Germany has tied the whole of Europe, practically, to her foreign policy through alliances against Bolshevism. It is a point worth considering that the growth of anti-Communism in Europe synchronises with the gradual lessening of Bolshevik influence. Public opinion in Britain, at any rate effective public opinion, seems to be decidedly with Mr. Chamberlain. Those, mostly the intellectuals, who are opposed to his methods, are apparently not successful in persuading the country. After the first shock of surprise at seeing Britain give up the job of world policeman, the rest of the world is following Czechoslovakia's example in settling down to the new order; and from all accounts there is nothing to show that a Europe dominated by the Nazi-Fascist combine is any different from the Europe under Anglo-French management. It is only natural that both Britain and France should be more reluctant to sacrifice their own holdings than they were in sacrificing Czechoslovakia. But there is no reason to think that concessions will not be made after a certain amount of haggling. The negotiations between Fascist States and Imperialist powers are all the easier since the Fascists are prepared to accept a little less than the irreducible minimum of their popular extremists. Lacking the will to fight and with many a good reason against war, Britain will not pursue a policy which might lead to a breach of the peace in Europe. And without Britain France is not in a position to assert herself.

Italy's Demands:—The first amusement with which France and other countries received Italy's demand for Tunis, Corsica and Nice, has given place to a graver outlook. The earlier reaction was apparently due to a general feelingthat Italy is not as formidable an opponent as Germany and that there was little chance of the Nazis joining forces with the Fascists on this issue. This optimism was supported by the Italian suggestion that these concessions were needed to counteract German gains in Austria and in Czechoslovakia. The seriousness into which the situation developed in Paris and M. Daladier's decision to visit Tunis, were no doubt because of the realisation that the Italo-German alliance was as strong as ever. It is believed that German interest had been enlisted in the matter by a promise of the Italian Tyrol, if Italy secured her ambitions. It is not known whether Mr. Chamberlain still thinks that Britain and France are held together by identity of interests. M. Daladier's activities in Tunis just before Mr. Chamberlain's talks in Rome, were not calculated to strengthen Anglo-Italian relations. Europe today is very near realising Signor Mussolini's dream of a world ruled by the four great powers. But there is a difference. France seems to be out of the picture, and Britain's task evidently ends with signing agreements drafted by the other two parties. If France and Britain are satisfied with this arrangement, no one should have any reason for complaint. The small nations of Europe never governed themselves in recent years. To them whether Germany or France is the Paramount Power is only a question of adjustment. In Spain, the end of the protracted struggle between Franco and the Government seems to be in sight with a win for General Franco. It is a great deal for Fascism that Spain should at last come into her system. Europe might quite conceivably find it necessary to unite in a League of Fascist Nations. The importance attached by the Nazi-Fascist Governments to individuals—support of Franco in Spain; denunciation of Schussnig and Benes in Austria and Czechoslovakia, as arch-enemies of Germany who must be removed—gives sinister meaning to the Soviet treason trials. Mr. Paul Einzig in an article in the Spectator points out the identity of Nazi and Bolshevik economics. There are many who cannot see any striking difference in the two political systems. If the figure of Stalin is all that stands in the way of a German-Soviet alliance, we may yet see Russia, like Czechoslovakia but perhaps not so peacably, change leaders.

The Return of Colonies :—Africa which suffers the most under colonialism, has something to gain from a European understanding. Obviously there can be small chance of an international administration in Africa unless there is agreement in Europe. The League of Nations itself has collapsed because there was little to hold its several members together and a false security had accentuated differences. We must deplore, however, the tendency of the Whites to make pawns of Africans and of Indians in Africa in their own nationalist game. The East African Indian Congress in its recent session at Nairobi seems to have fallen an easy victim to the persuasions of British propagandists. East African Indians outside Tanganiyika have all along maintained that the treatment accorded to their countrymen in Tanganiyika has been far in advance of the treatment meted out to them in Kenya. In other words, the mandates system with all its defects has proved better to Indians than colonialism. Now they are eager, if we can judge by the resolutions adopted by the East African Indian Congress, to join hands with the Tanganiyika League which seeks to force Britain to absorb Tanganiyika in the Empire, a solution which appears to us to be the least acceptable of the possible ones. On the other hand, some Indians are playing the game of Germany in the hope that it will be easier to improve the position of Indians in a foreign colony than in British territory. If they are calculating on pre-war precedents, they are heading for disappointment. Britain before bidding for control had a certain influence and prestige which will fall from her after she hands over power to Germany. And the new administration will resent any suggestion of outside pressure. We can see no alternative to the suggestion for an international administration in Africa fully conscious of its primary obligations towards the native peoples.

Mr. Patel For Africa :—The national press in India and the Indian National Congress have been distracted from the immediate policy of linking up Indians to the Tanganiyika League by a pious resolution of the East African Congress on the rights of all peoples to self-determination. His Highness the Aga Khan who had offered some time back to place his services at the disposal of East African Indians in persuading Gandhiji to take up their agitation against the transfer of the old colonies to Germany, has had discussions at Wardha which have resulted in "complete agreement" on Tanganiyika policy. Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel, it is reported, will be deputed to East Africa to organise Indian opposition to the surrender of the colonies. It would be an exquisite irony if the leading spirits of the Indian National Congress which fights elections in India on a ticket of independence from the British Empire, should launch a campaign in Africa which hands Tanganiyika over to the British and finally destroys the mandates system. The only possible attitude for Indians is that of supporting an international administration for East Africa with Indians adequately represented on it. Mr. Patel, we are sure, will have no difficulty in convincing our East African Indians of this. We can think of no one whose visit to East Africa would be more helpful to the Indian community there. The most outspoken of Indian politicians, Mr. Patel gives expression to his opinions and impressions in forceful language, and our countrymen overseas will hear many home-truths during his stay among them. To Mr. Patel too, the change of surroundings and the different problems which he will find in Africa, will bring a much-needed relaxation from the arduous duties which, since the introduction of provincial autonomy, have fallen on him as president of the Congress Parliamentary Board.

The Situation in Travancore :—We publish on another page an estimate by a correspondent of the situation on the eve of the Viceroy's visit in Travancore. The withdrawal of the personal allegations against the Dewan in the representation made by the political party in the State corresponding to and drawing its inspiration from the Indian National Congress, and the subsequent withdrawal of the prosecution instituted against the signatories to the document, both on advice of Gandhiji, has not produced a peaceful atmosphere. It has created a split in the Travancore Congress party. The section which acted on Gandhiji's advice having withdrawn the personal allegations as a tactical step and not because it admitted them to be false and malicious, finds itself on the horns of a most unconfortable dilemma. Eventually it will most probably retire from the contest. Gandhiji's motive in advising as he did was, of course, the very highest. He wanted the movement for constitutional reform to be carried on free from personal recrimination. But the Travancoreans are evidently unable to work for a principle without personifying it. Much has been said of the educational progress of Travancore. Although there is a higher proportion of literacy in the State than in British India, politically the population is yet in the elementary stage. Responsible citizenship is a pre-requisite of responsible government and the first thing in responsible citizenship is respect for the rights of one's fellowmen. We have recently seen what purports to be a representation to the Maharaja by the youth of Travancore. We do not know how many young people read the contents of this document. Not many, we trust. We are sure that few educated Travancoreans will endorse the impertinence of demanding, in the name of ancient Travancore tradition, that the Maharaja should live in a separate palace from his mother! The dragging of the Maharani's name in a controversial context, is bad taste and worse politics. This discourtesy to Her Highness who is held in high esteem as a sagacious leader of the Indian women's movement, will be resented all over the country.

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Fantastic Race Theories :—Mr. Ramaswami Naicker, leader of the Self-Respect movement in Tamil land, now undergoing imprisonment (commuted immediately to simple, A class) is a man of strong character ready to stake his all in advancing any cause which appeals to him. Such a man in any country or community is sure to stand out of the mass of his fellows who would find in him their natural leader. But such men are not always well-informed in matters not directly concerning their leadership. Unfortunately, too, they do not know their limitations. Mr. Naicker, for instance, has not studied ethnology. His knowledge of the subject is derived merely from hearsay. In his statement before the Court when he was prosecuted for his activities against compulsory Hindi, he maintained that his purpose was to oppose the Aryanisation of the Dravidian people who had a distinctive culture and civilisation of their own. He maintained that the Brahmins of the Tamil country were the kith and kin of the Brahmins of Hindustan and both were the racial kindred of White men, and that the spread of Hindi was calculated to fix the yoke of British-Brahmin imperialism irrevocably on the necks of the Dravidian people! The Madras Prime Minister publicly repudiated any kinship with white men. He said that some of his relatives were black as pitch, while others were fair, and that he himself happened to be neither black nor fair purely by accident. There is no accident in heredity. The facts mentioned by the Premier are readily explained by Mendel's law as the result of the fusion of two races, one dark and the other fair. Anthropometrical measurements, which are more fixed than the colour of the skin, disclose non-Aryan types among Brahmins and Aryan types among antyajas. The fact is that the division of Aryan and Dravidian, fanciful everywhere, is fantastic in the Tamil country.

A Menace to Dravidian Morals :—The Prime Minister of Madras has advanced various arguments at different times in justification of his scheme of compulsory Hindi in middle schools. They are all too abstruse and far-fetched for the man in the street who placed the Congress party in power. A democratic leader should never use arguments which are beyond the grasp of his constituents. In India at present the latter are mostly illiterate peasants cherishing their land and cattle and women as their most precious possessions. The royal road to their favour is to promise them reduction of land tax, scaling down or complete wiping off of their debts, and free grazing for their cattle in the forests next to their villages. The readiest way of turning the popular mind against them is to allege that their policy is directed to undermine the fidelity of women to their lords and masters. A Tamil daily with a considerable circulation founded and owned by Mr. Naicker has been convicted of the offence of promoting hatred between classes for writing that the Brahmin Ministry—there is only one Tamil Brahmin among ten Ministers—in compelling Tamil children to learn Hindi, was inspired by sinister designs on the chastity of the women of the Tamil country! The naive defence was that it was intended merely to promote the candidature of Self-Respect Party, candidates at a Municipal election.

Bengalees in Bihar :—The Congress Working Committee has at long last reached a decision on the grievances of the Bengalees domiciled in Bihar. The Committee has condemned the requirement of domicile certificates which it could not possibly have approved. Otherwise, the resolution of the Working Committee, while paying a theoretical homage to the idea of Indian unity, has left open the door to administrative discrimination which may be exercised in a way which would nullify the effect of the abolition of domicile certificates. Mr. P. R. Das, the leader of the domiciled Bengalees, qualifies his acceptance of the Working Committee's decision by adding that it should be carried out in the spirit as well as in the letter. In the natural course, the great majority of posts in the public services always and everywhere goes to natives of a province by birth or domicile. The only issue before the Committee was, whether the Government of Bihar which at present is of the Congress party, should continue the distinction made by previous Governments between natives of Bihar who speak Bihari and those of them who speak Bengalee. There was only one answer which the Committee could have given without flagrant violation of the principle of Indian unity and it is the one which it has given. Not content with this, it has included a general pronouncement on the question of the right of provincial Governments to discriminate in favour of their own and against other provincials. This part of the resolution of the Committee, strange to say, falls far short of the emphatic and forthright declaration of the Government of India Act.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER
BOMBAY, January 21, 1939.

YOUNG OFFENDERS.

In the course of the editorial note on "Hyderabad Press Policy" last week, we referred to a statement as having been made in the course of a debate on Prison Reform in the House of Commons. As a matter of fact, the passage we had in mind occurs in an admirable little volume on "Young Offenders, Yesterday and Today" by Geraldine S. Cadbury*. Before 1838 the treatment of all offenders, and young offenders among them, in Great Britain was characterised by extreme brutality. The criminal law abounded in savage punishments. For petty thefts offenders were hanged. A picture in this volume of Miss Elizabeth Fry visiting Newgate in 1818, shows a small boy sitting at a rude table with his head bowed down on his folded arms. An old man, apparently a prison official, is pouring out something from a jug into a cup for himself or the boy to drink. The boy, it is stated, was under sentence of death.

The very savagery of the penal law gave the first impulse to prison reform. One of the pioneers of prison reform, Joseph Sturge, when he was a young man living at Bewdley, had his house broken into and £3 stolen by a youth. Sturge did not prosecute the boy as he would have been sentenced to death. Instead, Sturge started the first school for the reclamation of young offenders at Birmingham. John Howard's is the most illustrious name in the annals of prison reform. Mary Carpenter in whose home at Bristol Raja Ram Mohan Roy died and who was deeply interested in India and her people, was also an assiduous worker in the cause. The Quakers who had themselves often been imprisoned in the early years of their movement, took the leading part in and were the great supporters of prison reform. The need for separating young criminals from elderly ones and giving them educational training, was earliest realised in Germany. The first institution for young offenders, Pankhurst, was founded in England in 1838 on the model of Raus Haus at Hamburg established in 1833. Pankhurst proved a failure because it was in name as in fact a prison. At about the same time a reformatory was established at Mettrai, near Tours in France. Mettrai was planned on the liberal lines of a French school. It was a boy who had been in the Mettrai institution and subsequently entered Pankhurst, who replied, when he was asked why he had not tried to escape from Mettrai as he had twice tried to do from Pankhurst, "because there are no walls" at Mettrai.

Since the middle of the last century the subject of reclaiming young offenders has been frequently the subject of legislation in England. Sir William Harcourt, described by John Bright as the most humane Home Secretary he had known, tried to find alternative means of dealing with young delinquents. His measures met with opposition from no less a personage than Queen Victoria who expressed herself as "disturbed by what she felt was undue tenderness to offenders." Sir William, as became a descendant of the Plantagenets, stood his ground. He gave instances of boys and girls of tender years, being again and again sent to prison with criminals, coming out every time with their hearts hardened. He wrote:

> Sir William humbly begs leave to represent to your Majesty that protracted imprisonment in such cases has an injurious effect both upon the physical and moral nature of children of tender years. The child who has been guilty only of some mischievous or thoughtless prank which does not partake of the real character of crime, finds himself committed with adult criminals guilty of heinous offences to the common gaol. After a week or a fortnight's imprisonment he comes out of prison tainted in character amongst his former companions, with a mark of opprobrium set upon him, and he soon lapses into the criminal class with whom he has been identified.

The Queen surrendered. Her Private Secretary wrote to Harcourt:

> H. M. was really interested in all you said about the youthful criminals. She would like to whip them, but it seems that cannot be done. What she objected to was not being forewarned of these numerous remissions.

Mrs. Cadbury comments on this, "One wonders what punishments were used in the royal nursery."

Mrs. Cadbury's book brings the subject up to date but she had not the proposals before her of the Prison Reform Bill since introduced in Parliament by Sir Samuel Hoare, the present Home Secretary. In her concluding remarks, Mrs. Cadbury suggests that some thing should be done for young offenders who would laugh at probation but who do not need the long training at a Borstal institution. Sir Samuel has tried to meet this need by his scheme of Howard Houses. Offenders will be sent in the first instance to these State hostels under "residential control." They will go out every day to work in normal conditions in factories, shops or offices, earning the normal wage and contributing towards the cost of their maintenance. This scheme has attracted much attention in the English Press though there seems to be felt some doubt as regards its effectiveness for the purpose intended. The Economist's comment may be regarded as typical. It observes:

> The attendance centres provide for young offenders from seventeen to twenty-three the punishment which we used to know and hate in our school days as being "kept in;" and juvenile centres will perform the same office for offenders aged from twelve to seventeen. While their innocent companions are enjoying the pictures or watching football, these young people will go to their centres and submit themselves to "appropriate occupation and instruction"—and how they will detest it. There will be no glamour about this punishment and, if the scheme can be made to function, it will, we may hope, have solved the problem of an unpleasant discipline free of prison taint.

The success of the scheme, as of all schemes of social reform, depends entirely on finding the right type of men to take charge of its working.

* George Allen and Unwin, Price 3s 6d.

Mrs. Cadbury insists on the persons entrusted with the work, having a deep knowledge of spiritual values and there being complete honesty of purpose. "They must also possess the power to make the child understand that behind all the strange procedure is an earnest desire to help him and that the action taken is in his own interest."

BOMBAY GOVERNMENT AND MUSLIM INTERESTS.

The Government of Bombay have issued a lengthy Press Note rebutting allegations against them in a Muslim League pamphlet of neglect of Muslim interests. We have not seen the pamphlet which is said to run to 82 pages, five and a half of which are devoted to Bombay grievances. Several of the "grievances" put forward are trivial, some are no grievance at all. But a few are substantial defects affecting not Muslim interests only but detrimental to administrative integrity and efficiency. Of the last class is the circular issued by Government directing district officials to consult the Presidents of district Congress committees regarding nominations to local bodies and municipalities and the allocation of seats on different bodies. The complaint of the Muslim League is that no similar orders have been issued about consulting Muslim League officials. If the issuing of the circular was right in itself, not only the Muslim League but every other communal organisation may justifiably regard it as a grievance that it was left out. But the circular itself is a violation of the principle of responsible Government. District officials and all other civil servants are responsible only to the Government—the Ministers in charge of their respective Departments—and should not be required to exercise the powers vested in them in consultation with political parties of any complexion whatsoever. The civil servant must be kept out of politics, which it is practically impossible for him to do if he is required to accept the local party leader as his consultant in the execution of some part of his duties. In plain words, the circular makes district administration a part of the machinery of the political party which is in power. The action of Government is, as we have said, objectionable in principle. In practice, it is open to grave abuses. Every one knows how seats on local boards and municipalities are eagerly sought after from personal objects. In recent municipal elections in some places the public was startled and scandalised at some of the names inscribed on the Congress ticket. The direction to the district officers to consult the chairman of the local Congress committee, is virtually a direction to him to nominate the man recommended by that functionary. Local Congress Committees are not in all places manned by the most disinterested or most respected persons in the place. There are sometimes rival factions. To interlock the administration with a political party organisation is always a dangerous and, in the present circumstances, a calamitous course for any Government to adopt.

Of the second group of grievances which are no grievances at all, the objection to the singing of Bande Mataram by schoolboys is a conspicuous example. Our opinion of the singing of this song in public has been more than once stated. It is that the singing of it as a war-cry or challenge in places where it may hurt any one's feelings, is improper and should be avoided. But we can not understand the Muslim objection that the song should not be sung on any occasion because it is, according to its view, offensive to Muslim ears. Some local bodies in Bombay Province, it would seem, have prescribed the singing of this song at the commencement of the day's work in the schools conducted by them. If the order is made applicable to Muslim schools it should be withdrawn immediately. But in schools where the song is not only not offensive but gives pleasure, there should be no objection to its being chanted, and if the objection of the Muslim League be to this, it is not only factious but an affront to those who do not share its prejudice. Minority rights do not include the right to dictate to the majority what it should sing and what it should not. The Muslim League objection to Bande Mataram seems to be that it savours of idolatry. Four-fifths of the people of India are and have been for centuries avowed idolators. He would be a bold man who would assert that all those who do not worship idols are better men and women than all those who worship them. The writer himself has not felt for many years past the need of images as aids to his devotions. But he has known many men and women, living and dead, of whom he can truly aver that he was unworthy to untie the latchets of their shoes. Another grievance of the League was that during a time of riots some Muslim papers were suppressed. Government's reply is that two Hindu newspapers were also suppressed. Suppression of newspapers and other such repressive measures are proofs that Government have failed in their duty of preventing causes of public discontent from accumulating. But if under special circumstances coercion has to be resorted to, surely it is absurd to urge in answer to the League's grievance that Hindu papers also have been penalised. The attitude of mind on the part of a Government that it must, in order to defend itself against the charge of communal bias, take some action against Hindus whenever it finds itself obliged to take action against Muslims and vice versa, can not but lead to injustice being done to one or the other community. One really wonders whether the two Hindu papers against which action was taken, suffered wholly for their sins or partially at least as a set-off against the action against the four Muslim papers. Government turn the tables on the Muslim League by showing that in the Services during its regime Muslims have received preferment in excess of their population proportion. Here, again, we ask, do Government allocate its posts on a consideration of the needs of the administration and the merits of the candidates or even partly as a solatium to communal claims? Congress by its latter day attitude to communal questions is too deeply committed to view administrative questions from the communal standpoint. But we do hope that the time is not too far off when Indian Ministers will refuse to justify or defend their conduct on any but the highest plane of public interest.

FREUDIAN SOCIOLOGY.

We saw last week that Professor Pryns Hopkins in his book on the "Psychology of Social Movements," reduces the five or ten Commandments of the main religions to the expression of certain utilitarian ideas. The idea underlying utilitarian philosophy is that Man's only motive in life is to avoid pain and to achieve pleasure. There is really not much distinction between the two. Avoidance of Pain is itself Pleasure—perhaps the only pleasure achievable by man. For the hungry man a meal is the height of pleasure. For a sick man to be well again is the be-all and end-all of existence. Habitual sufferers from constipation experience and manifest when they have a free motion the ecstacy of a mystic who has seen God face to face. When you have mislaid your spectacles or false teeth, there is no joy equal to that which you feel on finding it. It may be urged that this Pleasure-Pain theory does not account for the satisfaction one feels in acts of altruism. The supporter of this theory is ready with his answer. Altruism is only an extension of egoism. Bacon has pointed out that the precept, "Love your neighbour as yourself" postulates your love of yourself which is the pattern model for your love of your neighbour. If you do not love yourself, if you despise yourself, you can not, according to this theory, love your neighbour. You must rather despise him as you despise yourself. Hedonism thus falls under two heads: Psychological Hedonism and Ethical Hedonism. Psyshological Hedonism may be equally aptly termed Physiological Hedonism because Psychology to this school of thinkers is only a reflection of Physiology.

Adam Smith wss the precursor of the hedonistic or utilitarian school of thought. His Wealth of Nations was its earliest gospel. Mrs. Webb in her autobiography puts its teaching in the form of an eleventh Commandment: "Whosoever sells a cow cheap goes to hell." Ruskin described the gospel and its author in a comprehensive anathema, "The half-bred half-witted Scotchman who taught the deliberate blasphemy: 'Thou shalt hate the Lord, thy God, damn his laws and covet thy neighbour's goods'." Adam Smith made Wealth in goods and cash the sole criterion of happiness. Bentham's "good" included other things besides "goods". It was thus an improvement on Adam Smith's philosophy, rather it was an extension of the definition of Wealth to cover satisfactions other than the purely economic. Bentham substituted Happiness for Wealth as the aim of life. A man may derive 'happiness' not only from his own physiological satisfactions but also from doing good to his neighbour. It made room for the Good Samaritan who had been left out of Adam Smith's philosophy. Sigmund Freud has reduced Adam Smith's as well as Bentham's categories to the single category of the libido. Pryns Hopkins' summary of the Freudian Gospel is the tersest and clearest we have seen. Freud as doctor had to deal with mental aberrations and he started with the hypothesis that there must be one cause underlying all aberrations and that it must in some way be connected with Sex. In order to fit in his facts to his theory that mental aberrations could be traced to some kind of sex repression, he resorted to forced explanations of which the following taken from Dr. Hopkins' book is a fair sample. Freud had found that in several cases of neurosis, mostly of women whom he had treated, there was a story of a violent sexual assault upon the patient by an older male relative while the patient was still a child. We quote Dr. Hopkins:—

> Freud had sought for outside confirmation of these stories, and he had been able to see that in most cases they were quite untrue. Yet their importance in the patient's emotional life was clearly profound He concluded that the 'memories' of these imagined events, since they could not relate to fact, related to childish dreams. Now day-dreams, it is notorious, are born of unsatisfied desires. These stories then furnished evidence not of what had happened to the patient, but what the patient as a child had desired to happen.

Gandhiji did not enquire whether the incidents reported to him by some college girls, on which he launched his indictment of college girls as a class, did happen to the reporters or were only desired by them to happen to them! Freud came upon another factor, personally disconcerting to himself, namely that several of his female patients had fallen in love with himself and had made up stories to excite his sympathy.

Whatever we may make of the Freudian philosophy, we are at a loss to know how Dr. Hopkins expects to explain social phenomena by this peculiarly individualistic doctrine. Society consists of individuals but the social mind is not the arithmetical total of the minds of the individual men and women who compose it. Every individual has his aptitudes, tendencies, temperaments and motives, inherited and acquired, and when these are thrown into the social cauldron, many of them destroy or cancel each other. The ruler and the ruled, the judge and the criminal, the robber and the robbed, the employer and the worker, together constitute the social organism and it is plain that the organism itself must have a mind in which all contradictions are eliminated and fused into a living whole. How can the Oedipus complex, for instance, help us to understand the outstanding social movements of the day, Fascism in Italy, Nazism in Germany and Bolshevism in Russia? What particular complex impels General Franco with Moroccan troops to invade the land which the latter once ruled and from which they were expelled later by Christians? General Franco is now engaged in restoring Spain to Christianity with the help of the Moroccans. Or take Japan. Japan got her religion and civilization from China. What libido now impels her to repay the Chinese for their generosity by bombs and bullets? Dr. Hopkin's theory that men join armies and go to war for the pleasure of being in physical contact with numbers of other men under the impulse of homosexuality, does not tally with the fact that in most countries in times of peace and in all countries in times of war, men have to be conscripted to the army. There is something in the statement that the slogan of protection of their women as a motive to war, may be traced to a sexual impulse.

PROBLEMS OF AN INDIAN SCHOOLMASTER.

(BY S. V. KAMAT, SIRSI.)

It is deplorable that the importance of a teacher's functions is not yet fully recognised in India. Here and there a minister or a politician indulges in high sounding phrases about the onerousness of teachers' responsibilities and the importance of their place in society, but the talk rarely fructifies in action. The teacher, even after two years of office-acceptance by the Congress, is left where he was; his prospects are as gloomy as before and his status is still worse than that of a menial. Many leaders of fame and almost all the education-ministers of the Congress provinces, have not been slow in singing the glories of the teacher's profession, but they have not been able yet to help the teachers to improve their lot.

The regeneration of a nation mainly depends on its teachers; they are the main props of a country's civilization. The half-fed, imperfectly trained and semi-cultured teachers, grovelling in poverty, will never be able to raise the nation higher: Just as an edifice, if it should stand firmly requires to be erected on a sound foundation, so the education and culture of a country if they should be deeply-rooted, should rest on teachers of efficient training and highest culture. The teachers must be made free from worries by supplying to them the necessities as well as the amenities of life. Unless this is done, mere sympathetic talk of ministers will end in smoke.

Many persons might be under the impression that Indian education has suffered for want of a sound scheme. "Prepare an ideal scheme, and that will bring about the educational salvation of India;" this is what many leaders might think. But to attach more importance to the scheme than to the teachers who are expected to handle it, is as absurd as to concentrate all attention on a carriage paying no attention to the feeding of the horse that is expected to draw it. A half-starved horse is rarely expected to draw successfully the carriage, however ideal the carriage may be; but one can be sure of reaching the destination with the help of a well-fed horse, even though the carriage is half-broken and clumsy. Similarly, an educational scheme, however bright and sound it may look, will hardly be able to carry the country farther unless it is worked by teachers who possess the strength of mind and body.

For the last one year the attention of Congress ministers is concentrated on schemes; they have paid no attention to the amelioration of the teacher or to the alleviation of his hardships. In this respect the ministers have put the cart before the horse. "First of all try to strengthen the teacher by improving his lot and then introduce an ideal scheme." This is the advice that any sane man can offer to the Government. But the Government, it appears, wants to dazzle the country by talking about lofty schemes without doing the necessary spade-work in improving the status of teachers, which is so very essential for the educational uplift of India. Happy will be the day, when the Government realises that the success of an educational scheme lies not in the scheme itself but in betterment of teachers' prospects, and begins to work in that direction by improving their salaries and by multiplying their facilities for receiving the right kind of training.

The All India Educational Conference that met at Bombay recently, passed an important resolution that the country should be prepared for democratic Government by the teachers. This is really good, and the teachers who do not try to make their students democratic in their outlook are not worth the salt. But the present teacher who is low paid and low levelled in culture cannot be expected to drive the country on democratic lines. A meagrely paid teacher with a large family depending on his support and surrounded by an illiterate and unsympathetic public, will more often think of dragging his miserable existence by fair or foul means than of inculcating the high ideals of democracy in the minds of his students. The Government requires full-fledged citizens imbued with the spirit of democracy to run the administration of the country. How can such citizens be produced by starving teachers, whose outlook is narrowed down by the severe strife for existence? Democratic reforms cannot be effected by mere talk or resolutions. If the Government and leaders mean to do something solid to promote the growth of democracy in India, the lot of teachers should be substantially improved.

Another thing that is necessary for the growth of democratic ideas among the students is complete freedom of speech for the teacher. Without this nothing can be done. The teacher should be treated as of a higher position than the legislator and should be given full freedom to express his views either for or against any leader or political institution or the Government. The teacher must be looked upon as the real moulder of the future society and he must be conferred upon special privileges to criticise the national leaders and the dominating political parties of the country. I am afraid that such privileges are denied to teachers even under the Congress regime. There are instances of teachers being gagged by Congress Committees for having adversely criticised the Congress leaders and their activities. Such unsympathetic attitude of the Congress will hinder the growth of democracy in India and reduce the teachers to the position of slaves. How can such slaves be expected to develop democratic spirit among students is a question. Unless the Congress governments make a public declaration that the teachers have full freedom of speech, the hands of teachers will not be free and they will be much handicapped in their endeavours to help the democratic uplift of the country.

Hence, I press for two immediate steps to be taken to improve the educational and democratic tone of India. One is improvement of teachers' salaries and the other is the complete freedom of speech for them. Before launching these two reforms, talking about educational and democratic upheaval is a cry in the wilderness.

PRIMARY SCHOOLS IN DHARWAR.

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

I give Dharwar's experience of holding Primary Schools in two sessions, from 7-30 a. m. to 10 a. m. and from 3 p. m. to 5 p. m. from 1-7-1938. Prior to this, these were held in one continuous session from 11-30 a. m. to 5 p. m.

Only about 20 per cent of the children from each class are present on every morning at prayers. The evening attendance is also low. Poor students, the largest number attending these schools, suffered great hardships in the rains. Is it in the interest of the children that they should be required to make two trips in the rains without any adequate protection against it?

Late and small morning attendance was traced to the late rising of the children. W. D. Halliburton, M. D., says in his Physiology, "It should be recognised by the public that sleep is the period of anabolism, repair and growth and a large allowance is therefore necessary in growing children, who amongst the lower classes are seriously harmed by loss of sleep." Gandhiji's views are also similar and strong on this point. Medical books say that a minimum of ten hours sleep is essential for growing children. Every mother's experience is that the children have got to be forceably awakened from their morning slumber. Is it in the interest of the children that they should be awakened from their sleep for attending morning schools?

Statistics collected repeatedly and recently on 30-12-1938 from boys and girls' schools have revealed that not only the attendance is low, but excepting a few boys and girls who had come with a cup of tea or with a mouthful of fried rice, the rest of them all had come with hungry stomachs. Very few had observed the hygienic rules such as teeth-brushing, etc. Is it in the interest of the children that they should attend morning schools with hungry stomachs and with uncleaned teeth?

Nearly four thousand boys and girls of tender age are bearing these hardships for the last six months.

A monster application bearing the signatures of about a thousand parents and guardians of all castes, creeds and denominations from every part of the city against the present system has been sent under the signatures of:—

H. R. Desai, B. A. LL. B.
D. S. Kulkarni, B. A. LL. B.
S. R. Sunthankar, B. A. LL. B.
G. R. Side ur, B. A. LL. B.
S. B. Karandikar, B. A. LL. B.
V. S. Kulkarni, B. Ag.
S. R. Kirloskar, M. B. B. S.

to the Chairman of the School Board, and copies have been forwarded to the General Body, Inspector of Schools, S. D. Dharwar, Director of Public Instruction, Poona, and the Hon. Prime Minister, Mr. B. G. Kher, Minister of Education, without any effect. I have just received an acknowledgement from the Senior Assistant Secretary to Government of Bombay, to my petition of 25-12-1938.

The question of timings of primary schools, seemingly insignificant, is really of vital importance as it seriously affects the health, growth and education of India's future generation.

Is there no remedy to redress the hardships of these children?

JESUS AND THE JEWS.

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

May I correct a very serious mistake made in your issue of December 17th? Under heading, "A Suggestion for the World Missionary Conference" is seen the sentence "The plain reason is that every Christian child is taught from its infancy to hate the Jew as belonging to the race which killed Jesus Christ.' No doubt this statement is made in good faith but one wonders from what authority: There are cranks, fools and fanatics to be found in every community, even collections of such people scattered here and there over Europe. Beyond these few exceptions, the above sweeping assertion has no foundation in fact. Some Christians may dislike the Jews in the same way that they might find Germans, Italians and other races uncongenial to them, but not for the above-stated reason. Those blessed with truly Christian parents will have learnt the "Gospel Story" from their lips. They would have been told that the Jews were a people "chosen of God" to be the race in which God Himself was to take human form. We have just been celebrating the birth of the Jewish Babe. The horror with which our childish hearts might have been moved against those Jews who were responsible for the Crucifixion of our Lord (whatever may have been the part taken by the Roman Government in the event) was stilled by His dying prayer,

"Father forgive them, for they know not what they do."

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

Your editorial comments on the crucifixion of Christ, which appeared in your issue of 24th December, 1938 have just been brought to my attention and I hasten to offer a few remarks thereon.

You assert that the Gospel accounts are false because they say that the Hebrew priests demanded the execution of Christ. Not a shred of evidence is offered in support of your assertion. Merely to say that the authors of the Gospels were indulging "in vilification of their kith and kin" is to beg the question. Where are the historical documents which contradict the Gospel story?

That the Gospels are genuinely historical is seen from the following:

1. All the four Gospels agree that Jesus was accused of blasphemy by the leaders of Jewry, and sentenced to death by Pilate at the instance of the Jewish mob, which clamoured for his blood.

2. The Gospels are early documents, the oldest of them, St. Mark, having been written about 65 A. D. only thirty years after the events in question. So then there must have been many who were in a position to contradict the accounts, if they were false.

3. The Gospel story already existed and was being circulated long before the Gospels were written, thus giving contemporaries an opportunity to contradict the apostolic testimony.

4. The facts concerning the trial and death of Jesus are recorded with such fulness of detail, giving the names of the persons involved and the public nature of the events that had they been false, their falsity could have been easily exposed.

5. The Jews demanding the death of Jesus is not stated as though it were a matter admitting of doubt, and therefore, requiring proof, but as if it were a well-known and accepted fact.

6. Till quite recent times the Jews never denied their ancestors' complicity in the execution of Christ. On the contrary they admitted it. Even to-day many Jews regard Jesus as an impostor, who was justly accused of blasphemy and executed as a criminal. To quote another: "Little is said about Jesus in the Talmud, except that he was a scholar of Joshua Ben Perachiah (who lived a century before!), accompanied him into Egypt, there learned magic, was seducer of the people and was first stoned, then hung as a blasphemer, after forty days during which no one came forward to speak in his favour." (Farrar, Life of Christ, p. 656).

Happily a different view of Jesus prevails among enlightened Jewry today, who in the light of his historical importance as a world force, have come to regard him as a great teacher and reformer. The late Claud Montefiore called him the most influential figure of history. Among other Jewish writers who have eulogized Jesus might be mentioned Spinoza, Paul Goodman, Klausner, Grattner and Einstein. There have also been many distinguished Jewish converts to Christianity in modern times, such as Felix Mandelssohn, the composer, Heine, the poet, Neander, the great church historian and champion of orthodox Christianity against the rationalism of Tubingen, Benjamin Disræli, the statesman, Adolph Saphir, David Baron, F. C. Gilbert, Sir Leon Levison and others.

Bombay, 11-1-1939. } Yours etc., HARRY W. NISSANKA.

To those who like our correspondent believe that the accounts of the crucifixion in the Gospels are historically correct, we have nothing to say. But there has grown up a considerable volume of opinion in favour of the belief that Jesus was crucified not for his heresy from orthodox Judaism but for sedition against the Roman Power. This view was accepted and adopted by the Poet Laureate, John Masefield in his "Good Friday." We quoted his lines. In view of this growth of opinion, we suggested that the account of the Crucifixion in the Gospels should be revised, and that the revision would remove the chief source of anti-Semitism in Christian countries. The Indian Christian weekly, the Guardian of Madras, supported our suggestion. "We join the Indian Social Reformer," it observed in its issue of the 23rd December, "in the appeal to the World Missionary Conference to urge the Christian Church to take definite action for mitigating the racial virus. For some years now, the importance of presenting the story of the crucifixion without the customary accusation of Jews has been realized. So ancient a prejudice will not die easy and a campaign of unusual vigour must be conducted to repair past wrong."—Ed., I. S. R.

SATYAGRAHA IN HYDERABAD.

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

It is three months now since suddenly the Satyagraha movements were launched, within a few days of each other, by three different organisations styled "the Hindu Civil Liberties Union"; the "Arya Defence League" and the "Hyderabad State Congress", respectively. During this period a hundred and fifty persons have offered themselves for arrest as a non-violent disobedience of law and have been charged for a breach of peace and order. The mild lathi charges and stern action by the police have drawn a lot of criticism and been dubbed as "repression" and the whole tranquility of the city has been disturbed. But allowing even for the exuberances of nationalist writers and speakers one cannot call the present outburst a political awakening.

The first two organisations are avowedly communal and sectarian. They also make no effort to hide the fact that they rely on agencies outside Hyderabad for inspiration and guidance. The Hindu Mahasabha and the International Aryan League are said to be sponsoring their activities. The Satyagraha of these two bodies is supposed to be the outcome of religious disabilities, though their demonstrations are not based on formulated grievances but are carried out by sentimental appeals to the religious susceptibilities of an otherwise peaceful public.

While responsible Hindu public opinion appears to be in sympathy with the demand for redress of some religious disabilities, it is felt that, apart from minor local difficulties which could well be removed by constitutional representation, the alleged disabilities are common to all citizens of the State. They are generally held not to justify the Satyagraha demonstrations which are being periodically staged, and are likely to mar the communal harmony so essential to political advancement in the State. These activities are decried by the State Congress which is professedly non-communal and by the large majority of clear thinking yet politically minded members of the Hindu community. Such activities are seriously looked upon as an aggression by the Mohamedans who have denounced the activities through the local press. It is not surprising, therefore, that a Government which recognises its responsibilities to its law-abiding subjects should firmly resist this flagrant defiance of established authority.

What is further resented by the Government and the people alike is the fact that outside agitators—individuals and institutions availing themselves of the opportunity for unbridled license offered by a communal press and uncontrolled public platforms—are indulging in misrepresentations likely to cause considerable communal disharmony and are delighting in vilifications calculated to bring the Government of the Nizam into disrepute. This Government, though averse to offending national public opinion, feels itself embarrassed by such outside activities and is compelled to denounce them, while it is left with no option but to put down firmly, in the best interest of society, any inflammatory activities even though they are characterised by non-violence.

It is necessary to add that about a year ago Sir Akbar Hydari received a deputation of leading Hindu citizens and assured them of a sympathetic consideration of their representations. That consideration to such representation was given without outside interference, is evident from the facts that Sir Akbar and his Government have recently introduced several measures calculated to ameliorate the condition of the agricultural classes of the State, the bulk of whom are Hindus. To mention a few, liberal remissions of land revenue have recently been given; an enquiry has been instituted for the reduction permanently of the rates of land revenue assessment. Legislation has been introduced to mitigate the indebtedness of the agriculturist and rural development scheme of a very comprehensive nature have been worked out. The Co-operative Societies, the Agricultural Department, the Industries Department, the Veterinary Department and the Medical Department have all contributed their quota to the ryots' welfare. Further to conciliate Hindu public opinion a Hindu Assistant Director of the Ecclesiastical Department has been appointed to safeguard the religious interests of the Hindus; a Committee which will later take on the duties of a Public Services Commission has been appointed to regulate entry into services and meet the Hindu demand for larger representation in Government service and other efforts are being made in educational and other fields of nation building activity to give due consideration to Hindu requirements and claims.

The State Congress Satyagraha stands on a different plane. Though in common with other subversive movements it is at present being put down by Government, it commands the sympathy of a large number of politically minded people and once the suspicion that clouds its activities is dispelled it will, if run on broad national lines, eventually be a potent influence for good in the country. It is professedly a purely nationalistic and non-communal institution. Its creed is the attainment of responsible Government under the aegis of the Nizam. Unfortunately the State Congress came into existence at a time when the political atmosphere was charged with communal feelings. Government felt that because of its one-sided membership it had communal potentialities and at the time had the making of a communal institution in the guise of a political one. Before this suspicion could have been allayed by the Unity talks which were going on between accredited spokesmen of the two important communities (the Hindus and Mohamedans) the State Congress launched out its Satyagraha campaign and thus precipitated a crisis. This action was looked upon by the Government as a flouting of authority and by the Muslim community as a definite aggression calculated to overpower them and deprive them of their long enjoyed interests.

The fact that most of the well-known Hindu leaders have abstained from participating in the State Congress activity gives evidence to the belief that the present form of the State Congress organisation and its aspirations are such as to mar rather than speed up national political advancement in the State. It is pertinent to add that no Muslim, Anglo-Indian or Parsi has so far associated himself with the movement implying that its bona-fides is still questionable and that it does not enjoy the confidence of all communities. At a time when the Nizam's Government were doing much to implement their nation-building and social services; when a scheme of reforms calculated to give the people a greater share in the Government is being devised and when the Government has shown in more ways than one its desire to meet the wishes and redress the grievances of the people, the starting of a Satyagraha movement to obtain political redress is looked upon as a aggressive and dictatorial interference in the process of Hyderabad's political evolution.

Notwithstanding the clouded outlook of the political situation one cannot help feeling that the peaceful manner in which civil disobedience is being carried out and the moderation and restraint shown by the authorities are indications of the underlying goodwill which may lead to an amicable settlement of the large issues involved. A gesture of tolerance was recently made by the Government when on representation that some Satyagrahists were maltreated by the police while in custody, a public judicial enquiry by a Parsi Magistrate has been ordered. An effort is being made through spokesmen of the Hindu and Muslims to conduct "Unity Talks" with a view to presenting a common national demand based on mutual understanding and a spirit of accommodation.

Yours etc.,
J. T. FERNANDES

THE TRAVANCORE SCENE.

(BY A CORRESPONDENT.)

The political scene in Travancore presents intricate features. Though some days ago the Working Committee of the State Congress accepting Gandhiji's objective view of the matter withdrew the personal allegations against the Dewan and though, following this wise and fair-spirited step of the Working Committee, the Government of His Highness the Maharaja has brought to an end the judicial proceedings apropos these allegations the political atmosphere in the State still remains overwrought with personal animosity. The purification of the movement achieved by the Working Committee by the revocation of the allegations, has led to a division within the State Congress itself. The dissentients professing to speak for the bulk of the State Congress following, vehemently maintain that the withdrawal of the allegations if generally acquiesced in is bound to take 'the wind out of their sails' and have, therefore, set at nought the action of the Working Committee. Mr. E. John Kuruvilla, the leader of the secession, and the Travancore Youth League, who apparently seem to be now working in close collaboration with him, make no secret of their conviction that the ways of the Indian National Congress are inapplicable to their movement and that Mahatma Gandhi and his pet notions concerning truth and non-violence can only impede its progress. They have no faith in any of the categories in the 'constructive programme' of the parent Congress and loudly arraign the prohibition propaganda arranged by the State Congress Council of Action as an appropriate addendum to the withdrawal of the allegations, which, by the way, they are doing all that lies in their power to revive and drive home with truculence to the minds of the unsophisticated people of the State. And whereas the Council of Action has set its face against any sort of demonstration during the viceregal visit, the Kuruvilla Party and the Youth League want to let loose a storm to convince his Excellency of their strength and the desirability of placating them.

To those who knew the ins and outs of the Travancore agitation, it was clear from the very beginning that personal and communal prejudices formed the predominating forces in it and that the cry of responsible government adopted by the leaders only served to cover these forces from public observation. The 'masses' in the State whose participation in the agitation was acclaimed by interested parties as an incontrovertible proof of their imperative hunger for a 'fuller' political life, probably know as much about responsible government as of conditions on the other side of the moon. Indeed, the people of Travancore have far too little experience of misrule and far too much of orderly progressive and benevolent administration to make them actively desire a change in the method of the State's government. The idea of responsible government has never been crystallised in their minds by political disabilities or economic sufferings such as might be prevented by forethought or benevolence on the part of the authorities. It may be that responsible government is the birthright of every man in the world, let alone the belying conditions rampant in a major part of Europe itself; and that monarchy, however enlightened, progressive, parental and responsive to the needs and wishes of the people, is outmoded and debunked beyond redemption. Fortunately, the people of Travancore know little of either the one or the other and look upon the Maharaja as the visible embodiment of the excellent and unique progress which have now become almost a tradition in the State.

It is absurd to speak of a 'freedom movement' in Travancore because in no other part of India are people more free in political or social life. It is equally absurd to presume that the now so-called autonomous provinces in British India occupy a more advanced stage in political evolution than such well-governed and highly prosperous States as Travancore or Mysore. In fact, the monarchical principle cannot be said to be intrinsically inferior to the democratic one and a corrupt or a communal democracy can no doubt be as bad as, if not worse than, the misrule of a tyrant. Both monarchy and democracy have existed on this planet from the very dawn of history and both exist today, perhaps with slight terminological differences, and displaying different degrees of excellence or the opposite. The common assumption that the States as a class are 'backward' and the provinces 'advanced' and that therefore it would be a 'come-down' for the provinces to federate with the States is highly nauseating if not positively mischievous. And Travancore, for instance, may well turn to Madras and say, "Physician, heal thyself!" in more than one matter.

There is absolutely no ground for any determined struggle for responsible government in Travancore,

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

and there is, in fact, none going on in the State. The movement in Travancore is personal and communal with a certain admixture of economic causes emanating from unemployment of educated youths and depression in agricultural market. It is personal in more senses than one, being partly directed against the Dewan for his imaginary interest in the downfall of a bank and partly actuated by the politico-official aspirations of the principal leaders. It is communal because these leaders have each his communal following and since they belong to different communities some colour was lent to their contention that their movement had brought about a wonderful unification of the warring communities in the State. Today, Kuruvilla has seceded, bitterly proclaiming his grievance about the withdrawal of the allegations against the Dewan, and it remains to be seen how many Syrian Christians would still remain faithful to the State Congress to-morrow, though he is not the only Syrian Christian leader in the movement. It is communal again in the sense that the leaders have fully capitalised the communal passions of their respective followers in order to set their minds against a man belonging to another community. It is an artificial movement in every sense and bolstered up by lying propaganda amongst simple-minded folks living in a highly-strung communal atmosphere and incapable of thinking for themselves, an artificial movement engineered by a few astute individuals with axes of their own to grind.

Undoubtedly, Sir C. P. Ramaswami Aiyar has deserved well of Travancore. The Temple Entry Proclamation, that bright great morning star of a new socio-religious era not only in the State but throughout India, will ever testify to his nobility, greatness and courage. His far-sighted industrialisation plan for the economic rehabilitation of the State has been impeded by this sudden and distracting political storm, but there is no reason to doubt that he will apply himself to it with redoubted vigour directly conditions swerve round to the normal. Under him the general administration of the State has acquired a new efficiency and expanded its day-to-day activities in not a few significant directions. Nor should we forget the Travancore University, that abiding monument to his energy and vision, which given a few years more he is bound to make into an example worthy to be followed by the other universities of India.

ARABS IN PALESTINE.

We the undersigned non-official British residents of long standing in Palestine, wish to emphasize certain points, an understanding of which we feel is essential to a just solution of the present problems.

1. The failure of Government to take into account Arab opposition to its policy in Palestine during the last 20 years has led many Arabs to believe that the only way in which they can call attention to their grievances is by the use of violence. Many of them deplore such methods; yet we believe the vast majority of the Arab population, both Moslem and Christian, is in whole-hearted sympathy with the national rebellion.

The injustices inflicted on many innocent persons through the imposition of collective fines, demolition of houses and arrests, have further embittered them and strengthened their unity. Consequently the Arab population as a whole is dominated by, and at the mercy of, the orders of the rebel leaders. Unwillingness to conform to such orders has, in many cases, resulted in a distressing loss of life.

2. The Arabs' continued friendship towards individual Britishers uninterrupted during the strife of the past two years, despite their repeated disappointments over Government's policy, offers hope that there is still a basis of mutual goodwill upon which confidence in H. M. G. can be rebuilt.

3. Now that the Arabs are genuinely dominated by the fear of eventual Jewish control of the country, it is essential for H. M. G. to give some definite assurance that in no circumstance would they permit the percentage of Jews in the country to exceed 40% of the total population, as was suggested by Viscount Samuel in the House of Lords on July 20th, 1933. This is not far from the proportion suggested by Arabs on numerous occasions. The Arabs feel that in agreeing to accept some such figure they would be taking more than their share towards solving the problem of world Jewry.

4. Peace by negotiation is in every way better than an imposed solution. Any effort to brow-beat the Arabs unto submission before negotiations are undertaken, will but further embitter Arab feeling and make the task more difficult in the end. Negotiations, however, in our opinion, cannot begin until some way is found out of the impasse created by the deportation, exile or flight from Palestine of the recognized leaders of Arab opinion and the imprisonment of many other leading persons. The declaration of some sort of amnesty would, we believe, immediately relieve the present tension and create the atmosphere essential to the finding of a solution equitable to all concerned.

5. Finally we would call attention to the statistics of casualties from 1st July to 31st October of this year which, as published in the Palestine Post of the 1st November, 1938, amount to no less than the appaling total of 2,461 made up as follows —

Arabs	killed	1,089	—wounded	504
Jews	„	219	— „	454
British	„	42	— „	133
Others	„	9	— „	6
		1,359		1,102

To this must be added the immense loss of property which has taken place in the country.

Yours faithfully,

DR. R. K. MUKHERJEE ON HINDU IMPERIALISM.

"Ancient Hindu Imperialism" was the subject of an interesting lecture delivered to the studen and staff of the Andhra University Colleges in the University Assembly Hall, by Dr. Radha Kumud Mukherjee who came to Waltair in connection with the visit of the Bengal Land Revenue Commission, of which he is a member.

Dr. C. R. Reddi, Vice-Chancellor of the Andhra University, who presided over the meeting, in introducing the speaker to the assembly, observed that Dr. Radha Kumud Mukherjee was one of the best known researchers of the present-day in Indian History and was his colleague in the Mysore University twenty years ago.

Dr. Radha Kumud Mukherjee, in the course of his speech, suggested that they were hearing much about the anti-Imperialist front and in these anxious times all lovers of peace and harmony should hold together and stand against those tendencies of Imperialism which were really based on ideas of exploitation and domination. Dr. Mukherjee averred that the conception of Imperialism was indigenous to India and was not an importation from the West. Even as early as the Vedic period, they found distinct and concrete references to this idea of Imperialism, which was not a mere abstract speculation of theory; because considering the details with which the idea was elaborated, they had to conclude that Imperialism was a live idea. In fact it was the Hindus who had developed the idea for the first time in the world. If they carefully examined the Vedic literature, they found that even in those early days they had very clear ideas as to what Imperialism should stand for. In one of the authoritative Vedic texts in Brihadaranyaka Upanishad, they had passages describing what the ideal for the Kshatriyas or the ruling caste should be. That ideal was that a king in India should try to make himself the King of Kings and it was suggested that the king should embark upon a scheme of conquest, when only he would be able to fulfil his ruling mission and his duties towards the mother country. It was felt that a multitude of kings were not conducive to a stable political equilibrium and what was required for the stability of the political system of the country was a kind of united domination. In the old conception of polity a conception which should have modern application, it was pointed out that the ruling sovereign in Indian polity was not the king in flesh and blood. The real ideal sovereign was Dharma. The ancient law-givers took up the position that the king should not be regarded as a source and fountain of law. He could be the source of law only in a very formal manner. But the ultimate source of law was the conscience of the community and this was embodied in the highest works produced by the best brains of the community. The Vedic texts had always placed before the kings the ideal of bringing the whole of India under the umbrella of one authority.

Just now, Dr. Mukherjee continued, they were talking very much about Federation, but the Federation of the whole of India into an organic unity had been the dream of every Indian through the ages. The Hindu mind had deified the mother-country and presented it as India the mother of culture and civilisation. They had a series of national prayers based on the conception of the Mother-Goddess and in all these national prayers an aspect of the mother-country was presented, which was to cultivate a world conception of what constituted their Motherland. Finally this ordering of ideas was fixed philosophically and in a scientific manner by Sankaracharya, who established his four mutts which were the centres of his philosophy at four different places, at Sringeri, Dwarka, Puri and Hardwar, so that every disciple would be able to traverse the whole country, and create an awakening in the mass mind of the political consciousness of what constituted the mother country.

Dr. Mukherjee then referred to the days of Asoka whose record of work had impressed Mr. H. G. Wells so much that he had described him as the greatest of kings. Asoka came into inheritance of the West of the Indian territory and his empire extended from Persia for the first time, and practically the whole of India, though formally speaking, the southern limit was drawn up to Mysore. He waged only one war and that was, as he himself stated, to inaugurate a new type of Imperialism. It was not a mere polity to remain as an abstraction or as a dream or only as an ideal. It was given effect to by him as the Emperor, not only within the limits of his own Empire, but he even sent out ambassadors to Western countries with a view to spreading this doctrine. His imperialism was to be based on the ideals of having a kingdom of righteousness on earth, an empire of righteousness to be based on non-violence. It was his aim and object to abolish all those bloody wars and conquests that were disfiguring the modern annals of democracy. He inaugurated a system of Dharma Vijaya.

It was right to hunger for domination, provided that domination was the domination of spirit. In the Sanskrit literature, they had three types of conquests described and all the modern attempts could be described as one of the three types. The first was Asura Vijaya, the hunger for territory for its own sake, the second was Loka Vijaya, conquest for economic gain like the colonial ambitions of European Powers, and the third was Dharma Vijaya, the conquest of righteousness, the spread of truth, which Asoka had defined as nothing but non-violence, Ahimsa, so that there might be perfect peace.

Asoka felt so much for the war he had waged against the Kalingas, continued Dr. Mukherjee, that he turned from the spectacle of violence towards a system of non-violence. Therefore, in the practical field, he said, there should be no war for him or in that part of the world where there was his paramount voice. The result was that the whole of the country was not formally under his sovereignty, and he was giving imperial recognition to those people whose freedom he respected as a matter of ethics and not merely as a matter of politics. Asoka's scheme gave the utmost local Self-Government to the various people. He took resort to extensive decentralisation whereby many centres of authority were created, but centres from which authority was exercised according to his own rules, so that each particular part was governed on the same model.

THE TRADITIONAL HOME OF THE SANDALWOOD TREE.

It is in perfumery that the greater proportion of Sandalwood Oil is employed at the present day and to discriminating buyers, such as perfumers and soap manufacturers must of necessity be, it is hardly necessary to extol the virtues of the East Indian Oil which is without equal, both as a fine perfume base and a fixative for the increasingly popular bouquets of the Oriental type. In addition it is now being used extensively, and with marked success, in the creation of some of the more delicate perfumes in which the Sandalwood odour is not required as a predominant character.

A few trials will convince the perfumer who has not taken full advantage of the odour-value of this oil, that is of the greatest use to him, not only for predominant Sandalwood odour where required, but also a modifier and a fixative for other odours. This is true for liquid perfumes, soaps, creams, powders and all other cosmetic preparations. It will be found invaluable to those up-to-date perfumers who pride themselves on their own "creations."

NOTES.

A Garrison Letter :—Professor George P. Conger of the University of Minnesota sends us in original a letter written in his own hand more than sixty years ago by William Llyod Garrison, the great leader of the Anti-Slavery movement in the United States, whose words taken from the Liberator which he edited, have stood on the front page of the Reformer for nearly 45 years. Mr. Garrison's handwriting is one of the finest we have come across and the letter itself is fresh as if it was written last month. We value this gift very much. The letter has also a topical interest. It was written to a young man who had applied to Garrison, then resting on the laurels of his hard-won struggle, to find a job for him. We regard unemployment as a peculiar visitation of our day but it was acute sixty years ago in the United States. We reproduce the letter :

Boston, Jan. 9, 1877.

Dear Sir:

Your letter is received. In answer to it I can only express my regret that I am not in a situation to offer you any kind of employment; nor do I know of any one in the whole range of my acquaintance who would be likely to meet your wishes in this section. There are thousands here who can get nothing to do steadily, though eager to work, and, consequently, the appeals for charitable aid and friendly sympathy are multitudinious and incesant. You are a stranger to me, but I do not doubt your statement as to the satisfactory recommendations you can bring with you ; nevertheless, if you were an old acquaintance, I should be obliged to write in this manner.

Respectfully yours,

WM. LLOYD GARRISON.

J. W. Weik.

U. S. A. and Europe :—We published last week extracts from the address delivered a few months before his early and lamentable death by the Rev. Frederick B. Fisher who was for some time a Bishop of the American Methodist Church in India, and who resigned because he felt that in the conditions under which Christian Missions are allowed to work in India, the message of Jesus Christ can not be delivered in all its fulness and that, therefore, in practice they must acquiesce in, if not become active apologists of, events which they are bound to condemn consistently with the precepts of their Master. The address which was kindly sent to us by Mrs. Fisher has been with us for several months past. We were prompted to publish the extracts from it, as some recent utterances of American statesmen including the President, the tone of them more than the language, strongly confirm Dr. Fisher's characterisation of American politics, social life and even religious outlook as pale reflections of European conditions without originality, without anything creative about it. The United States has been all along declaring that she will not entangle herself again in European quarrels. But suddenly and without any obvious context, the Minister of the Interior and the President himself publicly denounce the heads of Germany and Italy in language which no responsible European statesman would indulge in even under grave provocation. Nothing can better illustrate the inferiority complex from which, Dr. Fisher said, Americans suffer in their relations with Europe. Even the Prime Minister of the Australian Commonwealth, who as a Labourite and a Catholic, has good reasons to feel aggrieved against Fascist and Nazi Governments, has felt it his duty to administer a sharp rebuke to Mr. H. G. Wells. Contrary to his wise abstention in India from personal judgments Mr. Wells spoke wildly in Australia of Herr Hitler as a lunatic at large and Signor Mussolini as a renegade from socialism. The Prime Minister of the Australian Commonwealth issued a statement regretting Mr. Wells' indiscretion and suggesting that Mr. Wells should exercise his undoubted gifts for international understanding rather than misunderstanding. Mr. Wells had ample opportunities of expressing his opinions of the dictators in England. But he would have had to choose his words more carefully. Perhaps he thought that the Australians are impressed only by Billingsgate. Mr. Lyons has told him he was mistaken.

Hyderabad Press Policy:—The Government of Hyderabad have issued a Press Note explaining the circumstances which have obliged them to adopt, in respect of entry into the State of newspapers published outside, the rule, observed in prisons, of banning all except journals which are scheduled as admissible. Much subversive propaganda in the shape of newspapers and pamphlets from British India, particularly from Bombay Province, has been imported into the State. When one paper was banned, another name was adopted and when that was proscribed, the same publication appeared under a fresh designation. Specimens of the most objectionable writings were brought to the notice of the Bombay Government who acknowledged that they were calculated to create ill-feeling between Hindus and Muslims and severely warned the publishers. But this, according to the Hyderabad communique, has not proved effective. As a last resort, the Nizam's Government are obliged to adopt the policy of proscribing all newspapers except those specially noted for admission into the State. We doubt whether this will prove more effective than the practice hitherto followed. As we said, the method has been followed in prisons but it was known in the Civil Disobedience days to have been more honoured in the breach than in the observance. A rule which can not be strictly enforced within the four walls of a prison, will not be easy to carry out over some thousand of miles of open frontiers. Violations can not be prevented and there is bound to be hardship to innocent people, corruption and blackmail.

A Common Problem :—The problem which confronts the Hyderabad Government confronts other States not only in British India but in other continents also. Nazi propaganda in British territories is becoming obnoxious. Several distinguished publicists have written on the evil. The consensus of opinion, however, is that it is best to work itself out. All the writers agree with Aldous Huxley that "the propagandist is a man who canalises an already existing stream. In a land where there is no water he digs in vain." Counter official propaganda, if it steps out of the line of demonstrable fact, only helps the propagandist. "Lies need competition if they are to retain their vigour." In the recent debates in the House of Commons on Prison Reform, the answer of a confirmed jail-breaker to the question why he did not try to escape from an experimental open prison was quoted with much effect. It was "because there were no walls to climb over." The great majority of citizens in Hyderabad as elsewhere are sensible persons who are not likely to be carried away by lying propaganda. They must be trusted to judge wisely. All writers agree that violent, false propaganda defeats its own ends. The Bombay Government has its own grievances, particularly against the Marathi Press which is also the cause of worry to Hyderabad. If it could take stronger measures than severe warnings, it would have gladly taken them. We also to think that the fears of administrators regarding the effect of false propaganda are greatly exaggerated. Many people who buy and read highly spiced criticisms, seldom accept them at their face value. If Governments pay due heed to the sober and responsible sections of the Press who have no axes of their own to grind, they will greatly minimise the popularity of the partisan section. But as a rule they pay more attention to violent writings than to sober suggestions.

Freedom of the Press :—Referring to the apprehensions felt in journalistic circles in England, regarding the effect of some recent proposals on the freedom of the Press, the Spectator somewhat airily remarks : "Pressure by Ministers is only effective so far as editors and other journalists choose to let themselves be pressed, and for the most part their reverence for the average member of the average Cabinet is not such that they are prompted to surrender their own judgment the moment a Minister looms in sight." This is quite true but even in Great Britain the Government, however poor the esteem in which individual Ministers may be held by journalists, can bring pressure to bear upon journals in various insidious ways. The journalist can, of course, preserve his independence by resigning his job. But that is not the point. In India Ministers play only a minor part—they are guided by the High Command in all important questions of policy. But a Government can demand a heavy security from a newspaper without reference to any judicial authority or giving the journalist the opportunity of justifying his writings. It may surprise the Spectator to know that proposals have been seriously mooted to penalise criticisms of the members of the Congress hierarchy even in their personal capacity. The Spectator, however, considerably blunts the edge of its remark by adding that eterna vigilance is the price of liberty and that that was never truer than at present.

Indian Christian Conference:—We have received a copy of the resolutions passed at the All-India Indian Christian Conference at Madras during Christmas week. The strong support given to the Prohibition policy in one of these resolutions will be welcomed as bringing Protestant Indian Christian opinion in line with that of the sister communities, Hindu and Muslim. It will be particularly useful in convincing Europeans in this country that their apprehensions regarding the adoption of an all India policy of Prohibition, are not shared by their Indian co-religionists. The resolution recommending that converts to Christianity from among the depressed classes, should be given the same concessions as Harijans who have escaped conversion, raises a question of principle. The great majority of converts were persuaded to quit their ancestral religion by being given to understand that only by conversion can they secure redemption from their depressed condition. The representation to the World Missionary Conference on behalf of these converts, which we published in the Reformer of December 24, clearly says so and it also says that the expectations raised have not been fulfilled. Are we to understand that in the considered opinion of the leaders of the Indian Christian Community, conversion has had no effect by way of bettering the condition of the converts, that they are much in the same plight as they were before conversion, and that they must be raised in the economic and social scale by the same means as the unconverted scheduled castes? If this is the case, Christian converts must be included among the scheduled castes as the first step towards extending to them the special measures adopted for helping the main body of their unconverted kinsfolk. It will also be necessary, as a logical corollary, to stop further conversions from these classes. We do not know if the Conference realised all the implications of its recommendation. If it did, it should have also defined its future policy towards the proselytising Missions.

Irresolutions:—In two other resolutions also on questions of current importance the same hesitation to take a definite stand is painfully evident. The resolution defining the policy of the Conference affirms that the Conference is not an organization pledged to the policy of communalism, that it is not a separate political party. Its members are free to join any political party. As there are only two non-communal political parties, the Congress and the Liberals, and as the latter are a small minority with small chance of forming a Government in any province or at the Centre, this is practically a recommendation to Indian Christians to join the Congress, notwithstanding that Sir Maharaj Singh has indicated his preference by lately joining the Liberals. As a matter of fact, Congress Government have been sympathetic to Indian Christians, one of whom, Mr. C. J. Varkey, has recently been promoted Minister in charge of the important subject of Education in the Madras Cabinet. Christians will always find the place to which their character and merits entitle them in every nationalist government. Indian Christians will naturally feel specially drawn to the Congress because of the Sermon on the Mount being one of the principal avowed sources of Gandhiji's inspiration. The first part of the resolution on Policy, however, is wiped out or almost wiped out by the second part where Indian Christians are exhorted to work and think as a community because they have been recognised as a separate community in the Government of India Act. Surely, if Indian Christians or any others really believe that they should not act as a community, no Act of Parliament can oblige them to do so. They can represent to Government that they do not want to be treated as a separate community and if the representation is supported by a large number of Indian Christians, we do not see how Government can insist on their acting as a community. Instead of adopting the line of protest, the Conference has surrendered its better judgment to the exigencies of the political situation. In the circumstances, its protest that it does not want to be a communal political party is half-hearted and must be ineffective to influence the attitude of the non-communal political parties. The same indecision is apparent in the resolution expressing the desire of the Conference to do without communal electorates. Its application is made contingent on all other communities composing their differences and agreeing to merge themselves in a single electorate.

The Modern Paradox:—One of the paradoxes of the age in which we live, is that, while on the one side many scientific and social workers are engaged in popularising the limitation of families by birth control, efforts are made by others to popularise means of making old people young. "Practical Rejuvenation in Men and Women," is the title of a book by Dr. K. V. Mathew of the Travancore State Service. In it he has brought together the several means tried in Europe and India for the purpose. After enumerating these, Dr. Mathew recommends the simple life as the best method of attaining sane and healthy old age. These are, fresh air, physical exercise, daily bath, interesting occupation, simple diet, adequate sleep, avoidance of worry, and abstinence from drink. People who observe these rules, however, are not generally speaking the people who want to be rejuvenated surgically. The people who do want it, do not want to observe any rule; they wish to follow their momentary impulses and inclinations, and expect the surgeon to keep them fit for the purpose. This desire in Europe for a protracted old age is one of the morbid cravings of post-war mentality. The Kaya Kalpa and other methods of Hindu and Unani medicine were the inventions of a degenerate age. If the prolongation of any man's life would have been a blessing to humanity, it was Lord Buddha's. But we do not read that he tried to dodge old age by Kaya Kalpa or any other device, although his personal physician was one of the most illustrious products of Taxila which specialised in medicine. None of his disciples, not even the beloved Ananda, suggested that the Master's life should be artificially prolonged by his being subjected to any rejuvenation process. The Hindu scheme of life excludes any such idea. Childhood, youth, middle age and old age have all their appointed duties and it is not permitted to extend one stage at the expense of another. Sanyas which is the prescribed rule for old age, should not be retraced for the purpose of lingering on the scenes of middle age. Neither can the middle aged man or woman by Kaya Kalpa or otherwise seek to prolong the delights of youth; nor can the youth sink back into the helplessness of puling childhood. Dr. Mathew's book is useful for the information it has brought together in the space of less than 150 pages. It can be had for Rs. 3-12 from Mrs. Annie Mathews, Kottayam.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER
BOMBAY, January 14, 1939.

LORD HAILEY ON INDIAN ADMINISTRATION.

Reference has been made more than once in the Reformer to Lord Hailey's valuable book on the territories in Africa south of the Sahara which are under British rule, and, in the case of the South African Union, constitute a self-governing Dominion. Before he went to Africa on retirement, Lord Hailey was a brilliant and very distinguished member of the Indian Civil Service. He was Finance Member of the Government of India and later Governor of the Punjab and the United Provinces. He was, it was rumoured, considered for the Indian Viceroyalty on the expiry of Lord Irwin's term. We believe that he was associated with the group of British writers who founded the quarterly review, the Round Table. He read a paper last month before a joint meeting of the Royal Empire Society and the Royal African Society on "Some African and Indian Analogies." This was a singularly inappropriate title for Lord Hailey's lecture, as the gist of it was that there was no analogy between Indian and African conditions. In India, he said, > there was no great gulf between the civilisation which they (English administrators) saw before them and that which at that time existed or had existed within historical times in Europe. In British India they had ready to their hands institutions which strongly resembled those which they already knew. As a consequence administration had the character of adaptation, co-ordination, rationalisation rather than of innovation or change.

This similarity of institutions and ideas generally accounts not only for the comparatively easy establishment of British rule but also for the ready acquiescence of the people in it. The early British administrators, it may be added, found not only similarity between Indian and their own institutions. They found that in some respects Indian civilization was superior to their own in the homeland. Sir Thomas Munro's observations in reply to a question during his examination before a Parliamentary Committee one hundred years ago, have been often quoted but they bear repetition. He was asked what he thought of Indian as compared with European civilization. He replied :

> I do not exactly understand what is meant by the civilization of the Hindus. In the higher branches of science, in the knowledge of the theory and practice of good government, and in the education which, by banning prejudice and superstition, opens the mind to receive instruction of every kind from every quarter, they are much inferior to Europeans. But if a good system of agriculture, unrivalled manufacturing skill, capacity to produce whatever can contribute to either convenience or luxury, schools established in every village for teaching reading, writing and arithmetic, the generous practice of hospitality and charity among each other, and above all, a treatment of the female sex full of confidence, respect and delicacy, are among the signs which denote a civilized people—then, the Hindus are not inferior to the nations of Europe, and if civilization is to become an article of trade between the two countries, I am convinced that this country will gain by the import cargo.

British rule was thus built largely on foundations laid by previous generations and was developed by adaptation of the institutions raised by them. Its achievements are the joint product of Indian and British effort. In the words of the historian, Seeley, the British never conquered India and could not rule her as conquerors. It was only in the third quarter of the last century that British rule took on the colour of a dominating imperialism under the influence of Hegel's philosophy, Darwin's biology and Bismark's politics.

Lord Hailey observed that if the British Government had been willing at a much earlier date to associate Indians with the administration, they might well have found themselves able to make political concessions in a form more satisfactory to Indians and to themselves. This is true and has been said of the settlement with Ireland. It was said of the break-away of the New England colonies and the formation of the United States. A war preceded the concession of self-government to South Africa. Even in Canada, there had to be something like a revolt before self-government was discovered to be the remedy for her political malady. Mr. Malcolm MacDonald mused loudly only the other day that the Dominions might cut loose from the Commonwealth before he quitted the office of Dominions Secretary. As he could not have thought that he would remain at the post for the next twenty years or even ten, the public naturally understood him to suggest that the separation of the Dominions was no longer outside the range of practical politics. Lord Hailey's remark has a special interest because he himself was partly responsible for the postponement of constitutional reform by his quibbling attitude on the meaning of the Declaration of 1917. Lord Ronaldshay (now Lord Zetland) shows conclusively in his biography of Lord Curzon that Dominion Status was definitely intended by that Declaration which was drafted by Lord Curzon himself, although he later repudiated it.

Lord Hailey's remarks on the Indian Educational system have revived a controversy which had been almost closed. He said:—

> Whatever doubts may be felt on other points, there will be many who will readily agree that our conduct of education is one of the less happy features of our rule in India. But I am not sure that they will agree with me as to the exact point on which we erred. There were not too many people educated but too few. Our fault did not lie in accepting Macaulay's famous Minute of 1835 and adopting education in English instead of Oriental languages. His policy was not unsuitable for the small circle of candidates for government employ, of whom he was chiefly thinking. Our mistake lay in a wide expansion of academic and secondary education, before we had laid a sound basis of primary education.

Sir Atul Chatterjee who spoke after Lord Hailey, pointed out that even in Great Britain there was no organised system of primary education until fifty years ago and that the criticism of Indian education, on the ground that it was not based on popular education, was not just to the early administrators. As a matter of fact, those administrators thought that the only way in which they could further popular education in the circumstances of the time, was by creating a class of educated Indians. Macaulay plainly said so in his famous but little read and much misrepresented Note. Even now, and notwithstanding Lord Hailey's criticism, the British Government has seen no better way of educating the Africans. There is no system of popular education there as yet but a Reuter's message published on Wednesday reports the appointment of Mr. George Turner, for thirteen years Master of the important English Public School, Marlborough, to be Principal of Makrere College in Uganda, and adds that the College is designed to provide advanced education for Africans mainly from Uganda, Kenya, Tanganiyika and Zanzibar, and is intended to attain full university status in a reasonable time as recommended by the Commission on Higher Education which visited East Africa last year. There is no lever more effective for raising a people in their own estimation, the first step in training them to responsible citizenship, than higher education. As Lord Hailey was speaking of University education, we quote from the despatch on the establishment of Universities in this country :

> It is neither our aim nor desire to substitute the English language for the vernacular dialects of the country. We have always been most sensible of the importance of the use of the languages which alone are understood by the great mass of the population. These languages, and not English, have been put by us in the place of Persian in the administration of justice and in the intercourse between the officers of Government and the people. It is indispensible, therefore, that in any general system of education, the study of them should be assiduously attended to.

No one who peruses the numerous despatches and reports on education which preluded the establishment of Indian universities, can fail to be struck by the earnest desire of the authorities to provide the best means of conveying the results of modern thonght to the people without neglecting the development of the vernacular languages and indigenous culture.

ADULT EDUCATION.

Commenting on the Report of the Committee appointed by the Government of Bombay to consider the training of Primary teachers, we observed, "The Committee for reasons of economy recommend that the primary school teachers should also do the work of adult education. The child mind is not the adult mind and the approaches to the two require different tempers and techniques." In a volume entitled "Towards a Literary World" by Dr. Frank Laubach published by the World Literacy Committee Foreign Missions Conference of North America (price 1.75 dollars), the question is dealt with at some length. Dr. Laubach has visited India and the book gives brief accounts of the systems followed in various countries including that of Mr. Bhagwat in Bombay. We quote a few of Dr. Laubach's observations. " Lessons and teaching methods which fit the minds of children are not suitable for adults. In the first place an illiterate adult knows a great deal more than a child of six knows. The adult is not a grown-up child but has a different type of mind." "Swift progress is necessary because the illiterate adult has a sense of inferiority and is easily discouraged." "The subject matter of a lesson must not only remain within the vocabulary of the adult, and consist of grown-up material. The lesson must be so built that the adult student can take the lead as soon as possible for he does not like to follow long. There must be the fewest words possible on the part of the teacher and the greatest possible activity on the part of the student. Nothing so annoys an adult as for the teacher to get in his way." "Teachers of adults need to have their voice under control. They must avoid speaking louder or more emphatically than usual, though pronunciation must be clear. It is the nature of all of us to remember a whisper better than a shout. We forget a shout for it is disagreeable and disagreeable experiences must be forgotten as soon as possible." "One should teach illiterates only when one is at his best...If we have been out late at night before, or have a headache or a cold or indigestion or irritating troubles, we should go into hiding until life sings for us again. The advice needed in this case is quite the contrary of that given in other undertakings. Instead of saying, 'Work hard and you will succeed", we say 'Do not teach at all when it seems like work, or you will spoil your cause."

Many or all of these may be dismissed as counsels of perfection, but surely the Government of Bombay's scheme issued this week errs at the other extreme. By the offer of a small stipend which for the poorly paid village teacher is a temptation which he can not well resist, it is left open to any primary school teacher to get himself registered as an Adult Education worker and to start and conduct an Adult Education class in the school in which he is employed. That is to say, the teacher, after he has worked five or six hours in a children's class, should teach another couple of hours or so to adults. Apart from the fact that the teacher will have little energy left to work up the necessary enthusiasm for work among the adults, the technique in the two cases is so entirely different that except in rare cases it will be impossible to switch on from the one to the other after a hard day's work. The same privilege is extended to the Secretary of a Village Panchayat, Co-operative Society such other organisation. For individuals as for Governments it is a good maxim that what is worth doing is worth doing well According to Dr. Laubach, five of the thirty-two and more experiments tried in this country have proved more or less successful. These are, in Tamil, the Daniel and Devasaha- yam methods; in Marathi, the Bhagwat method, Miss R. Dongre's Bombay course; in Hindi, the Lawrence series of lessons: in Gujarati, the Bhadekar series and in Urdu Chapman's "Gospel Primers," McKee's "Little Red Hen Stories." We learn from Professor Richardson of the Lahore Government College who is Honorary Secretary of the All India Adult Education Conference Committee, that he is bringing out within the next few days on behalf of his Committee a Bulletin giving an account of the work which is being done in various parts of the country. We hope that the Bulletin will contain information bearing on the points noted above, chief among them being the method by which suitable teachers qualified for the special requirements of adult education are recruited and trained. Of special interest is the means whereby the knowledge imparted in an intensive course of education is retained and applied in after-life. There are of course books and magazines. But as Dr. Laubach points out books for children which alone partially literate adults can easily read, are unsuitable because illiterate adults are not children.

> They are quite as adult as literate people, for they have suffered more than the rest of us and they look at life through the sad eyes of disillusioned and often defeated men. Childish reading is as repugnant to them as it is to a college professor. Indeed they are likely to be offended at the teacher who offers it to them.

We are not so sure of this last observation. Old people and perhaps adults also often enjoy re-perusing the books which provided them with their first reading. But there is a difference between people who choose such books voluntarily and those who are obliged to read them because there is nothing else they can read. There is another point. The Bombay Committee on training of primary teachers, stressed the desirability of employing more women teachers as predominantly suited to the teching of little children. Women teachers, speaking generally, will not be much good in the education of adults. The illiterate adult has usually no great opinion of women and will feel his self-respect hurt by learning from them. This difficulty is common in the case of both men and women. In the case of the male adult this is further complicated by the distraction caused by the difference of sex which is totally absent in the case of children.

THE GOVERNMENT OF ENGLAND.

Two questions which are closely allied are, How a country is governed and By whom it is governed. English writers on constitutional history have dealt faithfully with the first but few have devoted much attention to the second question so far at any rate as Britain is concerned. On China, Russia, the U. S. A., Japan, Germany or Italy we have had explained to us in great detail where the real power resides. In Britain the assumption is that power resides in the people. How far this is true is discussed fully by two writers, Mr. H. J. Laski in his "Parliamentary Government in England*" and Mr. H. R. G. Greaves in "The British Constitution."†

* Messrs. George Allen and Unwin, London. 12s. 6d.

† Messrs. George Allen and Unwin, London. 7s. 6d.

The identity of views on every issue raised in these two books would indicate the growth of a definite school of political thought associated with London University. Both writers who cover very much the same ground, argue a dual thesis: That the calm waters of British politics have been greatly disturbed by the development of fundamental differences between the Labour Party and the two traditional political parties on questions relating to property; that in the existing political machinery there is already available a rudimentary instrument for effecting the transition from Capitalism to Socialism without the agonies of revolution and counter-revolution. To achieve this end the authors suggest the levelling of two obstacles. The House of Lords, now inaccessible to parties of the Left, should be deprived of its power to obstruct the reform measures of a Labour Government. Mr. Greaves points out that "it is not until the nineteenth century that the peers who hold their seats by virtue of birth seriously outnumber those who have been ennobled for their own services;" while Mr. Laski tells us that "half the membership of the House of Lords date from the last fifty years, and the vast majority of recent creations have been no more than a tribute to plutocracy as such." Read together this can only mean that the ennobled plutocrats were not young enough to enjoy their titles long and that by their elevation to the peerage the country had not even gained the benefits of business experience for the Upper House. Mr. Laski seeks to paralyse the obstructive powers of the Lords by depicting the prospect of revolution and civil war and the extinction of the Upper House. Mr. Greaves would reform the House into a body elected by and dependent on the House of Commons. But it is obvious that the first is the only Left policy in the absence of political power, while the second is the programme which a Left Government might put into effect.

Equally interesting is the method adopted to surmount the other obstacle, the King. Both Mr. Greaves and Mr. Laski argue that the King has no alternative but to follow the advice of his ministers and, by demanding that the officials of his household should also be recruited from the Services, they seek to reduce the sphere of his influence, in short to make the British King a king in chess. Mr. Laski writes:

> My argument is that the King's public acts must be of an automatic character; he must in the public view accept the advice of his ministers. In private, no doubt, he can use to the full those rights of advice and encouragement and warning for which his supreme position assures him full consideration. He cannot go beyond them, once ministers have decided upon action, without descending into the full glare of the political arena.

Both writers maintain that in pressing on Mr. Asquith a second general election to find out if the country approved of the policy of restricting the Lords' powers, George V had acted unconstitutionally. Mr. Greaves seems to regard Edward VIII's acceptance of Mr. Baldwin's advice on his choice of a wife as an important precedent which, he fears, will not be followed in a conflict between Labour and Reactionism:

> We are entitled to draw an important conclusion from the abdication crisis It was then argued on all sides that the King's constitutional duty was clear and undoubted—to follow the advice of his ministers. But if that be true of his choice of a wife, it follows a fortiori of the creation of peers to overrule the House of Lords.

In view of this it is not easy to understand why Mr. Laski, in particular, should denounce the late King's action in the crisis of 1931 as a Palace Revolution. It is unfortunate that the general bias of the Labour Party against Mr. MacDonald has combined in this matter with the assumption that the British Royal family is opposed to Labour, to confuse Mr. Laski's mind. For we are told in one place,

It is not known whether his (Mr. MacDonald's) emergence as head of the National Government resulted from advice tendered by him to the king—in view of the tiny minority of his party that he could command, this is difficult to believe—or from a suggestion made by the king to him. (Page 402.)

And on the other hand elsewhere,

Professor Keith.....omits any connection between the formation of the Government and previous rumours of Mr. MacDonald's desire for a coalition. (Page 405.)

All that we know of the facts of the case are that Mr. MacDonald, after tendering the resignation of his Cabinet to George V, advised him to call the two other party leaders; that Mr. MacDonald did not inform his party members that he was contemplating the formation of a National Government; and that at a subsequent meeting with George V, the two leaders, Mr. Baldwin and Sir Herbert Samuel, agreed to form a Government under Mr. MacDonald. If, as it would appear, Mr. MacDonald as leader of the Labour Party (which he still was then), advised George V to follow this course, we do not see how Mr. Laski can censure the King for not calling Mr. Henderson who was not then leader of any party. In view of the fact, moreover, as Viscount Snowden pointed out in his autobiography, that at least half the Labour Cabinet had been willing "reluctantly" to agree to a 10 per cent cut in unemployment payments, it might well be argued that it was difficult to anticipate the total withdrawal of Labour support from Mr. MacDonald. It is not improbable that Mr. MacDonald expected too much from his premiership. He probably looked to, what Lord Halifax in Indian contexts used to call, the "magnetic force of a working Government to attract all responsible men to it." In any case without knowing what Mr. MacDonald represented to George V, it is useless to talk of Palace Revolution. On the face of it, it seems as though an appeal to Mr. Henderson would have been highly unconstitutional, whatever Mr. Greaves might urge us to believe. In the normal course it was expected that Mr. Baldwin would form the new ministry and that he did not do so, implies that, whoever first thought of it, he too preferred a national government.

As the authors argue that the dice is loaded against the Labour Party both so far as the House of Lords and the King are concerned, they go on to maintain that, even with these two forces neutralised or paralysed, Labour only starts its battle for existence. But Mr. Laski is tender with the other parts of the machinery. He often disguises his object under the cloak of making the constitutional machinery more efficient. It is in this sphere that both Mr. Laski and Mr. Greaves are at their best and one almost wishes at times that the authors had divided their double theme and given us different disquisitions, on the two aspects. Mr. Laski discusses the possibilities of lightening work in the House of Commons by devolution of authority through federation. In rejecting the solution Mr. Laski remarks of all federation,

All over the world federation is breaking down by reason of the fact that any division of power which leaves important subjects in the hands of the subordinate legislatures, also leaves the federal Government thereby unable to handle its problems efficiently. It is ironical to suggest that a system which attempts to make Great Britain a quasi-federal society would be helpful at a time when the validity of federation itself is open to grave doubts.

Mr. Laski has a valuable note on economic committees in his chapter on "The Cabinet" the whole of which we recommend to our Governments. His advice has a peculiar application in India after provincial autonomy. Mr. Laski strongly urges the formation of committees presided over by the Prime Minister:

> His chairmanship of the Committee gives the one effective assurance available that, when he is impressed by its inquiries, their result will be properly considered by the Cabinet. Its composition under his presidency, moreover, is the best guarantee we can have of two important things: first, that the subjects it considers will be sufficiently real in character as, to be directly relevant to foreseeable policy and second, that, apart from outside experts, the men who will be called into consultation will be those who, under their respective ministers, will be responsible for applying the results of its deliberations.

The importance of these considerations force themselves to the front as we consider the rambling questionnaire issued by the National Planning Committee set up by the Congress.

The problems set forth by Mr. Laski and Mr. Greaves as regards the personnel of the administration, are very similar to what Indian politicians expected to find after office acceptance. Some opposition from civil servants who have been trained in the older tradition, there is bound to be. But there seems to be an unexpected strain of adaptability in the British official, which will assert itself even more strongly in domestic differences than it has in dealings with an alien people. The thesis that because they are staffed by men from a certain class, the Services, the Defence forces, the Church, the Educational Department, and so on are in permanent opposition to Labour aims, is to our mind on a par with Gandhiji's dictum in the Khare episode that British Indian ministers under provincial autonomy are ruling on the sufferance of the Governors who at one word can turn the police and the military on them. After all the argument that many men in the administration, even the vast majority, come from Oxford and Cambridge, means nothing very much except that a certain sum of money has been spent on their education. Some of the fiercest Socialists and many rabid Communist have come from the old Universities. The sections dealing with this phase of British life is valuable in that it shows the deep-cut divisions between class and class. All will agree that it is immensely wasteful for the country to have the large bulk of the population excluded from the plums of office; and singularly unfair to the individual. But can it be fairly urged that such an exclusion will strengthen reaction? If it were so, the Civil Service and the Army would not have waited to see if the first Labour Government was revolutionary in action. The standard of reactionism would have been raised on the declaration of the election results. There is another point of view which is ignored by the authors. The respect for British institutions is more deeply ingrained among the people of all parties, than any burning ardour for political principles. With less support than Mr. MacDonald had, Signor Mussolini took the reins of office and changed the very basis of the Italian Government. The Russian movement had not more supporters than the British Labour movement and was not as well organised. Herr Hitler's election to office was from all accounts a last resource, but that did not prevent the Nazis from using the force of office to carry them into supremacy. The British Labour Party, the only group in Britain with a revolutionary tinge, on the other hand, has been less Labour than British. There are three instances that leap to the mind: Indian reforms, in which the Labour Party acquiesced in the measures of a de facto Conservative Government; the abdication where for the sake of asserting the subservience of constitutional monarchy (which, we are told, has never been accepted in their favour), the Labour Party refrained from any attempt to overcome the supposed opposition of British Royalty to Labour interests by winning its gratitude in a grave crisis; and Czechoslovakia, where Labour practically 'lined itself behind Mr. Chamberlain. More than this because it underlies it, is the feeling recently expressed by eminent Trade Union officials that the Unions ought not to allow their political views to colour their economic problems—a feeling all the stranger because the Labour Party was the outcome of Trade Union realisation that without political power economic rights were endangered.

Mr. Laski and Mr. Greaves in saying that British political differences today have a fundamental cleavage unknown in the past few centuries, tend to minimise the past and exaggerate the present. Even a cursory persual of Mr. S. Maccoby's thoughtful study of "English Radicalism 1853-1886" ‡ will tell them that what seem trivial disagreements to modern Socialists were vital differences at the time. Mr. Maccoby has done for British political history what Mr. Laski and Mr. Greaves seek to do for the British Constitution. His book which bears the marks of painstaking research, is a clear exposition of the stages which have brought the struggle for power to its present position. As Mr. Maccoby explains it, there were several periods in English history when the Conservative elements felt the future of the country threatened by the radical forces. As a matter of fact, in 1863 and round that date, the feeling of the British middle classes in favour of intervention in foreign countries on the side of "freedom and democracy," forms a striking contrast to present-day isolationism. The people had turned from political interests at home to schemes for social betterment but their interest in foreign politics was so strong that it threatened peace. The middle classes, wrote the National Register, were opposed to grant the poor any political power but they sympathise with the lower class in their "crave for social comfort." Under the circumstances, it is not difficult to see why such strong opposition was raised to radicalism. It is clear from Mr. Maccoby's book that the working classes had to fight through more difficult times than the Laski-Greaves thesis envisages in the future. It is far more difficult to secure the first concession from vested interests than to win subsequent rights. In view of this, Mr. Laski's facile assertion that since 1689, "we have had but one party in control" does not bear scrutiny. After all it is not what Mr. Laski thinks of party squabbles in 1700-1918, but what the main participants thought of them then that counts. For all we know, someone in 2600 might well exclaim at the smoothness of British politics today where there is a still small voice in opposition and a "national government" in office.

THE PSYCHOLOGY OF SOCIAL MOVEMENTS.*

Dr. Pryns Hopkins gives his book the sub-heading "A Psycho-analytic view of Society." He attempts to do for society what Freud has done for the individual, to find the common ultimate impulse which creates and actuates social movements. He thinks, and one can not but agree with him, that while there has been especially during the last ten years a vast mass of thinking and writing on all kinds of social questions and the best way of solving them, the central figure in them all, namely, Man himself has remained almost completely unnoticed. The proposers of social panacea assume that the human mind is a constant, unchanging entity and that all that is needed to improve social conditions, is a change of systems. Their opponents base their opposition on the same assumption and say in addition that human nature is not only unchanging but also unchangeable. Dr. Hopkins observes, > Whatever the right panacea for our ills may be, it is certain that it will involve a great deal of effort on the part of man himself; and if, for a variety of reasons, man may be incapable of that effort then the panacea will never be tried. Now it is often asserted that a painfully large number of panaceas fall within this category. How often is the stock reply to the persuasive arguments of Socialism, for instance, the bald statement, "All very nice, but you cannot change human nature," and although I for one would never subscribe to such a view, I do recognize what so many of our would-be reformers too easily forget, that human nature can only be changed very slowly, and at the price of taking well-directed pains; and that until it is changed, there are some things it will never do. It is pertinent to tell a man who is being chased by a bull that he should run faster, but if he has a wooden leg, or is already running as fast as he can, the advice is a little silly. Few of our problems are as simple as this, but unfortunately many of the solutions proferred for them are.

The Ram Mohan Roy-Ranade school of reformers in India fully recognised this and chose the slower method of reform by patient effort to change the mentality of the Indian people in respect of the institutions, customs and practices which, they felt, stood in the way of national progress. The Gandhian school, by contrast, seeks to do the same reforms quickly by shock tactics, organised propaganda and legislation. This distinction marks every field of activity: politics, social reform, industrial reform. Swaraj is to be attained in one year; untouchability is to be abolished in the same period; prohibition is to be enforced throughout the land in three years; in five years the Indian peasant's income is to be doubled.

The object of his book, Dr. Hopkins says, is to answer the question, "What is man able to do?" This leads to three other questions. What is human nature and what may we expect of it? What are the mainsprings of human behaviour and how can they be controlled or directed? To what ends should man's energies be directed? The co-operation of the psychologist and the social philosopher is necessary to find a satisfactory answer to these questions. Dr. Hopkins is an out-and-out Freudian and he accepts the doctrines of his master regarding the mainsprings of human behaviour and the means of controlling them. The social philosopher to whom he acknowledges his allegiance is the illustrious Utilitarian, Jeremy Bentham. He writes:

> My own conviction is unshaken that Bentham's principle is the safest and the least objectionable of all ethical rules. It has, for me at least, one overwhelming merit, for while many philosophers may urge that the Good and the greatest happiness of the greatest number are not indistinguishable, no philosopher is likely to urge that the greatest happiness of the greatest number is not good.

This is not the place to undertake an examination of the Benthamite formula. But we may observe in passing that if "happiness" is to be understood in the utilitarian sense, the Benthamite doctrine would cover the judicial murder of Socrates, the crucifixion of Christ, the Spanish Inquisition, and the Jewish pogroms of Eastern Europe—in fact every crime and excess of mob fury. Bentham himself was the gentlest of men and had a very refined idea of happiness. Just because he could not imagine that any one can have a less exalted idea of it, he could not see that his formula lent itself to be grossly abused in the hands of less ethereal minds men.

Starting with the theory that man is so constituted that he is incapable of desiring anything but his own happiness, and that, as a consequence, his actions are all determined by his desires to acquire pleasure or to avoid its opposite, Dr. Hopkins interprets the Commandments of the principal religions as prompted by this desire. These he classifies under five heads: against lying, stealing, adultery, intoxication and murder. His rendering of these prohibitions in terms of desire for enjoyment, are forced and even contradictory to every-day experience. For instance, he derives the prohibition against lying from the desire to enjoy knowledge. But surely many people enjoy telling lies more than acquiring knowledge! The rule against adultery, he explains as being due to enjoyment of marriage or "at least of a sex life involving the minimum of jealousy and heartache." The Commandment against stealing, is explained as indicating the enjoyment of security in the material necessities of life as a form of happiness. Considering that the greatest number of people in every country are poor and that only a small minority is rich, the greatest good of the greatest number should make stealing a virtue rather than a sin. The rule against murder is prompted by the primal necessity of life, enjoyment, as Dr. Hopkins puts it, of freedom from violence. The rule against intoxicants is attributed to enjoyment of unbefuddled sensibility. The religions which do not include this rule certainly do not enjoy befuddled sensibility. However that may be, the fact remains that all the Commandments, except that against murder, are at least as often honoured in the breach as in the observance. Man enjoys the forbidden things and, as enjoyment is the utilitarian's test of happiness, finds happiness in them.

HINDU SOCIETY AND DIVORCE.

(By K. B. Gajendragadkar, Satara)

The question of Divorce affects indeed a very small minority of Hindus. Amongst most of what are termed "Backward Classes" divorce is acknowledged by long standing custom. The right of Divorce has been repeatedly affirmed by the Bombay High Courts. In this connection the text of Narada, Koutilya and other liberal minded sages were lost sight of and divorce was banished for ever from Hindu Society. Nevertheless, the communities which recognised divorce still practice it and since Hindu Law, as we conceive it today is not confined to particular higher classes, it would be fatuous to pretend that in advocating this reform it is sought to introduce an innovation hitherto unknown.

There is no doubt that the later Dharmashastra literature as a whole, while liberally permitting the husband to remarry during the lifetime of the first wife, refuses the remedy of divorce to the wife even completely forsaken by the husband. If, however, we examine carefully the earlier Dharmashastra Literature we find that divorces were permitted before the beginning of the Christian Era under certain well-defined circumstances. Dharmashastra writers (400 B. C. to 100 A. D.) lay it down that a Brahmin woman should wait for her husband gone out on a long journey for five years. Koutilya reduces this period to ten months only. Similar permission is given by Koutilya which require judicial permission before contracting the second marriage. Jurists differ only about the period of waiting. Paeswara's permission to remarry given to the wife of a person, who is impotent, or has become a religious recluse or is boycotted, clearly presupposes the possibility of divorce from the earlier marriage.

Divorce is intended to mitigate hardship where for special reasons the continuance of marriage is felt to be intolerable. The essential function of marriage is procreation and the accidental function is recreation. In cases, however, where both these objects are unattainable it would be nothing short of utter inhumanity to keep the woman in bondage.

In a strictly monogamic family the demand for divorce would necessarily have been put forth by the stronger sex; because, after all, even if one may reject the view that divorce is an alternative to monogamic marriage, the continuance of marriage would necessarily have been abandoned by both parties, once it was felt to be intolerable. Hindu Law and usage, however, allow polygamy; and one of the most unfortunate and regrettable consequences of this has been that the demand for divorce has been necessarily confined to the weaker sex. The absence of divorce does not in the least put the Hindu male to disadvantage, and as yet public opinion in these days is primarily the voice of the male. A measure of reform of divorce fails to carry with it strongly the force of public opinion.

In recent years, however, some educated ladies have begun to advocate the legal recognition of divorce in Hindu Community. This demand is to a large extent a natural outcome of the present Hindu law of marriage which is very unfair to women: Man is permitted practically to divorce his first wife by contracting a fresh marriage. He can even evade his legal responsibility of maintaining the discarded wife under the plea that she refuses to stay with him. How can a self-respecting woman stay with a husband who has transferred all his affections to a new wife? The deserted wives cannot remarry for neither law nor religion consents to sever their nominal marital tie with their heartless husbands. Some of them even go to the length of changing their religions in order to contract a new legal marriage.

This state of affairs is undoubtedly unsatisfactory; it is against the spirit of what is best in Hindu culture. There are two ways of improving the situation. The first and the best is to render polygamy altogether illegal. The second way is that divorce should be allowed in cases of proved and extreme hardship. Fortunately Bills are brought forward in both these directions.

THE MEANING OF MINORITIES.*

Few issues have more far-reaching implications than that of national minorities. In the superficial view, it is largely an issue of humanitarianism; but other aspects reveal more deeply the tactics of power which is the ruling motive of European national conduct at this stage of affairs.

Until the question of minorities can be solved, no thoughtful observer can expect a lessening of nationalism itself. For not only do the distressed and resentful minorities incessantly clamour for satisfaction, thus emphasizing nationality beyond any basis it could find in normal human relations; they furnish a constant excuse by which pompous and imperialistic reactionaries in national states can fan a grievance into so great a flame that it ignites even the less aggressive forces among their fellow-nationals. Yet one must, of course, be profoundly and warmly sympathetic with many of the minorities and their demands.

Besides the factor of exaggerated nationalism, which is important enough, the national minorities themselves often become so inextricably interwoven with issues of economic privilege and needs that the psychological drive, which might be reduced by fair treatment and the passage of time, is kept alive and even accelerated. Natural trade routes are blocked; non-geographic ones are artificially created. Agricultural and mineral resources are at stake in many minority conflicts.

Not without significance is it that the rise of modern machine industrialism, starting with the emergence of the Industrial Revolution at the end of the nineteenth century, has been almost precisely paralleled by the rise of modern nationalism. The economic motive has given weight and momentum to nationalism's natural fervour, and the growing emotionalism of nationality concepts has attached glorifying symbols to what might otherwise have been merely a sordid race for gain and economic power.

Historically, the idea of federalism, with minorities free to use their own forms of expression—as in Switzerland—has not been as common as strongly centralized authority. And tragic is it in the extreme that often-times the first thing a long-oppressed minority seeks when liberated and given authority of its own, is the revenge—oppression of its erstwhile overlords. Find a land that itself has been over-run and victimized, and you usually find a state that holds its own minority groups in tight and unrelenting subjection.

Objective figures are hard to obtain, for statistics are frequently padded. But without doubt, at least 30,000,000 inhabitants of Europe are held under government controls contrary to their traditions or desires. In South Tyrol, under Italian rule, are more than 400,000 German-speaking Austrians. In Poland are some 4,500,000 Russians, 70,000 Lithuanians 2,000,000 Jews, and almost a million Germans. These are only a few cases out of many in Europe.

Valiant efforts have been made to meet the minority question constructively many times by enlightened individuals and countries, largely through the League of Nations. The Scandinavian countries have often put forward proposals for minority commissions to make studies and report suggestions to the League and the countries involved. Minority treaties were accepted, shortly after the end of the World War, guaranteeing certain minimum standards of justice for minority populations, by Poland, Czechoslovakia, Rumania, Yugoslavia, Bulgaria, Austria, Hungary, Albania, Turkey, Greece, Lithuania, Esthonia, Latvia, and Finland. On the other hand, certain countries which acquired minorities through the War were not so bound: France, Belgium, Denmark, Italy. From the rise of Fascism in 1922, Italy became conspicuous for the cynical treatment of the minority question. But most of the states involved fought against open negotiations through the League; most found excuses for delays in carrying out promises; many held their minorities as hostages against fellow-nationals inside rival states.

Three governments, however, did not need pressure to grant cultural autonomy. Soviet Russia, despite its intense political regimentation, set an example invariably praised by experts on minority problems; while required to submit to the Communist dictatorship, a large degree of cultural autonomy was received by Volga Germans, Jews, Ukrainians, Tartars, Greeks, Bulgarians, and Poles. Both Esthonia and Latvia have granted a considerable measure of cultural self-rule to their comparatively small minorities.

But the minority populations, always restive, now have no League machinery they can even remotely respect. Their hope must be through threat of force or alliances with external "deliverers"—a potent source of war, when it was war in the first place that more often than otherwise caused their present unhappy lot.

Any positive solution now must await, it seems, a general international economic readjustment, if it can be forced on the imperialistic Powers, that might remove some of the power-pressures which more than anything else at present characterize the diplomacy of the Old World.

WHITHER THE REFUGEES?

The most recent measures adopted in Germany against the Jews have resulted in doors being opened to them which had hitherto been closed. The European Continent is still today of course almost hermitically closed for refugees. But, on the other hand, the British Empire is remembering its possibilities. The Bishop of Chichester mentioned in the House of Lords the dominions of South and East Africa. Australia and New Zealand are now offering to admit a quota of refugees. The great obstacle, of course, is the large precautionary sum required, of two hundred pounds, and the enormous cost of the journey. Palestine had become a danger spot for Jews and for the British Goverment; nor does Cyprus offer many prospects in this connection.

The English and Scottish churches are offering hospitality for the time being to a number of pastors' families, until their further transport is assured. The Home Office seems to be raising no objection to these invitations, but points out the need for re-training, especially for young people, who must turn their attention to concerning themselves with manual work. In this connection people are looking to America, whence came the initiative for the summoning of the Evian Conference.

The immigration laws of the United States provide a quota for each country, which is determined, not according to where a person lives, but according to the place of birth. Only parents, married people and grown up children are not subject to immigration restrictions through the quotas. Professors, scientific specialists or outstanding artists who are invited under contract, are in any case not affected by the decisions of the immigration quota. The quota figure for Germany and Austria together amounts, from July 1 to June 30 of next year, to 27,370. At present there are 61,300 applicants on the quota list, so that it is filled in advance for two years. It is also possible to visit the United States as a "temporary visitor" or as a tourist or for purposes of study. Many people attempt in this way to get into Cuba and Mexico. That means that they must support themselves for two years. Cuba gives no permission to enter the country.

Evangelical pastors do not come under the quota if they are appointed by a parish, and show the consul a "non quota vise". But each case is treated entirely individually. Admission on the basis of an affidavit is very difficult, for only very few people could undertake for quite unknown persons the required financial guarantee for a longer period. Scientific institutions, such as universities, will give such affidavits only to extremely well-known scholars. The consuls are instructed to find out whether an immigrant is likely to become a burden on the public charge. At present in the American Churches a systematic enquiry is going on into persons who would be able to undertake a guarantee. Intellectuals find it more difficult to obtain admission than trained workers and technicians.

South America has greater possibilities of immigration, but is surrounded with precautionary measures. A settlement of fifty persons, established in Columbia by the British Church Relief Committee, has come down to twenty-six persons, but they will very soon be self-supporting. Individual settlements have also hitherto been possible in Venezuela and the Argentine. Here it is a matter for the most part of agricultural and technical work. In Paraguay and Brazil, Russian evangelical refugees from China found shelter a short time ago. Recently possibilities have been heard of in Chile, Guatemala and Porto Rico. All these states have a good deal of land suitable for settlement, and also land that does not first require cultivation. But the conditions of immigration include for the most part the payment of caution money, and it has to be reckoned that settlement families require to be supported for a whole year.

Individual settlers and groups of refugees and their patron organisations can hardly break through the embargo measures which the States in South America have set up. It is hoped that the new High Commissioner of the League of Nations, Sir Herbert Emerson, with his expert assistant, Dr. G. Kullmann (Zurich), will build, in the preliminary negotiations with the Governments, the bridges which must in the first place be there before individuals will dare to venture on emigration with any sense of security or of being adequately covered and advised. Sir Herbert Emerson, as Governor of the Punjab for over thirty five years, has gained considerable experience in matters of administration, and Dr. Kullmann, through the work which he has already done in the League of Nations, is thoroughly well-informed on all these problems. The private international organizations, whose co-operation, in the view of the president of the Evian Conference, Myron Taylor, is indispensable for the solution of the refugee question, are looking with great hopes to this necessary preliminary work, which will make their detailed work in the first place possible.

In the Near East it is hardly possible to provide for German refugees. The greatest efforts are being made here in connection with Armenian and Assyrian settlements. But since the Sandjak was handed over to Turkey, thousands of Armenian settlers are abandoning their homes and are withdrawing towards Syria. Through the League of Nations High Commission 9,000 Assyrians have been settled along the Khabur.

A principal condition for the success of a settlement is not only the state of the soil and a healthy climate, but the right composition of a colony. The ideal mode of procedure in forming a settlement is that followed by those colonies which led, on a religious basis, to the founding of the states of Massachussetts, Pennsylvania, or possibly the settlements of the Bohemian and Moravian Brethren.

RAISING THE STANDARD OF LIVING.

On the instructions of the Economic Committee of the League of Nations, a Sub-Committee of economic experts met in Geneva early in December to study the problem of raising the standard of living. The memorandum by Mr. N. F. Hall—"Measures of a National and International Character for raising the Standard of Living"—was taken as a basis of discussion, and the contributions to the problem made by the technical organisations of the League and the International Labour Office were reviewed.

The situation with regard to the standard of living is quite clear: in all parts of the world the vast majority of people live at a level of life which is much below that necessary for their optimal well-being. The greater part of the world's population have not enough to eat, a still greater proportion have not enough of the right foods to attain perfect health, while the majority of people need better housing, clothing, sanitation and means of communication and transport.

If the poorer sections of the population of all countries were to be supplied with the extra foodstuffs, clothes, housing and so on which they need for their physical well-being, the demand for these commodities would be enormous. The potential demand is practically inexhaustible, and yet producers are unable to sell these very commodities which the poorer consumer so urgently needs, and the world is suffering from apparent over-production.

If the standard of living of the majority is to be raised, means must be devised to sell to the consumer the commodities which he at present lacks at a price which he can afford; but, in recent years, Governments have concentrated their efforts on helping the producers by artificially raising prices by taxes, subsidies, restrictions on production and tariffs against imported goods. The interests of the producer have been favoured at the expense of those of the consumer.

While the Sub-Committee did not anticipate any immediate reversal of this policy, it emphasised the importance of a frank realisation that such measures for maintaining artificially high prices, however neccessary or desirable they might be deemed, are made directly at the expense of the consumers' standard of life. It is important that the interests of the consumer should carry more weight with Governments than hitherto and, to this end, it is of great value to stress the evil effects of under-consumption on the health and efficiency of a nation.

The newer knowledge of nutrition has revealed the vast amount of ill-health which exists throughout the world because of under-consumption of such foodstuffs as milk, butter, eggs, vegetables and fruits. It is now known how much of different foodstuffs a family or an individual needs to prevent ill-health, and similar standards can be set with regard to housing and clothing. There are the physiological basic needs of a human being, that are essential for his health and well being, and the realisation of these standard requirements gives added weight to the demands of the consumer.

Members of Sub-Committee stressed the fact that the raising of the standard of living is a dynamic problem which cannot be settled finally. As Mr. Hall had said in his Memorandum, it calls for action in all spheres of economic activity. It requires the application of technical knowledge to increase production, both in agriculture and industry; it needs greater efficiency in distribution and retailing of goods to the consumer, and finally it needs wisely-planned economic co-operation between nations to reduce the present trade barriers. All such measures both national and international, which have the effect of increasing consumption amongst the poorer half of the world's population should be encouraged, and the vital importance to nations should be stressed of raising the standard of living of their people to a level which would enable every individual to attain his optimal health and well-being.

THE SOCIAL WELFARE SOCIETY (BOMBAY)

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

The Social Welfare Society having its office at Dadar has been started in Bombay North with an influential body of social workers such as Sir Jehangir B. Boman Behram, Kt., President, Mrs. Urmila Mehta, Messrs. Jamnadas Mehta, K. F. Nariman and others as Vice Presidents etc. It has laid out a useful programme of work for the new year. One of such activities is the starting of a monthly magazine called "The Social Worker" to be edited by an influential and competent board of editors. The object of the management is to make it an official organ of the Society in order to further all its activities. It is hoped that the public of Bombay will co-operate in this endeavour and make it a success. The office of the magazine is 10, Madhav Wadi, Naigaum Cross Road, Dadar, Bombay.

Yours etc.,

N. C. NARSIMHA ACHARYA

THE DNYANODAYA AND THE REFORMER.

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

I have no desire to interpose in an editorial quarrel but the statement by the editor of Dnyanodaya, the organ of six missionary institutions, that missionaries do condemn evils in their own country will be greatly welcomed by all Indians. I had thought that they kept up referring to the "seamy side of Indian life" with an eye to the business of proselytising. Mr. Edwards would be the last to deny that the Western missionary is far more conscience-striken at the "wrongs" he finds in India than he is at the abuses which exist in his own country. He is often dumb in the West and eloquent in India. Even to the missionary who spends his lifetime preaching to Indians and only his furloughs reforming his fellow-countrymen, I would warmly suggest a reversal of the process. For has not the Master said, "First cast out the beam out of thine own eye and then shalt thou see clearly to cast out the mote out of thy brother's eye."

Yours etc.,

INDIAN.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

A Jewish Legion for Britain:—An important hint of what may happen if conscription is put through in Great Britain, as a result of the present drive for it, is given in the Manchester "Daily Dispatch," which asserts that genuine consideration is being given by the authorities, at London, to the formation of a Jewish Legion, instructed in military drill, but to be used only in case of war. The "Dispatch" asserts that two reasons lie behind the possible move: first, to have Jews ready for warfare in the event of conscription; second, to arrange matters so that Jews, in the event of conscription, would serve together instead of being interspersed with other troops.

Canadian School of Missions:—The Canadian School of Missions, which is now entering upon its eighteenth year's work, was established in 1921 by the Foreign Mission Boards of Canada for the specialized training of their furloughed missionaries and missionary candidates. The eight Boards which are responsible for its maintenance and control represent the Anglican, Baptist, Disciples, Presbyterian and United Churches. Four Theological Colleges in Toronto are also co-operating units. Lectures and other privileges are open, without charge, to all candidates and furloughed missionaries of the co-operating Boards, provided they have registered in the school. The courses of study are planned with a view to the requirements of both missionaries and candidates. Some of these courses continue throughout the academic year, while others run for varying periods during the year. A number of the courses are recognized as a electives by the co-operating Theological Colleges. The Session of 1938-1939 will begin on October 11th.

The Bank of India Limited:—The Profit of the Bank of India Limited for the year ended 31st December 1938 including the sum of Rs. 7,64,577-12-4 brought forward amounts to Rs. 29,46,235-10-4. Provision for Income Tax and Super Tax for the current year will absorb Rs. 3,75,000-0-0; and the payment of an ad-interim dividend at the rate of 10 % per annum made on 30th June 1938, absorbed Rs. 5,00,000-0-0; leaving a balance available for distribution of Rs. 20,71,235-10-4. The Directors propose to pay a final dividend for the half-year ended 31st December 1938 at the rate of Rs. 3/- per share (making 11% for the whole year) on the paid up capital of Rs. 100 Lacs free of Income Tax which will absorb Rs. 6,00,000-0-0, to place to the Bank's Property A/c Rs. 3,00,000-0-0; to place to the Bank's Reserve Fund, Rs. 2,50,000-0 0; and to Carry Forward the Balance subject to the payment of a Bonus to the Staff Rs. 9,21,235-10-4.

Hindu Women's Right to Property:—Miss Jethi T. Sipahimalani, M. L. A. (Congress), has, it is learnt, decided to sponsor in the present session of the Sind Assembly a Bill to amend the Hindu Law governing Hindu Women's right to property so far as it obtains in the province of Sind.

Dr. Holmes:—John Haynes Holmes, minister of the Community Church and noted liberal and friend of Gandhi, is now being honored in the United States by thousands of friends of all creeds and races, as his church conducts a drive for funds with which to build a new edifice for the advancement of religion. Led by Mayor LaGuardia, Rabbi Stephen S. Wise, and other leaders in civic, educational and religious affairs more than 1,000 friends and members of his congregation joined recently at the Hotel Astor in celebrating his fifty-ninth birthday. More than $75,000 was raised through pledges before the dinner and contributions given at that time toward the total o $250,000 required for the new church. More contributions are coming in daily to the New York offices of the Fund.

NOTES.

Mr. Srinivasa Aiyangar's Return :—The great political event in Madras during the last few days, is the return to active politics of Mr. S. Srinivasa Aiyangar, who presided at the Gauhati session of the Indian National Congress, and left it in disgust at what appeared to him the tortuous ways of Gandhiji's politics. The happy event actually took place at a public meeting on New Year's Day at Tilak Ghat, Triplicane Beach. Both Mr. Rajagopalacharya, the Madras Premier, and Mr. Srinivasa Aiyangar were present and spoke at the meeting. Mr. Shaffee Mahomed and Mr. G. Rangiah Naidu, says the report in the Hindu, welcomed Mr. Srinivasa Aiyangar back to public life and said that the presence of the "two jewels of Tamil Nad" on the platform augured well for the future of India. Mr. Aiyangar was the principal speaker at the meeting. The Prime Minister who followed him, referred to the differences supposed to exist between them. He denied that there were any serious differences between them at any time. "I merely took up," said Mr. Rajagopalacharya, "the place that Mr. Srinivasa Aiyangar had of his own accord vacated in 1930." Mr. Srinivasa Aiyangar, however, is no diplomatist and he made it clear in the public speeches which he made during the last few days that he left the Congress owing to fundamental differences with Gandhiji. On the 18th December, at the anniversary of a Library, Mr. Srinivasa Aiyangar gave what the Hindu described "a public exposition" of the main reasons which led him to retire from "public life." He had his own views, he said, and Mahatma Gandhi had his own, and when there was no clear understanding between them it was not possible for him to contribute his mite to the service of the country. He agreed with Lord Snowden that politics was oftentimes a dirty game, that it required a considerable amount of ambition, some want of scruple and some capacity for intrigue. Mr. Aiyangar regretted that he did not possess these qualifications in a sufficient measure to be a day-to-day politician. Everyday politics required that one should make the worse appear the better reason, was another aphorism which he dropped in the course of this intensely self-revealing utterance. Speaking a week later at the Sowcarpet Congress Sabha, Mr. Srinivasa Aiyangar referred in warm terms to Mr. Subhas Bose, "my old and valued friend and steadfast fellow worker," whom he announced, he would join in welcoming to Madras. But there has been a fatality about Mr. Bose's projected visit to Madras. Repeatedly they have had to be postponed for one reason or another. In the Sowcarpet speech, the Rajagopalacharya Government came in for sharp criticism for using the Criminal Law Amendment Act. "The Act is absolutely unnecessary and we can get on without it for maintaining peace and order," declared Mr. Aiyangar. In his Tilak Ghat speech on New Year's Day, he deprecated Indian energies being dissipated by sympathy with the Spanish, Czechs, Abyssinians and Palestinians. It is clear from the concluding appeal to non-Brahmins not to raise the bogey of Aryan and Dravidian differences that his entry into active politics has been rather precipitated by the resurgence of the Justice party on the back of the anti-Hindi movement. He said:

> I beg of them to desist. Once this kind of communalism is started—a few leaders can start this for political purposes—there was no knowing how it would affect the masses, women and others. I, therefore, beg of them to retrace their steps. At any rate, let them not carry it further. This last request I make of them as an old man (Mr. Aiyangar is only sixty five) who most sincerely wishes well for Non-Brahmins and builds his faith on Non-Brahmins more than on others in this land.

Anti-Hindi Prosecutions in Madras :—For a politician to discredit a movement as a "political stunt" is to foul his own nest. Yet this was the burden of the criticisms made at a public meeting by the Prime Minister and his supporters against the anti-Hindi movement in Madras. Another frequent criticism is that the class of people who are carrying on the movement, are beneath contempt. When these very people and their kith and kin gathered in their thousands to acclaim the Ministers a year ago they were the public, their voice was public opinion, the voice of God. This kind of thing is is among the conventional lies of democratic politics in all countries and nobody attaches any value to these declarations. Behind these words, however, it is evident that the Madras Government is not quite happy in the position in which it finds itself. The use of the Criminal Law Amendment Act to prosecute and imprison the anti-Hindi agitators, evoked complaints from the first. The conviction of Mr. Ramaswami Naicker, a man of outstanding character and independence, who was once the colleague of the Prime Minister in his Civil Disobedience days, has brought matters to a head. The Justice Party which has been lying low since the last General Elections, saw its opportunity. It convened a special Conference and elected the incarcerated Naicker as president. We are not sure if they applied to Government to release him on parole to enable him to guide the deliberations of the Conference. If they did the request was evidently refused. Mr. Naicker's written address was read by Sir A. T. Pannirselvam, a Roman Catholic ex-Minister in the late unlamented diarchy. As it was in large part a virulent tirade against Brahmins for whom Naicker had from early days cherished an insensate animosity, Sir Pannirselvam must have found the task congenial as combining religious with political propaganda. Mr. Naicker chose to forget that many Brahmins are against the compulsory Hindi in schools and that Brahminism had nothing to do with the question. The attempt of the Justice Party to hoist itself into public favour by means of the anti-Hindi agitation, has very poor chances of success. It only shows to what straits it is reduced. But the compulsory Hindi stunt—for it is nothing but one—has undoubtedly aroused sleeping dogs which prudent statesmanship would have gone far out of its way to let lie undisturbed.

The Issue:—The Congress successes at the polls at the last elections were hailed by many in Madras who do not worship at the Charka shrine, as it put an end to the Brahmin non-Brahmin fend in the province. The Prime Minister was warned that he was fanning smouldering embers of the controversy by his ill-considered insistence on forcing Hindi down the throats of small boys in the lower middle forms. A strong man would have recognised the inexpediency of pushing on with this minor measure which had no direct bearing on education or administration. But weak men in trying to seem strong only become obstinate. If the High Command at any time favoured the scheme, it withdrew its support when the first imprisonments under the Criminal Law Amendment Act took place. The use of the Act in this context has been condemned by the President of the Congress. It was condemned recently by ex-President Srinivasa Aiyangar whose frequent appearances on the platform of late, are arousing considerable interest in the country. The President of the Liberal Federation condemned it in his address. Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel some months ago announced at Karachi that the Act would be repealed in two months. Prosecutions are nevertheless still going on and several women, as we noticed the other day, have been put in prison for taking part in the agitation against compulsory Hindi. The issue is no longer whether compulsory Hindi in schools is right or wrong. On that, Mr. C. F. Andrews made some illuminating observations at a Students' Conference in Allahabad last week. The issue now is whether a Congress Government can use a penal law which it had condemned in opposition to support itself in office.

Return of German Colonies:—We reprint elsewhere the comments of the Economist on the restoration of the German colonies in Africa which have been administered under mandates of the League of Nations by Great Britain and the South African Union since the Treaty of Versailles. After pointing out that economically these colonies will be a burden rather than a relief to the depleted finances of the Reich, the Economist, with the detachment which characterises its writings, goes on to point out that it is not for Britons with their colour bars and Americans with their negro problem, to object to the German demand on the score of the racial doctrines of Germany. "It does not follow as the night the day," it adds, "that Jew-baiters will oppress natives." This is exactly what we said in our comments on the retrocession of Tanganiyika in the Reformer of December 24. The Economist favours the suggestion that all the British African colonies should be placed under international control, as the most effective answer to Germany's demand. This question was raised in Parliament by Mr. Noel Buxton last month and has found support in the English press though, for the time being, Mr. Malcolm MacDonald's plea that political considerations stand in the way, has prevailed. Those who are interested in the question in India will do well to support leaders in England like Mr. Noel Buxton, and Sir Stafford Cripps, in popularising it. The support of Indian opinion will greatly help the cause of internationalising the African Colonies with the British public. The Economist and other important organs of English opinion are not averse to the return of the colonies to Germany if the peace of Europe can be definitely assured thereby.

Indians in Tanganiyika:—The position of Indians in Tanganiyika is summed by Lord Hailey in his "African Survey" thus;

> Here Indians hold a position materially different from that in South Africa or Kenya, in that the terms of the mandate secure them against any form of administrative discrimination. The Germans appreciated their value as traders, and, subject to payment of a deposit, Indians had been freely admitted to the protectorate. At the date of the War a large part of the retail trade was in their hands. With the end of the War, their economic position greatly changed, for they managed to secure a considerable proportion of the German land sold by the British Government, and largely took the place of German firms in the import and export trade.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

We can not expect the Reich Government to be more considerate to the present Indian owners of the pre-war German land or business than the Congress Government to the owners of land confiscated during the Civil Disobedience movement in Gujarat. If compensation is to be given, as it should be in fairness to the Indians who invested their money trusting in the permanence of the League of Nations and the mandatory system, it should come from Great Britain. The Reich will certainly refuse to buy at a price what it claims to be its own, and the League will not be able to persuade the small nations who mostly constitute its present clientele to contribute towards the compensation to Indian purchasers of escheated German property. Great Britain may find plausible reasons to transfer the burden to India. The only way of avoiding all this, is to give our strong support and get the Government of India to give their strong support to the scheme of internationalisation. India will, of course, have adequate representation on the international committee set up to see that no administrative discrimination creeps into the affairs of the internationalised territories. Finally it should be borne in mind that it is the League authority, not the British control, which prevents discrimination against Indians in Tanganiyika. With the disappearance or weakening of that authority, Tanganiyika will perforce fall in line with the racial policy of South Africa and Kenya.

Bombay Public Information Series:—The Government of Bombay have begun publishing a monthly record of their principal activities under the title Public Information Series. Apart from the utility of such a publication which is much, we welcome it as evidence of the desire of the Bombay Government to interest the public and invite its co-operation in shaping their course in the labyrinthian field of administration. It is all to the good that Government do not shun publicity but court it. The first number is necessarily something of a hotch-potch. The "messages" of the Ministers may be taken to represent the dominant purpose which inspires each one of them for the time being. The Prime Minister is keen on the Wardha scheme, the Finance Minister on rural reconstruction lately assigned to him. The Home Member has a small homily on the importance of the Police; and the Excise Minister, who is also Minister of Health, commends Prohibition as a measure of sanitation and personal hygiene. The Revenue Minister affirms his determination to root out corruption altogether from his department. The Minister of Public Works begins with a piece of interesting information. He tells of some Turbo-generating machinery which for many years has been lying idle, being now utilised for supplying power to electric pumping machinery in nearby towns. It is lucky that the machinery had not rusted during its long holiday. The Minister for Industries begins by saying that the policy of his predecessor has had only the effect of stifling initiative and hampering the growth of industries. It is not 'good form' to begin by decrying those who have gone before us. There is an imposing array of Committees instituted by the Government. If the Information Series does nothing else, it will serve at least to remind the Ministers and the public of this numerous progeny which otherwise might be difficult to remember.

Suggestions:—We looked for some information regarding the order of Government for withdrawing licenses from hostels refusing admission to Harijans. We found it there all right. But we should have liked something more definite than that "there is no reason to believe that they (Ahmedabad hostels) are refusing admission now." In the next number, we expect to be told that scheduled caste guests are being admitted in the hostels without discrimination. There have been complaints that the orders of Government have remained a dead letter. Even so, their educative value is considerable and for our part, we should have more hope of the permanance of a reform which is preceded by an educative period than of lightning changes. We should like also to know, how many temples have been thrown open in pursuance of the Temple Entry Act and how far the Hindu community has responded to the appeal of that Act.

Inter-University Amenities:—Without more information than is so far available regarding the circumstances in which the authorities of Nagpur University thought fit to interest themselves in the dispute between the students and the authorities of the Osmania University, our comments have necessarily to be tentative. It may be—we hope it is—that the Osmania and Nagpur authorities consulted together and agreed on the transfer of the rusticated students of Hyderabad to Nagpur Colleges as the best way in which the interests of University discipline can be vindicated without ruining the career of some hundreds of young people. Such arrangements have been effected before, though not on such a large scale, between Colleges. We presume that this has happened here also. Otherwise the action of the Nagpur University authorities in offering to accommodate the students sent down by the Osmania University, might have not only frustrated the efforts of the Osmania authorities to arrange a settlement. It would gravely affect the comity of Universities which is essential in the best interests of higher education in India. If following the Nagpur example, the Madras or Andhra University were to offer to admit the students of the Annamalai University whom the Vice-Chancellor was forced to suspend, it will be putting a premium on insubordination on the part of students.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER
BOMBAY, January 7, 1939.

INDO-BRITISH COMMONWEALTH.

The address which the Hon. Mr. P. N. Sapru delivered as President of the twentieth session of the National Liberal Federation of India on the 30th December, is a pronouncement of first-rate importance. In marked contrast to the generality of political pronouncements, it is characterised by a breadth of outlook and clarity of vision which will commend it to thoughtful people. It points out, broadly speaking, the ways in which the present system of Government can be modified so as to lead naturally to self-government in this country, with the least dislocation of existing arrangements. On the question, whether India should remain with the Commonwealth or seek separation from it as a necessary step to the achievement of Swaraj, Mr. Sapru said:

> We are as determined as any other political party in the country that our country shall be free, but we feel that this full freedom which we seek is reconcilable with loyalty to the objective of an Indo-British Commonwealth of Nations to which we may have something distinctive to contribute when we have reached our political maturity.

Pandit Hridayanath Kunzru also spoke of the Indo-British Commonwealth in one of his speeches some months ago. The phrase was suggested as the most appropriate for a union of which India may continue to be a unit, eight years ago in the Reformer (March 9, 1930). The Reformer wrote:

> There is no escape, we think, from the condition that, to begin with at any rate, India will stand out distinct from other dominions in the British Commonwealth of Nations. That being so, it would, in order to bring the designation in conformity with fact, be necessary to change the style of the Commonwealth into the Indo-British Commonwealth of Nations. This, we think, should go a great way towards meeting the scruples of those among us who apprehend that the distinctive identity of India, racial and cultural, will be lost, if she were merged in a sea of White nations.

None of the present Dominions admit Indians to their citizenship. India's connection is exclusively with Great Britain. India, therefore, is entitled to have her position definitely indicated in the designation of the Commonwealth. Mr. Sapru does not want to remain in the Commonwealth merely for what we can get from Great Britain in the shape of protection from aggression. He wants to remain in the Commonwealth because we have something distinctive to contribute to it and through it to the world. He did not indicate what the nature of India's distinctive contribution would be. But anyone who has followed the cultural history of India, can easily guess what it can be. The quest for the unity underlying diversity in the world of phenomena, has been the agelong preoccupation of Indian philosophical speculation. To find it and apply it to solve the problem of uniting in one fold groups of human beings in varying stages of spiritual and cultural evolution, is the task which Indian sages and statesmen from immemorial time set before themselves. This is also essentially the problem of the British Commonwealth and of the League of Nations today. The Indian by virtue of his inherited culture has a special aptitude for perceiving the common factor in a world of variety.

Mr. Sapru congratulated the Liberals on having set before themselves Dominion Status as defined in the Statute of Westminister as their objective, in view of the world situation and of what the new imperialisms are and mean for the weaker races of mankind. That Statute was passed in 1931. The Imperial Conference resolution of which it is the legal expression was passed in 1926. It ran as follows: "They (Dominions) are autonomous communities within the British Empire, equal in status, in no way subordinate one to another in any aspect of their domestic and external affairs, united by a common allegiance to the Crown, and freely associated as members of the British Commonwealth of Nations." Since the Westminister Statute was passed, far-reaching developments have taken place, the latest being the British Premier's statement in Parliament regarding the position of Great Britain and the Dominions in the event of war. Except for a self-imposed and unilateral obligation on the part of Great Britain to defend the Dominions in the case of invasion, there is nothing now to show that the Dominions are bound by a common allegiance to one another and to Great Britain. Such being the case, there is nothing to justify the term "Dominion" being continued to be applied to them. Kipling happily described the relation between a Dominion and Great Britain in his couplet,

> Daughter am I in my mother's house
> Mistress in my own.

At the present time, the daughter relationship has completely ceased. It is time, therefore, that the term Dominion as describing the relation arising out of the Westminister Statute, is dropped and some other adopted which may not seem grotesque in its application to India. The theory underlying self-government in the old colonies was that an Englishman carried with him this right as a part of his personal law. The French Canadian and the Boer were, for constitutional purposes, regarded as Englishmen and even the Irish, whom the late Lord Salisbury grouped with Hindus and Hottentots as being congenitally incapable of governing themselves, were also invested with that right. But all these are Whites and Christians though of different and antagonistic races and sects. More than that, every self-governing Dominion has a much smaller population than Great Britain. To call India, a country having six or seven times the population of Britain, and having no affinity with her in race or religion, a British

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Dominion is an etymological atrocity. India's history, moreover, is long anterior to that of Britain. She might be a great grandmother or a more remote ancestress, not certainly a daughter of Britain. If a less grossly inappropriate word can be substituted, the difference between Independence and Dominion Status may not seem so antithetical.

AMERICA'S PROBLEM: ISOLATION OR ALLIANCE.

(By Frederick B. Fisher.)

My main contention today, as I think of ourselves, is this: that in the United States of America we have only a colonial mind. We do not have an independent American mind. We are a mere echo of Great Britain and a mere echo of Europe. We are colonial-minded. We cannot get over the fact that Great Britain is a great country and we are not, that Great Britain can think big thoughts and we cannot, that Europe has a great civilization and we have not. It is decidedly an inferority complex. National self-respect, that is our great problem today.

The World War greatly added to that inferiority of thought and belief. I have said this vigorously, rapidly, and bluntly, but I believe it is positively, true. There is no independent American mind.

The idealism of America was drowned by several things. May I just indicate them as briefly as I can:

First: the idealism of America that followed the days of John Quincy Adams and the men that led up to that period was drowned, by the desire to have world trade and money aristocracy. We built up an aristocracy in Boston, and in New York, and in Philadelphia, that was based upon the dollar—how much a man was worth. We had not developed at that particular time the great railways that came westward and made possible the internal development of the heart of America. For a while, then, the trade went to Europe, the investments were in Europe and the bulk went back and forth across the Atlantic. We were bound by unbreakable ties to Europe, and therefore, the independent, idealistic American mind was subdued by trade and money aristocracy.

Second: It was drowned by the millions of industrial labourers that came from every country of Europe into the United States of America. They came more rapidly than they could be absorbed: our factories developed around Pittsburgh and other centres, and later on here in Detroit, until we have become a polyglot nation without unity. We are heterogeneous and we have no unified American mind. It is almost impossible for us to say that we are American. We are either German-American, Lithuanian-American, Polish-American, French-American, Anglo-American, or some other kind of an American. We are not just Americans. I believe that is one of the greatest difficulties that any nation has to face. Russia faced that problem more than a thousand years ago when the great hordes poured in but Russia has had one thousand years to build her various races and languages into a national unity. England faced that as long as eighteen hundred years ago, and then sixteen hundred years ago, and especially twelve hundred years ago, and England now has had at least a thousand years in which to build a homogeneous nation, whereas we have had not even one generation. We have had scarcely a decade.

Here we are with all our various ideas, and every last one of us bringing something different from Europe: a language from Europe; we have no original language; we do not even have an original religion; we do not have an original educational system; we have no original military system; we have no original system of any kind whatsoever. Biologically by the very process of reversion, to our ancestral type, we belong to Europe and we have scarcely got over it. That's our problem. Europe knows that all the vast wealth of America, all the resources of America might be dragged in on one side or the other. That's the reason we're so propagandized. England is not propagand zed the way Am rica is. France has no propaganda as compared to America. Why? Because you can't get into England with any propaganda that is anti-English; you can't get into France with any propaganda that is anti-French. They're homogeneous people; they're all Frenchmen, they're all British. But in America anybody can get in and he can start almost any kind of a social nostrum group; the tendency in us to revert to ancestral type gives him an opportunity. We are no different from any other nation when it comes to our psychology, our life, our organism, but we have this heterogenous background and we have never been unified as a nation.

This American idealism was once very strong; it won the war of the Revolution; it won the War of 1812; it formulated the Monroe Doctrine; and it set America on an absolutely separate national basis. But then it began to die, firstly because of trade and money aristocracy, and secondly because of the rapid influx of industrial labour that was brought into the country by those who wished to exploit other's labour for the sake of gigantic personal profits. And since then there has been growing amongst us a sense of inferiority through propaganda. We are in that position today.

There is another thing I believe that has also helped drown our American idealism, that idealism that made America a nation and maintained her down through that early formative period. It happened after the time that John Quincy Adams and his colleagues ceased to have influence—and that is no reflection upon Andrew Jackson, who defeated John Quincy Adams. But beginning with that period, a new element entered into our American politics and into our American life. That was our foreign investments. We invested billions of dollars in foreign securities and we invested those billions under the British flag and under the French flag, for the most part; therefore when wars came, we followed our dollars; our bankers saying, "We've got to go into the war on the side of the country that owes us money so that at the end we can collect our money." And even today it is a foregone conclusion that if we have any allies, we are going to have allies that satisfy the bankers in New York and satisfy the international bankers in London, Paris, New York, and Washington, and satisfy also what we might call the post-ally mind.

It is interesting that two years ago right here on this platform, we had people in this forum that stormed and raved to us to boycott Italy, almost to join Britain and France in a war against Italy to keep her out of Ethiopia. Here they stood, and I felt that I was committing a sin by disagreeing with them. They have now turned around, and they want us to co-operate with the very people whom they insisted we boycott or fight in a war two years ago. That is it—if we form alliances with European countries under the present circumstances we will be jumping from one hot plate to another. I am not aware of any moral obligation on our part to try to cure the political problems of Europe but if we do get into the moral field, we must get in on the basis of the person who is dispossessed and not the person who possesses the dispossessed. The only ethical responsibility I feel is to plead the cause of the victim.

Complete isolation, of course, on a permanent basis is impossible for any organism; and I would be foolish to say that any country or any individual or or any group can maintain complete isolation a permanent basis. That can not be done. But to enter into any treaty that favours one nation more than it does the others, is a mistake. That treaty idea of a favoured nation has got us into trouble down through all the ages. Open door, absolutely open door, free competition everywhere, so that anybody from any country can buy, anybody from any country can sell; it is the only way you will ever have world peace. As long as there is a favoured nation clause in any treaty, there is going to be trouble. That necessarily binds those two nations in each other's defence.

There is nothing about this proposal of isolation and neutrality in war that would keep us from having every kind of trade with relationship with other nations. Why can not we trade with somebody even if we have no agreement with them? We have no permanent agreement with the grocer. There is no favoured store arrangement. If there were, we would be in trouble; and so would you, if you entered into that kind of an agreement in any phase of life. And one cannot do in international fields what one cannot do as an individual or a neighbour. One cannot do successfully on a big scale what would not work successfully on a community scale. That we may safely put down as a principle. It is an axiom because it is true. Therefore I do not favour permanent favoured nation treaties—even though it might mean trade for America; and I certainly would not favour any military alliance with imperial powers, nor would I even enter into the League of Nations under the present arrangement. The League of Nations is a compact dominated by a few strong powers that rule over mandated and conquered peoples who have hardly any voice at all.

Just think of our country coming out of a war, the United States of America, with all of American idealism and altruism, just think of our having our representatives go to Versailles and actually agree to put Iraq and the rest of Arabia and all of Africa and all of India and the great portions of China to remain under European domination, and then write into a treaty that we would guarantee the integrity of those Empires for all times to come.

I visualise America as a lovely, magnificent, living, pyramidal organization with its one hundred thirty millions of people, bounded on the east by the Atlantic, bounded on the west by the Pacific, bounded on the north by Canada, and bounded on the south by Mexico and the Gulf. Maintaining our life within these boundaries, I would have our people build up the following things: class freedom, that's the American ideal. Build up class freedom. Build up government by and for the common people. Build up an ethical creativity in a literature of constructive protest. That is the most needed thing today. A literature of ethical protest, protest against what is wrong, protest against imperialism, protest against militarism, protest against exploitation, protest against all these evils. What we want is a literature of ethical protest, to be done on a creative plane as did the old pamphleteers of France, or the pamphleteers of early America, and like that of the man who wrote the Declaration of Independence. That kind of creative literature of constructive protest. Then we need diplomats that are rugged, that apply American standards to actions and to proposals, like Jefferson, like John Quincy Adams. We dare not, in this modern day in America, have a loss of our national identity. We must not have a merging of our protoplasm into the European spore. We have got to have a vertebrate nation with an attitude of good will, but good will that is based on self-respect and maturity of soul and not on some jellyfish idea that other nations are better than we are, and that only if we copy them will we be great. The United States of America is not in a position today to help any world, for the simple reason that we have got ourselves entangled by alliances, that we cannot help the world without doing it the way France or Great Britain or the other European imperial powers want us to do it. The only time we are going to be able to help the world is when we are free from every entangling alliance and have developed our own homogeneous American soul.

I close with just this sentence—and I do not want you to regard it as epigrammatic; and I do not want you to regard it as oratorical; and I do not want you to regard it as emotional; and I do not want you to regard it as something that I have not thought through—with this sentence, which is a repetition: the greatest thing that the United States of America needs today is sixty years of absolute neutrality absolute peace, constructive internal reconstruction, from babyhood, through grade school, high school, college, out into married life—we need two generations of it, in order to develop an American soul that is not a colonial soul, but an independent, democratic American soul that can then offer to transfer its democratic life and ideals to other peoples. And the best way to help the world is to take that sixty years to get ready rather than to go now like a jellyfish and join with the spores of other peoples.

FEDERATION PROBLEMS.*

(By C. R. Reddy).

Provincial Autonomy having been granted, it logically and inevitably followed that some kind of Federation was necessary. Was it to be a Federation only of the British Provinces? If so, the Government might be assured that a nationalist majority would predominate. And then would the Princes treat that Government with the same regard and respect that they have now been showing to the Viceroy and the Government of India? That is one of the crucial problems. In all probability they would not; why, for certainty, for they had already rejected the Nehru proposals on the subject. So a Federation in which the Princes would also take part had to be devised, so that partly for reasons of Imperial interest and partly perhaps—it is for you to judge, I am only presenting the issues—on account of the logical situation above-mentioned they had to bring forward proposals for an All-India Federation. Consider again whether it is also probably due to that that a Conservative type of Constitution had to be devised; otherwise, what probability was there of Kashmere, Baroda, Hyderabad, the Holkar and the Scindia joining it? What I am trying to impress on my young friends is that these questions are to be studied in connection with the conditions of our country, with the psychology of the different interests affected, and not from the point of view of abstract logic. Why, abstract logic might have suggested a Garibaldian solution of the problen viz., the abolition of all the Indian States, just as Garibaldi brought about the extinction of the various Italian States. Then again, is such a thing possible and at what cost? And is the country sufficiently united for any such heroic measure? These things being ruled as out of order and possibility, we have to be satisfied with a compromise of some kind and not logical and absolute solutions at this stage. But even an imperfect solution now may have in it seeds of growth and lead to a better solution in the future. That is why very often people have to be satisfied with Constitutions which on paper look so defective but which when properly operated lead to much better results. Godkin wrote a couple of volumes on "The Unforeseen Tendencies of Democracies," showing how the American Constitution has not functioned in the way in which the original founders expected it to function and how it had taken different directions.

Now we come to the other parties. Mr. Jinnah from the very beginning was opposed to Federation. I speak with great diffidence. It is difficult for me to interpret the Muslim mind on the subject, but I have to infer what is behind or what may be behind the back of their minds. Any Indian Federation, however constituted, is bound to give a predominantly Hindu composition and complexion to the Central Government. There is the nothing wrong in this. It is inevitable. The Hindus, States as well as people, are a big majority. Muslim community might feel that on account of its population and its past history, it is entitled to something more than good Government at others' hands, that it is entitled to a real place of power and effective share in the politics and government of our land. I am not here either to criticize or to justify. I am here to place before my friends the chief facts as they appear to me; it is for you to evaluate them, to see what value you would give to them, whether you would take them as data or reject them as fancies. But is it a wrong ambition?

Well, I can quite understand a mind of that kind in my Muslim brethren. For one thing, from the very beginning they had insisted, as a corollary of their general dislike of a strong Central Government, which, however constituted, is bound to be predominantly Hindu, on Residuary Powers being vested in the Provinces. Students of political science know that means the Provinces should be regarded as sovereign states and the Central Government as having only such powers as are expressly delegated to it by the Provinces. From the very commencement of this discussion, Mr. Jinnah held firmly to this view and was against Federation altogether. To that extent he was willing to join the Congress in opposition, but with complete freedom regarding subsequent action. He would not have any Federation; the more democratic, the worse it was from the Muslim point of view.

Secondly, should there be a Federation, it should be, according to the Muslims, of the type of a Confederation and not Federation proper; in other words, the Provinces would be the Sovereign States and the Central Government would be a limited authority with specified powers. It is interesting to know that at that time the Congress was for giving a blank cheque to the Muslim League and to our Muslim friends and it was left to the Government of India and the Secretary of State to safeguard the integral sovereignty of the country. This question of residuary powers was not decided either one way or the other. The final arrangement was that as and when specific questions arose, they would be decided on their merits and assigned either to Provinces or to the Federation; and thus a definite solution was postponed.

For the very reason that the Muslims found Federation objectionable, the Hindu Maha Sabha found it exceedingly agreeable. My friend, Bhai Paramanand, has advised the Hindus to accept the Federation, any Federation, no matter how constituted. Probably he was viewing it from the point of view firstly of Hindu predominance in the Centre—I say probably, I have no right to interpret the motives of others—and secondly, at all events, in pleading for a strong Central Government, and Federal system he certainly was trying to checkmate the fissiparous tendencies in our country and preserve our integrity as a State. The unfortunate thing with our country is that we have not got that basic national unity which is at the foundation of all Federations in the world, excepting probably the Swiss Republic which has a peculiar history of its own, not to be repeated elsewhere.

Then comes the Congress. We of the Congress opposed Federation in those days on two grounds. The first was that large powers had been reserved to the Viceroy, the Safeguards, the Special Responsibilities, discretionary powers, and so forth. Also big departments. In fact, under the Constitution as now devised, the Viceroy still remains all powerful. But mark you, my Congress friends are not emphasising this point now. The reason is that one and a half years of Office in the Provinces has assured them that if they have a strong and stable majority to back them up, these Special Powers, the Power of Veto, discretionary powers, safeguards, etc., were not likely to be brought into operation. The point which the Congress is now emphasising is the undemocratic nature of the representation of the States in the Central Legislature. What the Congress feels is "Here is a Viceroy endowed with Special Powers, and, as Sir Samuel Hoare put it in the House of Commons, the Constitution has been so manipulated as to give the Viceroy a permanent majority." That is the Congress view. Whether it is a right view or a questionable one is a matter for your deliberation. They told us that these nominated members from the Indian States will always vote with the Government and they could never have a majority. Is that necessarily true? Are we to say that granting these States do join the Federation, Baroda —by the bye, I am sorry to hear that the Maharajah of Baroda is ill and our best wishes are with him for his speedy recovery—Mysore, Hyderabad and Travancore will blindly vote according to the whip of the Governor-General? Have they not shown in many dealings, some of which may have become public, that they have a will of their own and that they are not lacking in their sense of duty where national interest and racial self-respect are involved? Granting that the contention of the Congress is correct, may it not be possible in the future, at all events to secure a better order of things? Will the Princes and their nominees be for ever puppets? May they not develop in association with the Congress greater self-reliance and spirit of independence, and further more, may not after some time, the Constitution itself be amended in directions more favourable to democracy?

And, well, what is the attitude of the Princes? We do not know if many of them are anxious to join the Federation. They would like to take part in the Government of All-India: at the same time, they do not want to relinquish any of their powers. They want to be directly under the Sovereign Government. The utmost that they are prepared for appears to be responsible association with British India in the Central Legislature and the Government. And we can understand their feelings too. Supposing as the Congress commands, they are compelled to send only elected men to the Central Legislature. How can Indian States send elected men to the Central Legislature who would be free to take part in party politics according to their own convictions, and carry on within the borders of the State autocratically as they have been doing till now? You cannot give representation for purposes abroad and deny representation for purposes within. So, the problem of responsible government in the States and the problem of elected representatives for the Central Legislature are inter-related and cannot be separated from each other. The result is that negotiations have been going on for over two years. We do not know definitely how many Princes have consented to join the Federation, how many have refused and how many are trying to lay down special conditions in their Instruments of Accession. The whole of that part of the Federal experiment, or Federal Constitution is still in the dark. It has become darker as a result of the Congress attack on the small States.

Well, we have now seen the different parties and their views. Is there any justification for holding that all the component parts of a Federation should have the same type of Government? In the old Germanic Federation, of which Prussia was the leader, States with different constitutions took part. Several of the States were more liberal than Prussia. There were also some Republican towns, the towns of the Hansa League and they also sent representatives. Bavaria continued to have foreign embassies accredited to her King. Furthermore, in the Upper House of the Federal Legislature, there was a preponderant representation of Prussia; and yet again the entire Upper House was composed of delegates nominated by the different States forming the Federation and these were bound to vote according to the instructions given by their Governments. There was no elected element. It was not in any way democratic. Yet such was the strong racial feeling and patriotic unity of the German States that Constitution not merely worked well, but stood the test of the Great War. The Constitution did not break down under the stress of the Great War; it broke down due to the defeat and subsequent developments in socialistic and other directions, and more especially the unity drive of the Nazis.

Is there, therefore, any historical need for imposing one type of internal Constitution on all the federating parts in India? The claim of the Princes—I have had opportunity of discussing with some of them—can be broadly expressed thus. They say "Leave us to ourselves. After all, democracy is not the only form of Government and it has not been a perfect success everywhere" (except locally here) (Laughter). "Some of the European countries have discarded it in order to forge ahead. Under the democratic constitution Germany was in a very low condition Germany was being trodden down by the victorious allies and Italy was in a bad way; but under the Totalitarian systems of Government they have been able to make up, so that to-day the tables are turned. The Versailles Treaty is no more. It almost looks that Germany is now the paramount power in Europe. Democracy would not have achieved such a triumph, in so short a time and at so little expense."

The point for consideration is, has no case been made out for a Federation in which the Federating units will have their own special and individual character, or shall we dogmatically say that this and this alone is the only rule of life and law of politics and all shall adopt it? That at the bottom is the great question between the Congress and the Princes.

There is a further complication, the communal question. To give you a concrete example, a couple of years ago there was a big movement in Kashmere of Muslims for acquiring various civic and political rights; in fact responsible government. I ask you, did the Hindus sympathise with that movement? For Kashmere, as you know, is a Hindu State with a large Muslim majority. Today there is a similar movement in Hyderabad. The people are agitating in the name of the State Congress of Hyderabad for Civil Liberties and responsible government. What would be the reaction of the Muslims towards this movement? Wherever we go, the communal question comes to the surface and that creates dangers peculiar to India and not to be found in other countries. Is there not the Mahratta versus Gujerati virus in the Baroda Government? The Muslims are democrats in Kashmere and the opposite in Hyderabad; the Hindus are vice versa.

In these circumstances, what should be our attitude towards the proposed Federation? Had we been internally in a more fortunate position, which, of course, means in a stronger position, our solution would have been simple and easy to achieve. Just at present there are various complications. The Princes do not seem to be in ahurry to enter the doors of Federation. The Congress invasion of the States has provoked a bad reaction. Should we ask them to reform themselves on the threshold before they enter? "You must undergo prayaschitha before you are allowed into the sanctum." They do not seem to be in a hurry to oblige us. The British appear to be very anxious and are even letting down the Princes very hardly. The Muslims are not willing. They will join us in resisting the Federation, but their objects in resisting are quite different from those of the Congress. The Congress is a national body. It tries to look at problems from the point of view of Indian citizenship, pure and simple. But it does not appeal to all communities. Then as to the States.

You want them to reform themselves before they are allowed into the hall of Federation. When you point out the bad Government in the States, they may turn round and not merely ask you to look into the "Responsible Government" enacted by your local bodies; they may even ask you to count the number of communal clashes, labour disorders and student strikes that have occurred since the Congress accepted office. Count up and see how these 18 months compare with any previous 18 months in this respect. When the situation is thus growing worse, is this the time when you can make large demands on the British Government? You must have read with interest the correspondence between the Muslim League and the Indian National Congress. They do not seem to be coming together at all. They won't shake hands with each other; and without solving this big problem of communal unity, we shall not be, we will never be, in a position to dictate terms to the British in regard to the nature of the Federation.

EUROPE'S POPULATION PROBLEM.

Whichever way one looks at the question Mr. G. F. McCleary's book, "Population: Today's question,"* makes depressing reading. Mr. McCleary has given his public not a new set of facts to work on but a fresh presentation of the problem of depopulation. The first chapters of the book are a historic study of the literature on population from the ancient Greeks and Romans to the birth control agitation of our own times. The presentation is clear though there is a rather distracting tendency to literary quotation which is remotely relevant. It is when we come to Mr. McCleary's discussion of the problem of the White race that we realise where this hitherto academic study is leading us. Mr. McCleary's thesis is that the tendency towards depopulation which is revealed by statistics not only in Europe but in the new world and in the Dominions and British colonies as well, is a danger which has not been adequately appreciated. The countries which are attempting to meet the menace are, according to the writer, not remarkably successful in their methods. France and Belgium with their system of family allowances have not checked their declining birth-rate. In fact, according to the League of Nations' figures which we published last week, France has the misfortune of having a death-rate in excess of its birth-rate. Italy in spite of heroic measures against bachelorhood, has had a steadily falling birth-rate and even a declining marriage rate. Germany alone seems to have been able to stop the decline to some extent but even there Mr. McCleary thinks it is too early to say that the success is more than temporary. German writers themselves claim that success in fighting the menace of depopulation rests not on economic measures alone but on the cultivation of an optimistic outlook by the people. It is obvious on the face of it that no amount of threats or economic inducements will raise the birth-rate among a people who face the future with fear and uncertainty. What war has done in Europe, frequent and unaccustomed depressions have brought about in America.

Mr. McCleary sees clearly enough that all the direct attempts to increase population have failed. It is all the more difficult to understand why he fails to see that the older no less direct attempts to tell people to reduce the population could not have succeeded in themselves. The claims he makes, for instance, for the birth control movement are exaggerated. It is difficult to believe that the wide publicity won by trials against birth control pamphleteers resulted in the immediate fall of the birth-rate. It is still more difficult to credit this when one remembers that the zeal of propagandists was far in advance in 1870-90 of the contraceptive trade. But when we remember that the declining birth-rate was attendant on an extension of the benefits of the colonial system to the masses of imperial nations, we have a ready explanation of the continued fall in the birth-rate. After all, as Mr. McCleary himself points out, birth control was not unknown in ancient times. Why should it have caught on in certain countries at a particular period? Or why should it have been advocated by propagandists first a few months earlier?

The fear of depopulation is greater for the British than for any other Western people. Mr. McCleary tells us that the British, wherever they may be, in Canada in Australia or in Africa, are steadily going down in numbers. In contrasting the British position with that of the Canadian French, the author attributes the downward trend to an over-emphasis on the need to make good. It is surprising that he fails to draw the natural conclusion that too great a preoccupation with economic problems, individual or national, has been the bane of the British. "The investigator seeking a social grade in which large families are relatively numerous," says Mr. McCleary, "would be ill-advised to prosecute his search among persons holding posts that are permanent and pensionable." Imperial France, Britain and the United States of America are the three countries which have roused the envy of the world for their economic and social opportunities. The political weak French Canadian has adopted unconsciously the technique of backward and insecure peoples in population matters. What is true of the individual or of the classes, cannot be false with nations. In his striking book on "Parliamentary Democracy in England" Mr. Harold Laski asserts that the colonial power of Britain had enabled the people in that country to keep up a spirit of give and take. The classes were in a position to concede more and more "rights" to the masses without losing much of their privileges. Security, briefly, was widespread. Today the situation is rapidly altering but it would seem that the population trend has not yet adjusted itself to the changing situation. The question how soon the depopulation movement will be checked depends not so much on positive measures to restrain it as on the realisation on the part of the working classes that they have ceased to represent a vested interest. And that depends, in relation to the world, on the dissolution of colonial system.

WELFARE WORK IN INDIA AND THE EMPIRE.

Of the many year-books that are published, the Empire Social Hygiene Year Book* is specially valuable. The 1938 edition is the fifth of the series and it is unfortunate that the publishers have issued a double edition for 1938 and 1939. The statistics for India, for example, are all for 1936 and the figures for '37 will be available a year later even than it has been so far. This is peculiarly regrettable in view of the extension of self-government in the provinces and the quickening of interest in public health questions both through the establishment of popular governments and by the work of public organizations like the population conferences. The Year-Book begins its section on India with the remark that the responsibility for Public Health work rests with the provinces and the Indian States but the introductory article describes the work of the Central Government and the structure of what is after all only a co-ordinating body, at disproportionate length. The details show the uneven nature of provincial activities. The remarks on the difficulty of achieving anything in the campaign against venereal diseases and other public health questions which the Year-Book contains, are based on a mistaken notion. If India has to wait for the growth of a public opinion for necessary welfare measures, we might well have to wait indefinitely. Here we must look for guidance to Japan. In his excellent book, Japan: The Hungary Guest Mr. G. C. Allen explains a distinction between the East and Great Britain which has been often ignored. He writes:

> Many evils and abuses continue to exist not because the Japanese are insensitive to them nor because they wish to preserve them, but because their removal awaits action by authority. Most of the social improvements in England during the past century have been initiated by groups of individuals who have led movements or formed societies which at length have compelled the State to act. Some instances of this kind of movement exist in Japan; but they are ineffective on the whole, and social reform societies do not seem capable of organizing powerful campaigns for social amelioration.

The difficulties are even greater in India where illiteracy is widespread. The provincial governments recognize this in pursuing a policy of Prohibition where they have a large measure of public support. It is only a question of time before the Prohibition method is extended to other social fields as well.

In the matter of health services, the United Provinces and Madras lead the rest of India: while the U. P. has developed along traditional lines, Madras has been responsible for several innovations.

Madras has a programme of Health Education which seems to be unequalled elsewhere in India. Many of the Indian States with a notable exception in Mysore, listed in the Year-Book, are very much behind the British Indian provinces. It is when we compare the work done in India with what has been achieved in other parts of the Empire that we feel the lag in Public Health services. Figures for expenditure on Public Health are not given for all provinces but calculating on the basis of the information given in the Year-Book, one is struck by the meagre resources available for this vital department, compared to the high budget for the Ministry of Health in the United Kingdom. The section dealing with Great Britain is revealing. The cinema, broadcasting and even the education department, all play a part in Public Health. All discussion on the relative merits of State apathy and popular enthusiasm or State initiative amid popular ignorance and illiteracy seems futile in the face of this fact. There is no reason why the State should hold back in the work of educating opinion to a recognition of its needs. The Social Hygiene Year-Book is a forceful influence in bringing home to the governments and the people of India the importance of preventive work. If we might make a suggestion it is that incomplete data, which is not relevant to Public Health affairs, like those on the religious distribution of populations, might be omitted from future editions.

GERMANY AND AFRICAN COLONIES.*

The colonial question has not been altered in substance by recent events. Germany's colonies were wrested from her by force of arms and insult was added to injury when the conquest was excused by false and trumped-up proofs that pre-war Germany was unfit to govern colonial possessions. Since the advent of Herr Hitler, patriotic irredentism in Nazi propaganda has been peculiarly associated with the colonial guilt lie; and the return of the Reich's former territories overseas has been claimed unconditionally as a matter of right. The economic grounds for the German claims are less substantial than those of prestige or politics. The possession of, say, the Reich's old African territories would admittedly provide some very slight relief to her exchange difficulties by providing certain materials which are at present bought elsewhere and so releasing foreign exchange to purchase more essential commodities, such as iron, copper, bauxite, cotton and wool, from other places. And in the case of oils, sisal and phosphates the former colonies, including those in the Pacific, could be directly helpful to the Four Year Plan. But the exports of these territories amount in total value to less than 4 per cent. of the value of Germany's imports, and to increase their contribution appreciably would entail an amount of investment which the Reich at present could ill afford. Nevertheless, it is scarcely in order for the possessors of colonies to base their refusal to surrender a part of their property on demonstrations that the imperial game is not economically worth the candle. Nor are Britons with their colour-bar, or the remote Americans with their negro problem, on very secure ground when they base their denial of Germany's demands on German racial doctrines. It does not follow, as night the day, that Jew-baiters will oppress natives. If moral issues are decisive, the unconditional surrender of colonies to Germany would be wrong because broad considerations of justice require as Mr. Noel Baker argued on Wednesday, not unilateral concessions, but the application of the principle of trusteeship to all colonies whatever their ownership, the abatement of sovereign interests and the world-wide recognition of the open door in colonial commerce. The mandatory principle itself imposes respect for their considerations. As it is, questions of expediency and power politics probably prevail; and it is not practicable to transfer colonies, simply because it would be strategically unsafe to do so and nothing would be gained. If, on the other hand, an effective quid pro quo could be gained, if some guarantee of lasting peace could be assured, then some sort of deal might reasonably be done.

THE PLACING OF CHILDREN IN FAMILIES.

The problem dealt with in the present Report in two volumes has been discussed in the Social Committees of the League of Nations since 1934. At that time the Child Welfare Committee planned a survey on the placing of children in families as part of its general enquiry into the treatment of neglected and delinquent minors. As the work proceeded, however, a great deal of valuable material was brought forward by Governments and by private organisations such as the Save the Children International Union. It was found that the question could not be confined to the somewhat limited aspect of the placing of negected and delinquent children. The Advisory Committee on Social Questions, therefore, decided to treat independently the whole problem of placing in families as a method of child care:

The volumes contain material sent forward by Governments and Child Welfare Organisations, edited and arranged in the light of discussions in the Advisory Committee on Social Questions.

The first volume presents the principles accepted by modern social service as underlying provisions for child care, the historical development of the use of placing children in families, characteristic features of the different systems employed in various parts of the world, and the organisation of social services to direct "placing."

The Report defines the principles from which modern practice in social welfare proceeds. Training for ordinary life has become the dominant idea in child care.

" The natural and normal place for a child's upbringing is with his own parents in his own home. Modern social practice concentrates in its major efforts upon measures calculated to conserve the home for the child. Hence, when it unfortunately happens that for some sufficient reason a child must be cared for away from his own home, the reasonable view is that the best substitute for his own home would be another family resembling as much as possible what his own home should have been. Moreover, if we agree that the chief concern of child care is to epuip the child to function successfully in a normal community where people ordinarily live in families, it is reasonable to suppose that this training could best be given in such a community and in such a family home, rather than in the more artifical circumstances of institutional life. From such considerations, the belief in family foster-care has steadily gained ground in recent times."

Volume II describes the various systems of placing children in families that are now employed in different parts of the world. Precedents are found for the modern practice of finding homes for orphaned or dependent children in Bohemia in the 15th century; while in Finland and the territory that is now Belgium, this practice was followed in the 17th and 18th centuries. Denmark, France, Switzerland and Sweden have been applying placing systems for more than a hundred years. In Switzerland the principle of family placing has been applied since Reformation. Chile was the first country in the New World to adopt the system having established the boarding-out of dependent children in 1853.

The Report describes the present practice in the following countries: Union of South Africa, Argentine Republic, Belgium, Australia, Canada, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, Estonia, Finland, France, Germany, Hungary, Italy, Latvia, Lithuania, the Netherlands, Norway, New Zealand, Poland, Switzerland, Turkey, United States, Uruguay, United Kingdom, Sweden, and U. WORLD CHRISTIANITY.

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

Editorial legerdemain is astonishing: The Editor of the Social Reformer in his Editorial notes (in the issue of 24-12-33), made out that I am not interested in World Christianity on grounds which I certainly did not furnish in the article he referred to. Let me state my position.

I am passionately interested in World Christianity in terms of the Commonwealth of God. It always perplexes me that the Christian Movement should continue to blind itself to the fact that the evangelistic situation is a world situation. Nothing but colossal ignorance or consummate pride could make missionary thinkers like Dr. Kraemer still speak of the Christian message for a Non-Christian World (meaning India, Africa, China and Japan.) They forget that the irreligion which is spreading in the so-called Christian countries of the west like a prairie fire is by far more dangerous to human civilization and progress, and to the Kingdom of God, than the non Christian religions of the East. Certainly, an organization like the International Missionary Council should become alive enough to turn the telescope of evangelical sympathy westward also. The European crisis has revealed, as nothing else could have, the fundamental denial of Gospel of Christ by the westeran mind.

The implications of the Gospel of Christ, from the preamble of the Nazareth Manifesto to the miracle of Pentecost, introduce a revolution in human thought and the history of man. What are these implications? Human life is personal. Man must break down all obstacles which obstruct full community. National exclusiveness must give way to international community. Imperial, feudal or capitalist class-system must yield to a classless community. Religious and cultural rivalry must be replaced by human brotherhood. The western mind has repudiated every one of these salient implications. In fact the Nazi hatred for Jews is a climatic revelation of the Nordic consciousness. Hitler is not angry with the Jew. He does not covet the Jew's wealth. He does not fear a Jewish revolt. But in Hitler the Nordic mind has expressed its repudiation of the Christ-consciousness inherent in the Jewish mind and its ultimate fulfilment. This is corroborated by the Nazi denunciation of Christianity simultaneous with its expulsion of Jews. Fascism (and Nazism and capitalism are different forms of Fascism) is the violent protest of the pagan consciousness, suppressed for centuries by Christianity and even driven into the unconscious for a time; the protest against the implications of Christ's Gospel. The irony is that these implications were manifested on any large scale for the first time by Communism. Thus apparently Fascism was a protest against Communism. But whereas Communism puts into effect the programme of Christ (leaving Christ out for the moment) Fascism is a revolt against the programme as well as the Founder, against community-consciousness itself. It penalizes the Jew because the community-consciousness is so marked in the Jewish tradition. It is ironical, nay tragic, that the Jews should be rejected by a pagan world for the same reason that they themselves rejected Christ. Jews fulfilled the Jewish community-consciousness by enlarging it into the Commonwealth-of-God-consciousness. But at that very point the Jews rejected him. Now they are rejected because they have become an immanent universal community, immanent in the nations of the earth, a menace to aggressive individualism.

The European world is too spent and weary spiritually to help itself, much less others. The world is too bankrupt spiritually for any nation or country to presume to send out Christmas gifts to any other country. Christmas itself has not been understood. The Christmas tree with all its imperialistic glamour and tinsel of capitalism is a parody on the birth of the Man of Sorrows. Let servants of Christ everywhere band themselves together to fight unchristian imperialism, capitalism, and bitter nationalism at any cost to the end that their national states may be transformed into the Commonwealth of God, realizing frankly that their respective countries need Christ just as much as the Non-Christian World, and patterning their attitude towards other races and cultures accordingly.

But the need for an evangelistic drive for the so-called Christian countries becomes urgent for another reason also. Where Christianity is not denied altogether, it is interpreted with such confused ambiguity as to mean anything and everything. Ambiguous interpretation is perhaps more dangerous than repudiation. It is equivalent to sailing under false colours. Missionary work and exploitation are carried on side by side by members of one race. Foreign domination is said to have Christian motives. Evangelism and capitalism sit cheek by jowl. Class-distinctions are considered as Christian by some as equality is by others. War and pacifism are variously sanctioned by Christian standards. Are men like Kreamer and Mott not aware of the virus of ambiguity within Christendom? These ambiguities are the off-shoots of the process, which began in the Roman Empire as early as Constantine, and has never stopped in European thought; the process of the self-negation of Christian Church. It made all the conscious Christianities of Europe the politico-religious creeds of secular societies built on the will to power, and practical negations of the Christian purpose. (Vide John Macmurray: Clue to History, p. 206-7. Also p. 226—237). In the Roman Empire, in Scandinavia and Hungary Christianity was used as a political weapon. The Carolingian rulers and Charlemagne used mass conversions for political purposes. Even today the Church of England blesses all kinds of unchristian exploitation. In fact England's first 'Defender of Faith', Henry VIII was not what one would call religious or even scrupulous. The pope has pronounced his blessing upon the rebel forces of Franco. And so examples could be multiplied to show the utter hopelessness of the tangle of the official Christian interpretation in the West. The Process of compromise has not come to an end in European Christianity. And that very process has brought the official Christianities of Europe to the verge of collapse.

That Foreign Mission Boards are able to raise large funds and collect regiments of men and women to spread Christianity in Eastern lands while Christianity is collapsing in many sections of the West itself, manifests the confidence they have in the East to understand and conserve the spirit of Christ's original Gospel, and give it back to the impoverished West after the wreckage predicted by Spengler, threatened by Fascism, Nazism, and Imperialism. The East is grateful for this tribute to her spiritual perception. As the Indian Church matures it will show greater consciousness of its international function. As the Indian Church becomes more conscious, and therefore independent and self-determining, it will be able to offer missionaries for western countries. Towards that end an organization like the International Missionary Council should begin to arrange for international exchange of missionaries —at least to justify its presumptuous designation: Linguistically gifted and culturally genuine Chinese, Indians, Negroes, Phillipines, Japanese, Javanese, Sumatrans and Burmese should be selected by the various National Christian Councils, trained for missionary work, and sent out to Western countries on evangelistic missions. This would be an effective measure towards the establishment of world Christianity, beyond the sentimentalities of rosy speech, on the firm foundation of real brotherhood.

But of course we get so accustomed to certain modes of thought that anything new comes as a shock; and the first reaction is resistance. The word "mission" at once raises thoughts, of the white man's burden in remote parts of Asia or Africa It will take time for people to get used to the possibility of that word implying the brown man's burden. Westerners have taken it for granted that they are the chosen people destined to conquer and dominate and exploit so as to civilize and Christianize. The day is at hand when that assumption will be dashed to the ground. It will be well for occidental missionaries to prepare the way for Oriental missionaries who are willing to sacrifice and brave persecution and insult to preach original Christianity to the West. The sooner words like 'evangelism,' 'missionary,' mission,' 'conversion,' and the like are redeemed from the iniquitous interpretations forced upon them by an imperialistic and capitalistic civilization, the better will it be for real Christianity. The aggressive west has inflicted its thoughtforms as much as its commerce and colonization upon the peace-loving people of the East. This infliction has been positively unchristian. Nor are there any signs of repentance, barring a few noble exceptions. Nothing but repentant reformation and revolutionary rethinking will bring about the New Birth of Christianity for the future service of creating the Commonwealth of God, when peace and justice, equality and freedom will be the rightful heritage for all alike. If not the New Christianity must arise whose relation to the old will be similar to that of the first Christians to the Jewish Church. It was the Jewish Church not the first Christians who provoked the schism. The task of this New Christianity will be not to save itself by selling itself to imperial powers or financing classes, but to save the world in a universal Community. It will expect to find itself denounced by many who vehemently declare themselves Christian, doughty champions of the old. It will expect to be viewed with suspicion because of its Christliness by many of those with whose cause it identified itself. Yet the revelation it will present is one of redemption. And redemption implies purification. The pentecostal inspiration comes with tongues of fire, and the flame will scorch and burn away the sentimentalities, compromises, false idealisms, hypocrisies which have clustered around Christ's message. (Vide: Keneth Ingram's "Christian challenge to Christians" pp. 214–24). This new Christianity is already making itself felt. It is already beginning to release the creative energy of men to demand universal Community, to demand the annihilation of class distinction, national rivalry, and race segregation. Through its fearless activity the desire of nations shall be fulfilled in Christ.

This New Christianity will have not a verbal but a vital message for the whole world. The East will find in it not veiled imperialism but friendly co-operation. It will be a liberating force which will be welcomed by India. The New Christianity will not be a new cult but a renaissance of Christ's Christianity as distinct from the paganized Christianity of the Churches today. And it will, as it must, bring the power of emancipation, of redemption through utmost regeneration of individual and society alike. This power is needed in India, in the East generally. The community-building force, welding together the conflicting elements of communal or caste isolation is the best guarantee for freedom, justice, and peace. India needs it. The old Christianities of Europe have not given India what she needs. The life-transforming and the society-transforming energy of the vision of Christ will galvanize India into greater effect towards her goal and simultaneously furnish direction and co-ordination. The New Christianity whose dynamic is nothing less than Christ and His Commonwealth; whose discipline is attunement to God through communion and to man through community; whose justification is nothing short of complete emancipation in Christ, will indeed fulfil the Indian heritage not in the sentimental manner of Farquhar and his school, but realistically by extension and motivation.

THE TRADITIONAL HOME OF THE SANDALWOOD TREE.

It is in perfumery that the greater proportion of Sandalwood Oil is employed at the present day and to discriminating buyers, such as perfumers and soap manufacturers must of necessity be, it is hardly necessary to extol the virtues of the East Indian Oil which is without equal, both as a fine perfume base and a fixative for the increasingly popular bouquets of the Oriental type. In addition it is now being used extensively, and with marked success, in the creation of some of the more delicate perfumes in which the Sandalwood odour is not required as a predominant character.

A few trials will convince the perfumer who has not taken full advantage of the odour-value of this oil, that is of the greatest use to him, not only for predominant Sandalwood odour where required, but also a modifier and a fixative for other odours. This is true for liquid perfumes, soaps, creams, powders and all other cosmetic preparations. It will be found invaluable to those up-to-date perfumers who pride themselves on their own "creations."
